Governor Catts' Delusions
The Catholic Church and Billy Sunday

What Florida bigotry means is shown in the correspondence between Governor Catts and a well-known New York lawyer given in the CATHOLIC MIND for April 8. Billy Sunday and his methods are now popular themes. Why Catholics should avoid the gatherings at which his vagaries are the attraction, and how he works up his appeals to hysterical "converts" are told by Father Fisher in a convincing paper.

The War.—During the week the British and French have made notable advances on the Western front. North and south of Arras the British have pushed forward, leaving the city in a pocket. They have also taken Ronssloy and Lambire and arrived less than four miles from Le Catelet. Both north and west of St. Quentin they have made good progress, having pushed back the German line in both places, taking Savy, Epehy, Peizière and Vendelles. They are now only two miles west of the city. South of St. Quentin the French have stormed a number of places, including Moy, so that St. Quentin is now menaced from three sides and according to expectations will be evacuated within a short time. Northeast of Soissons the French have advanced a short distance in the direction of Laon. In Russia the Germans have crossed the Stochod and inflicted severe local losses on the Russians northeast of Kovel.

Bulletin, April 2, p.m.-April 9, a.m.

The Turks are still in retreat before both Russians and British. They have been driven completely from Persia by the former, have crossed the Median Mountains, abandoned Kasr-i-Shirin and Knanikin and have retreated more than seventy-five miles in nineteen days. In Mesopotamia they have been unable to check the advance of the British, and have retired a considerable distance up the Tigris. At the same time they have been moving in a north-easterly direction along the Diala River, and after evacuating Deli Abbas, reached the vicinity of Knanikin. Here the British effected a juncture with Russian forces, turned in a northerly direction, took Dekka, crossed the Diala, and are now pursuing the Turks in the direction of Kifri. During the week the Germans sunk without warning two American steamships, the Aztec and the Missourian.

In answer to the President's summons, Congress convened on April 2. After the opening prayer, which in each house struck the key-note of the extra session, namely, the need of Divine guidance in the momentous crisis of the country and a plea for patriotism, the President's proclamation, calling the extraordinary session to consult on grave matters, was read. The House proceeded to reelect Mr. Champ Clark as Speaker by a vote of 217 to 205. The organization of the House having been completed, the President was informed that Congress was ready to receive his communication. The same evening he entered the hall of the Representatives and read his address. Not only were the Representatives and Senators present, but the Justices of the Supreme Court and the Diplomatic Corps. The President asked Congress to declare that a state of war exists between the United States and Germany, and also to take immediate steps to defend the country.

The President Addresses Congress

After summarizing the negotiations between the two countries concerning Germany's submarine operations, the latter's promise to observe the rules of international law and her subsequent repudiation of it, and the active fulfilment, characterized by "reckless lack of compassion or of principle," of her new policy which went into effect on February 1, a policy that could not be carried out "without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world," the President said:

> The present German warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind. It is a war against all nations. American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it.

He then went on to say that armed neutrality, which he had thought might suffice, had proved impracticable. The methods pursued by the commanders of undersea craft made it necessary to endeavor to destroy the submarines, which in effect were pirates, before they made known their intentions. Germany on the other hand had denied the right to neutrals to use arms at all in the proscribed area of the sea, and had intimated that the armed guards placed on board merchantmen would be regarded as beyond the pale of the law and subject to be dealt with like pirates. Armed neutrality under such conditions, the President declared, was certain to draw the United States into the war without either the rights or the effectiveness of belligerents.

There is one choice we cannot make, we are incapable of making: we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our nation and our people to be ignored or violated. The wrongs against which we now array ourselves are not common wrongs; they reach out to the very roots of human life.

With a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step I am taking and of the grave responsibilities which it involves, but in unhesitating obedience to what I deem my constitutional duty, I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States; that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense, but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war.

The President said that he would soon take occasion to suggest practical measures for the accomplishment of the objects he had enumerated, but he outlined their general character as embracing (1) the utmost practicable cooperation in counsel and action with the Governments already at war with Germany and the extension to those Governments of the most liberal financial credits; (2) the organization and mobilization of all the material resources of the United States; (3) the immediate full equipment of the navy; (4) the immediate addition to the armed forces of the country already provided for by law in case of war, of at least 500,000 men, to be chosen upon the principle of universal liability to service; (5) the authorization of subsequent additional increments of equal force so soon as they may be needed and can be handled in training; and (6) the granting of adequate credits to the Government.

Mr. Wilson then proceeded to define the motives that were actuating the people of the United States in entering the struggle. He drew a sharp distinction between the German people and "the selfish and autocratic power" of the German Government. "We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling towards them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge and approval." The foe against whom the United States is taking arms was the "little groups of ambitious men," who had stooped to the use of spies and intrigue among unsuspecting communities and even in the offices of our Government, "always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose," and constituted the "Prussian autocracy."

Motives for Our Action

The triumph of the Russian people over the Russian autocracy, the President said, had added another fit partner in the league of peace to the forces for freedom in the world, for justice and for peace. "The Prussian autocracy was not and could never be our friend."

We are now about to accept the gage of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretence about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the trusted foundations of political liberty.

We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of the nation can make them.

Taking up the question of the Austro-Hungarian Government, Mr. Wilson said that although that Government's endorsement of the German submarine program had prevented the United States from receiving Count Tarnowski as Ambassador, nevertheless, as Austro-Hungary had not actually engaged in warfare on American citizens, the discussion of the relations between the two countries could be postponed.

The President asserted that we were entering the war "only where we are clearly forced into it, because there are no other means of defending our rights." He insisted again on the sincerity of our friendship for the German people and the earnestness of our desire to reestablish with them at an early date friendly relations, and declared that the American people would prove that friendship by our daily attitude towards the millions of men and women of German birth who live amongst us and share our life. In conclusion he said:

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great, peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other.

The President's words were received with enthusiastic and unparalleled applause, and Congress at once set at work to carry out his wishes.

Congress Declares War

Immediately after the President's address both Houses of Congress reconvened. An identic resolution was introduced, in the Upper House by Senator Martin and in the Lower House by Mr. Flood. The resolution was then referred to the Foreign Relations Committees. Delay was occasioned in the House because the Foreign Relations Committee of that body had not been organized; but in the Senate the resolution was reported favorably the next day, with a single dissenting voice, in the following slightly amended form:

Whereas the Imperial German Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America; therefore be it

Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, which has thus been thrust upon the United States, is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

Senator La Follette insisted that consideration of the resolution should be postponed according to established rule until the next day. As a consequence the Senate adjourned until the following morning, April 4, when the debate was opened with the understanding that it should continue uninterruptedly until the vote was taken. After thirteen hours of discussion the resolution was finally passed by a vote of 82 to 6. Eight senators were absent, but it is stated that they were all in favor of the measure and would have voted for it had they been able to attend the session.

On April 4 the House Committee on Foreign Relations, after a vote of 17 to 2, reported favorably on the resolution in the form passed by the Senate. The following day the measure came up for discussion; and although the pacifists showed unexpected strength during the debate, which lasted continuously for seventeen hours, in which the greatest freedom for the expression of opinion was allowed, the resolution was finally passed by a vote of 373 to 50. It was then signed by Vice-President Marshall and Speaker Clark. Last of all the President affixed his signature, and on April 6 the United States was officially at war with Germany.

After signing the resolution, President Wilson issued a proclamation, declaring the existence of war, and calling on all citizens of the United States to support the Government. In the same document were included a list of regulations to be observed in dealing with all males over fourteen years of age who are termed alien enemies under the Revised Statutes of the United States. Towards those alien enemies who observe the laws of the land "the citizens of the United States are enjoined to observe the peace and to treat them with all such friendliness as may be compatible with loyalty and allegiance to the United States." Other alien enemies are to be dealt with in accordance with the interests of the country. The more important parts of the proclamation are as follows:

The President's Proclamation

I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim to all whom it may concern that a state of war exists between the United States and the Imperial German Government; and I do specifically direct all officers, civil or military, of the United States that they exercise vigilance and zeal in the discharge of the duties incident to such a state of war; and I do, moreover, earnestly appeal to all American citizens that they, in loyal devotion to their country, dedicated from its foundation to the principles of liberty and justice, uphold the laws of the land and give undivided and willing support to those measures which may be adopted by the constitutional authorities in prosecuting the war to a successful issue and in obtaining a secure and just peace. . . .

An alien enemy whom there may be reasonable cause to believe to be aiding or about to aid the enemy, or who may be at large to the danger of the public peace or safety, or who violates or attempts to violate, or of whom there is reasonable ground to believe that he is about to violate, any regulation duly promulgated by the President, or any criminal law of the United States, or of the States or Territories thereof, will be subject to summary arrest by the United States marshal, or his deputy, or such other officer as the President shall designate, and to confinement in such penitentiary, prison, jail, military camp, or other place of detention as may be directed by the President.

Simultaneously with the publication of the proclamation a call for mobilization was flashed to every warship and naval station of the United States. Ninety-one German vessels were seized, aggregating about 600,000 tons. One German auxiliary cruiser, the Cormoran, was sunk by her crew in the harbor of Apra, Island of Guam, before the United States authorities could take possession. A number of suspected aliens have been arrested. Authorization has been given to take over all wireless stations in the United States. Preparations have been already made for conserving the food supplies of the nation, and the various departments of the Government are engaged in formulating measures for the active prosecution of the war.

The action of the United States has been followed by similar action on the part of Cuba. On April 6, President Mario G. Menocal addressed a message to the Cuban Congress, in which after reviewing the submarine question and the disregard of the Cuban protest against the program of undersea warfare announced on February 1 by the German Government, he said:

Other Governments' Attitude

In the full consciousness that I am fulfilling one of my most sacred duties, . . . I appeal to the honorable Congress . . . to resolve, as a result of these unjustifiable and repeated acts of aggression by submarines, notwithstanding the protests of neutral Governments, among them Cuba, that there has been created and exists a state of war between the Republic of Cuba and the Imperial German Government; to adopt all measures necessary, which I reserve to myself the right to recommend at the proper moment, for the maintenance of our rights; to defend our territory, to provide for our security and to cooperate decidedly to these ends with the United States Government, lending it what assistance may be in our power for the defense of the liberty of the seas, of the rights of neutrals and of international justice.

In answer to the President's call, each house appointed five members to form a joint committee to frame a resolution embodying the President's suggestions, so war measures were formulated and unanimously passed by both Houses of Congress on April 7, and the four German ships in Cuban ports were immediately seized and their officers and crews interned.

It is reported that the Governments of Guatemala, Honduras, Hayti and Nicaragua will probably take like action within the next few days. The President of Panama has issued a proclamation committing that Republic unreservedly to the assistance of the United States in defending the Panama Canal. He has also canceled the exequaturs of the German consuls in Panama. Brazil is very much exercised over the sinking without warning of the Brazilian steamship Parana. The Government has requisitioned the entire fleet of the Compania Comercio y Navigacion, and all docks and appurtenances; and a declaration of war against Germany is said by the Central News to be a question of only a few days.

Costa Rica.—Frederico A. Tinoco, who assumed the provisional Presidency of Costa Rica on January 28, after the bloodless revolution which overthrew the Government of Alfred Gonzales, has been elected President of the Republic. He received more than 50,000 votes or seventy per cent of the qualified suffrage, the largest vote cast in the history of the country. Rafael Iglesias, a former President of Costa Rica, received a few votes. A new Congress was also elected and has been summoned to meet on April 11. The elections were peaceful and without show of military force.. The new President was Minister of War under the President whom he overthrew in January. In accordance with the general policy announced some time ago, the Provisional Government set up by Señor Tinoco after the overthrow of President Gonzales, was not recognized by the United States. The more regularly constituted Government now set up in Costa Rica and which, as far as appearances at least are concerned, seems to have the adhesion of the majority of the citizens, may secure for Señor Tinoco and his Government the recognition which so far has been withheld.

Tinoco Elected President

Germany.—One of the most remarkable events of the week, but one not altogether unexpected either in this country or elsewhere, has been the movement in Germany towards the democratization of the Empire. According to the Evening Mail, which bases its information on a report received by wireless from Berlin, the Reichstag has passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee to revise the Constitution of the German Empire. The measure was carried by a vote of 277 to 33, in spite of the earnest plea made by Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg that action on the matter be delayed until after the war. The leader of the movement is Prince Schoenich-Carolath, who is said to have the united support of National-Liberals and Socialists. Catholics apparently are divided. The report declares:

Democratization of Germany

> The efforts of those behind the movement are directed toward taking power from arbitrary hands and placing it in the hands of the people represented in the Reichstag, and the crisis has been precipitated by two things, the prospective declaration by the United States of a "state of war" and the Russian revolution. The Kaiser at present has the sole war-making power, and it is proposed to take this power from him and vest it in the Reichstag, as it is vested in the Congress of the United States.
> The revision of the Constitution contemplates sweeping changes in the electoral system. In the course of the debate in the Reichstag
> The demand was made not only for the abolition of the three-class system of voting in Prussia but also for a change in Prussia's disproportionate representation in the Bundesrath of the Empire, which corresponds roughly to the Senate in the United States. On account of the reactionary election laws of Prussia that kingdom has seventeen out of the fifty-eight votes in the upper chamber of the German Parliament.

The report published by the Evening Mail is confirmed by a dispatch from the Times correspondent at the Hague, who states that there are clear signs of the influence which events in Russia and the United States are having on the German people, and that there is a good deal of open discussion concerning the necessity of "democratizing the whole German system." One example of the growing disaffection with the feudal aristocracy may be cited from the Frankfurter-Zeitung which says: "We are surrounded by democracies, and must make democratic our own State institutions or be left out of the running." Vorwaerts declares:

> The German nation is fighting for the defense of its house and hearth and not for antiquated conditions whose reform has long been promised and which must disappear immediately to counteract the tempest of the world's public opinion based on the belief that Germany is a tyrant and despotic conqueror and that her enemies are the harbingers of liberty.

How serious the movement has become, may be judged from the words which the German Emperor has addressed in an official order to the Imperial Chancellor, in which the latter is directed "to assist in obtaining the fulfilment of the demands of this hour by right means and at the right time, and in this spirit shape our political life in order to make room for the free and joyful cooperation of all the members of our people." The Emperor says:

> While holding a just balance between the people and the monarchy to serve the welfare of the whole, I am resolved to begin building up our internal political, economic, and social life as soon as the war situation permits. While millions of our fellow-countrymen are in the field, the conflict of opinions behind the front, which is unavoidable in such a far-reaching change of Constitution, must be postponed in the highest interests of the Fatherland until the time of the home-coming of our warriors and when they themselves are able to join in the counsel and the voting on the progress of the new order.

A report from Copenhagen, dated April 7, states that "the proposal for constitutional reforms will be taken up immediately after the Easter recess of the Reichstag. The election of members of the committee on reforms is on the program for the first sitting on April 24."

The Catholic Church and Heretical Worship

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

IT is a commonplace with Catholics that they may not participate in false forms of worship. Many a timid maiden has gone into the arena to be devoured by wild beasts rather than offer incense to pagan gods. Millions of Christians have died violent deaths rather than deny even by an external ceremony their faith in Christ. Countless men, learned and ignorant, prominent and obscure, have sacrificed ambition, preferment, wealth, family and even life itself rather than swerve by a hair's breadth from their duty of professing their full belief in all the things Christ commanded His Apostles to teach. They have been considered fools, but they were glad to share in the folly of the Cross; they have been stigmatized as bigots, but their firmness has simply been loyal obedience to the command of Christ. So ingrained in the Catholic character is the conviction that the Faith is the most precious of Divine gifts, to be maintained in its fulness and purity at any cost, that even our children know that they must not participate in heretical worship. The Church, however, has not failed to emphasize this conviction by legislative enactments.

In view of certain discussions, which are rife at present, it may be well to cite one of the many ecclesiastical laws which have to do with this subject. The Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office issued a decree on May 10, 1770, a quite recent decree, it is true, as far as the life of the Church goes, but one that had in mind modern conditions, and is in force today as it has been uninterruptedly for the past 147 years. The important part of the text is as follows: "His Holiness has decreed that as a general rule it is illicit for Catholics to be present at the sermons, baptisms and marriages of heretics and schismatics." This is a simple statement of fact. For correct interpretation, it must be borne in mind that the expression, "as a general rule," is not to be understood as implying that Catholics may, now and then take part in heretical worship, provided they do not make a practice of so doing. The words rather lay down a rule of general application, which may not be infringed except in those circumstances where it is clear that there is no intention on the part of the Catholic of participating in non-Catholic services, but merely of performing a social, civil, professional or domestic duty.

A few examples will illustrate this. For instance, a relative or a friend of a bride or groom might be permitted by a confessor to be present at a marriage celebrated in a Protestant church by a Protestant minister; a public official might attend the Protestant obsequies of a public official; a reporter might accept an assignment from his city editor to take down the text of an important Protestant sermon or to collect data concerning an important social function in a Protestant church; a maid might accompany the children over whom she has charge to a non-Catholic Sunday school, if commanded to do so by her mistress; prisoners, soldiers, and sailors might attend public prayers conducted by a Protestant chaplain in a prison, a barracks or on a warship. In all these cases attendance at non-Catholic services may, under certain circumstances, be considered merely material and not formal, and be understood as such by Catholics and others. It is to be noted, however, that in these cases the Catholic may not take part in the prayers, hymns and other ceremonies of a religious nature, but must act as a mere spectator, observant of the demands of courtesy but not joining in the worship. The discipline of the Church in this matter is very old, for as far back as the time of Tertullian, in the third century, we find explicit directions for the conduct of Catholics, who for one reason or another found it necessary to be present at pagan religious functions.

This material presence is permitted only for grave reasons; the decision, moreover, as to whether the reasons are grave enough to warrant attendance is not a matter of individual judgment, but belongs to ecclesiastical authorities, who should be consulted, except in those well-defined cases which have been interpreted by a recognized custom or by a previous decision of competent authority. Thus, for instance, the Congregation of the Holy Office decided, April 26, 1894, that students in certain provinces of Russia were not to be permitted to attend services conducted by non-Catholics in the public gymnasia, even though such attendance was required but a few times a year.

The attitude of the Church in this matter finds an apt illustration in her legislation with regard to marriage. Catholics who are fairly well instructed in their duties and non-Catholics who have an intelligent knowledge of the discipline of the Church, are acquainted with the fact that a Catholic who attempts to contract matrimony before a Protestant minister, incurs excommunication. By the very force of his act and without explicit condemnation that Catholic is cut off from union with the Church and is deprived of the right of participating in her spiritual advantages. In particular he is barred from receiving the Sacraments, until by the Ordinary, or one delegated with authority by the latter, he has been absolved from censure.

Why does the Church adopt this attitude of severity? If a Catholic attempts to contract marriage before a civil official, a city clerk for instance or a justice of the peace, he commits sin but he is not excommunicated. Why the added strictures on attempts to contract marriage before a Protestant minister? The reason for the discrimination is simply this: When the civil official officiates there is no religious ceremony; as a consequence the disobedience of the Catholic participant does not in any sense imply a rejection of the Faith. On the other hand, when the Protestant minister officiates there is participation in a religious ceremony of a non-Catholic sect, an act, which, if it is not apostasy, is taken to be an external denial of the truth. Hence the one guilty of it is suspected of heresy and is treated accordingly. Nor does a man escape censure, because he interiorly withholds approbation of the religion in whose rite he participates. The Church judges him by his external act, and passes judgment according to its outward semblance.

With Protestants in general and with Protestant ministers in particular, we may fraternize as friends. We may entertain genuine admiration for their culture. We may sympathize with the nobility of their aims, but we know them to be in error, teaching, unwittingly but none the less really, only a fragmentary version of Christ's doctrine. We cannot be tolerant of error. The evidence of the known truth puts us under stern compulsion. In spite of our desire that there may be one fold under one shepherd, we cannot compromise. As we cannot contribute to the building of Protestant churches, so we cannot set our approval on Protestant propaganda, for in both cases we should be cooperating with error and pulling down Christ's work. It is not easy to say to the invitations of our non-Catholic friends, the classic Non possumus, but we must say it, however hard it is. The sacrifices Catholics made under Nero and Elizabeth, the sacrifices made by them in France at the time of the Associations Law, have their counterpart in the life, to compare small things with great, of every Catholic. When there is question of our loyalty to Christ there must be no half-measures. He who is not with Him, is against Him. Non-Catholics may not understand our attitude, but at least they must do us the justice to acknowledge that we have the courage of our convictions. For those who would curry human favor at the expense of principle no one can have anything but contempt.

American Aid to Mexican Theft

EBER COLE BYAM

THE American public has been so thoroughly saturated with socialistic twaddle for the past two decades that any radical ranter can make himself understood by a few curt phrases.

The First Chief in charge of the executive power of the Mexican nation issues a few odd billion pesetas in paper money, the unfortunate possessor of it finds it of no value. Carranza darkly hints that "powerful interests" are in a conspiracy to depreciate the worth of his plentiful currency, and his meaning is perfectly clear. If the First Chief's bandit-labor-union officials make impossible the operation of all industries, he gravely explains that "powerful interests" are mysteriously responsible; and again he is understood. If his inspired efforts to lead the Mexican masses into the dark ways of Socialism meet with indifferent success, he finds quick comprehension, both in the United States and Mexico, when he complains of "powerful interests."

Therefore, when Alvarado and his criminal crew find the nefarious operations of their hemp monopoly assailed, they cry out against "powerful interests," and they, too, find quick and sympathetic understanding. Having driven the clergy from the country; having turned the churches into warehouses and I. W. W. meeting-places; having outlawed religion and established an atheistic tyranny in Yucatan, Alvarado has found that, in spite of his efforts to smother the truth, some of his villainies have become known in the United States. The great "graft" on the hemp monopoly is one of these, and the attacks upon it in the United States have compelled him and his agents to spend large sums in a propaganda of misrepresentation through the medium of special articles written by numerous American magazine and newspaper writers whose socialistic sympathies make their task one in peculiar accord with their preconceived opinions and prejudices.

The Mexican revolutionists realized from the first that it was absolutely necessary to secure American sympathy for their enterprise, otherwise they could not succeed. To that end they began in the American press a campaign of propaganda which is without equal for extent and falsity. In this campaign they were mightily assisted both by the socialistic sympathies of American newspaper writers and by the unquenchable thirst of the newspaper-educated American people for the spectacular, in place of the truthful.

As a further contribution to this accumulation of misrepresentation there was recently published a full-page advertisement in a certain New York paper whose columns have been strangely open to anti-Catholic and pro-bandit Mexican propaganda and hermetically sealed to the truth. Behind this advertisement stands the vicious hemp monopoly, and behind the hemp monopoly the bloody Alvarado and his buccaneers who are inflicting hardship on the American farmer, by the aid of Americans.

However bloodthirsty he may be, Alvarado is to be congratulated upon having secured control of the tightest real monopoly in existence. Sisal hemp, or henequen, is the one fiber that is best adapted to the making of binder twine and the machinery in which it is used has been designed with special reference to it. Therefore, other fibers are not to be considered, and, moreover, are much more expensive to produce. The writer of the advertisement compares the price of the sisal, manila hemp and cotton yarn, in the effort to prove that sisal is low in price. He should have quoted silk prices and thus made a comparison much more to his advantage.

This hemp monopoly became, some time since, the subject of a Congressional investigation and the socialistic sympathies of the Congressmen concerned were shown by their frantic efforts to shift the investigation from Alvarado to the manufacturers of binding twine in the United States. Their discoveries in this line were altogether disappointing, and they hastened to smother the investigation with a swarm of witnesses whose testimony referred to everything and anything but hemp. Alvarado sent a crowd of planters from Yucatan and these unfortunates were under the grim necessity of giving the perjured testimony for which their families and their properties were being held as hostages. The whole affair resulted in a farce, which had been the intention from the beginning, and Alvarado continued his tyranny and the propagandists their lies as before.

As long as the sisal planter was free to market his crop the price varied according to the market conditions. That it could be produced at a cost of about one and one-quarter cents per pound, or two and a half centavos, and that an acre will produce at least one thousand pounds in a year, were additional factors controlling the planter in his willingness to sell his crop.

When the Yucatan planters organized their association for the marketing of their hemp, Mexico had heard little of Carranza and, fortunately, less of Alvarado. Yucatan had passed through the flurry of the Madero revolution, had recovered its grip on the decencies of life and looked hopefully into the future. The average price of sisal during this period was about six cents a pound and the planters were satisfied and prosperous. Then came the American occupation of Vera Cruz and the coincident destruction of all law and order in Mexico with Carranza enthroned upon the ruins. Following that, Carranza at once sent Alvarado to overthrow the Government in Yucatan.

Alvarado is a product of the lawless North, and an ardent I. W. W. Socialist of the most violent sort. His advent into Yucatan was marked by wholesale confiscation of property, robbery and outrage. His vile subordinates, of like origin with himself, committed loathsome crimes, unspeakable and without number, and no opportunity was overlooked to persecute the unhappy people whose accumulations by thrift and industry, and whose steadfast adherence to their religion, marked them as certain victims of robbery, murder and outrage. In these ruins of his making, Alvarado found the planters' organization for marketing hemp and some imp suggested to him the possibility of its use.

The control of the railroads in Yucatan gives Alvarado command of the entire hemp crop. If the planter "disobeys" the tyrannous decrees of Alvarado, he is "eliminated," and as the planters have a peculiar regard for their lives, their families and their property, they simply do as Alvarado orders. The association for marketing the hemp thus becomes impersonated in Alvarado with some planter figureheads as "directors."

The advertisement under stricture declared: "After deducting the expenses of operation, Federal and State taxes, cost of transportation and warehouse charges, the remainder of the proceeds of sale is divided among the farmers at the end of each commercial year."

"The remainder!" So far Alvarado has done his best to prevent any such contingency as a remainder and when he learns that some money has found its way into a planter's pocket, a little "direct action" solves the problem. The occasional hanging of a planter is a powerful stimulus to this end.

He boasts that his laborers work only eight hours a day and but five days a week. What a paradise for I. W. W. Socialist labor unions Yucatan is destined to become, for eventually the laborers will not have to work at all and doubtless the hated "powerful interests" will be compelled to support them. However, the joke is that these laborers never did work more than eight hours a day, usually about six, and five days a week were about their limit. Their earnings on that basis were all that they cared for.

We are told too in big letters that: "Peonage has been abolished, and the field laborer is now a free man and must be paid living wages. Instead of working for a pittance, as they did prior to the present revolutionary reforms, the laborers receive from $1.50 to $3.00 (American gold) per day."

The truth is that "peonage," in the sense intended, was practically unknown in Yucatan. The "$1.50 to $3.00 (American gold) per day" may be the rate, but if the laborer really receives this rate, he quits work when he has earned the amount received before the revolution. It is a well-known fact that, in the event of an increase in wages, the Mexican quits work for the day as soon as he has earned the wage he had been accustomed to receive.

That "the cost of production of sisal hemp in Yucatan has more than doubled in the past eighteen months," is quite within the bounds of possibility, but that it is due to the "admirable social reforms inaugurated by Governor Alvarado's administration," none but the gullible will believe. Rather it has doubled because of the demoralization of all government and industry in Yucatan through Alvarado's murderous and wholly vicious Socialism. If the cost of production has doubled it must now be two and a half cents per pound instead of one and one-quarter. An amusing element of the Congressional investigation was that Alvarado's "witnesses" testified that the cost of production was greater than the amount they had been receiving for their hemp for a long period of years. But the writer of this high-priced advertisement in the New York paper proves too much. He says: "In 1916 Yucatan received approximately $40,000,000 for her entire crop of sisal fiber. Every cent of that sum, with the exception of approximately $1,000,000, remained in the United States."

This statement is doubtless true and it means that for the approximately 400,000,000 pounds of hemp produced in 1916, Alvarado allowed the planters one-quarter of a cent per pound! To have paid the wages claimed, of $1.50 to $3.00 American gold per day, the labor cost would have been some two cents per pound, or eight times the sum allowed the planters. As the laborers must be paid in cash, otherwise they are "peons," there should have been sent to Yucatan not $1,000,000 but $8,000,000 for labor charges alone.

Besides being a defense of Socialism and Alvarado the New York daily attempts to justify the arbitrary increase of the price of sisal, on the ground that the American farmers have received more for their wheat, and, therefore, should be compelled to divide with the hemp planters. If the hemp planters stood the ghost of a chance of ever receiving this increase, the American people might very well remain content. It is not the amount of increased price that is at issue; it is that this increase is wholly a "squeeze" absorbed by Alvarado and the crew that make up his court. These have appropriated not only the increase but much more, as their own figures show. The planters and laborers have been compelled to accept as compensation a paper currency whose value is hardly that of the cost of printing it.

The middleman, about whose elimination they so glibly prattle, received a fraction of a cent a pound for his services. In his place stands the hemp monopoly which, in place of the middleman's fraction of a cent a pound, now exacts a tribute of some sixteen cents per pound; a contemplated barefaced steal, in 1917, from the hemp planters and the American farmers, of some $60,000,000. Here we have the source of that flood of Mexican Socialist propaganda with which the American reading-public is being deluged. The facts are that Alvarado and his socialistic American aids, who are really his brains, have appropriated for themselves the $39,000,000, less the sums paid for this propaganda, and the amount due First Chief Carranza. This graft will be found deposited to their discredit in American banks.

In all this we see a conclusive example of applied Socialism. With the destruction of all protection to life and property, following the American occupation of Vera Cruz, we find the I. W. W. Socialist-labor-union officials in possession of the machinery of government in Mexico, where the robberies are limited only by the property possessions of their victims. The Mexican revolution has been and still is a wild nightmare of vile lust, murder and robbery. It has outlawed religion and made crime a virtue. Because the Church stands as the one great bulwark against the destruction of all morals by Socialism, it has been made the special object of attack. That is why the clergy have been driven from Mexico and the churches closed to the Faithful.

On "Going to Rome"

FLOYD KEELER

SOMETHING has evidently happened to disturb the editorial calm of the Living Church, the High-Church organ of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and it has brought forth a "leader" under the above title. The editor tries to make light of the "Rome-ward" tendency of so many of his brethren by formulating a "law of average" which he claims to have discovered. This law requires that the number of the clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church "who go each year to Rome shall be two." The writer used to accept this oft-repeated "law" as an undisputed fact, but since his own "secession" he has been inclined to think that it is not so unchallengeable as the editor of the Living Church assumes. The editor frankly admits that nearly ten years ago this law of average received a hard jolt, when almost two-score ministers embraced Catholicism. Humorously enough, however, he does not appreciate the fact that, if his law were true, none at all would have been received all the years since. But as a matter of fact, at least two have come into the Church every year. In the year 1916, instead of two, there were five of whom the writer is certain, not including two others whose rumored reception he has been unable to verify up to the present time. Can it be possible that this editorial is an acknowledgement that pretty soon the "average" will have to be raised and that the editor wishes to say a last word while he decently can, thus encouraging others who are "on the fence" to hold back? It really seems that way.

But while he tries not to complain over the fact that some "go to Rome" he does try to belittle their motives. This he does first of all by making some unfavorable comparisons between Cardinal Newman and some others. He says: "The example of John Henry Newman who retired from his Anglican charge and spent several years in quiet retirement and study before taking the momentous step, is not often followed today: but then, not many men of John Henry Newman's caliber take that step nowadays." No, nor do many men of John Henry Newman, caliber remain behind either, for they are scarce in Anglicanism nowadays. The editor forgets too, that because Cardinal Newman took those years to work out the problem so thoroughly, we, his followers, do not have to spend our time blazing a trail, but can follow and thus find the way more easily and rapidly than he. This at least was the experience of the writer who spent some three months in prayerful study, not officiating as a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, before he "took the step." And although he was not altogether aware of the greatness of his debt to Newman even then, he has found himself in very complete agreement with him since.

Then too, Anglicanism in the early days of the Oxford Movement had not developed either its present external likeness to Catholicism nor were the doctrines of "Rome" so widely held among Anglicans as they are now. Many of us are scarcely aware of a change of doctrine at all in our new allegiance. Nearly four years before his own change the writer preached to his people the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception and for over two years had held to the necessity of Papal Infallibility and had discussed it with one of the leading laymen of his congregation who held to it also. Some have been known to occupy this position for a decade or more without discovering its incongruity, and to do it in all honesty. It may be difficult to understand the conduct of the hypothetical Protestant Episcopal clergyman who so "unhesitatingly" officiates at his altar on Sunday and on Thursday is received into the Fold of Peter, but God does sometimes bring enlightenment to a soul with great suddenness, and blessed is he who is "not disobedient to the heavenly vision."

One point that always seems to rankle in the Protestant Episcopal mind is that the Catholic Church does not take them and their sacraments as seriously as they could wish, hence the allusion to "blasphemous rites" in connection with the converts' sacramental experiences in the Catholic Church. But why? Rome accepts any valid Baptism, but she takes no chances and she knows that great carelessness exists even among Episcopalians, especially in the case of those conforming "sectarian" ministers who frequently are allowed to exercise their ministry within the Protestant Episcopal fold without one word of instruction as to the method of administering the Sacraments. The Catholic Church will not risk the salvation of a soul nor do the souls who seek her shelter want to run any risks. If, however, anyone can produce sufficient evidence of his Baptism not even the conditional form is administered. Many converts are received in this way.

The reasons alleged by the three ministers whose "home-coming" is criticized in the Living Church were probably not the primary reasons for their step but merely symptoms, as it were, things which may have caused the final break, the last straw only. The writer has given explanations of his change to many of his friends and to no two inquiries has he expressed himself in exactly the same terms. So many and different considerations entered into his conversion that it would be well-nigh impossible in a short letter to give them all. Some such conditions probably obtain with those whom the editor cites. Likely he who was offended at the circular from the "Federal Council of Churches" was not so much struck by the fact that he was permitting it to "determine his ecclesiastical status," as he was by the fact that his church, which he had probably thought was "Catholic," had been so Protestant in her attitude, that the poor deluded "Federal Council" could not tell the difference and had ignorantly supposed that he was a Protestant. This finally determined him to render such a mistake impossible in the future.

The editor tells us it "is not the primary issues that send men to Rome," but surely he who was distressed by the lack of jurisdiction in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States was dealing with a "primary issue." Nor is it likely that that convert would so glibly admit, as the editor seems to suppose, that "Rome lacks jurisdiction in England," for his step was doubtless precipitated by the fact that he had learned the important truth that Rome, that is, the Papacy, possesses all jurisdiction whether in the United States, England or Timbuctoo, and that, if he were to remain in good faith, he must submit to lawful authority at any cost.

As for the convert who saw in the General Convention's failure to enact a marriage and divorce canon consonant with Catholic practice, a failure to uphold the Catholic attitude, was he not right? This again was a symptom, not the whole disease, but, as symptoms serve as warnings and as bases for a diagnosis, so this clergyman saw in this symptom a warning to him and he took it. But suppose for the sake of the argument, though it would be difficult to prove the statement, that "Rome has more scandals in practice under her law" than the Protestant Episcopal Church has under hers. Is it not better to have a law comformable to God's Word than not to have it, even if it is broken sometimes? To prevent some lapses from the law is possible only by having no law at all. South Carolina probably has more "scandals" in this direction than Nevada, but which one has the better attitude toward the evil of divorce?

Yes, we who have "gone to Rome" knew that "some things are still unshakeable" and that "among these are, God, eternity, souls." And because we hope to spend eternity with God we could not remain in a position which required us to compromise our principles, to deny the authority of the one true Church and to call ourselves "priests" when at least we were far from being sure of it. As to the souls who had been placed in our care by "one who looked like a bishop and purported to be a bishop" it might make a difference whether he really were one or no, and in so far as those souls were accustomed "to be guided by [our] counsel," did not honesty demand that we cease to lead them in ways that we now know to be devious and to lead them "into all truth" if they still desired our leadership and at all costs to push on ourselves whether they would follow or not? Rome offers no "Nirvana," it is far from being "a place where there are no spiritual battles to fight," but our fight has been changed from the chaotic battle of a headless mob to the ordered campaign of a disciplined army.

Let no one be deceived: the "average" is getting well over two a year. It is this that excites the Living Church. But the tide has set in and it cannot be stayed, until it flows at the foot of the Rock and brings its precious freight to the safety of that protection. Many of us have exchanged dignity and honor and ease for hardships, poverty and obscurity, but would we go back? The very heavens reverberate with our answer, an emphatic "No!"

A League to Enforce Peace

CHARLES G. FENWICK, PH.D.

ONE of the most striking effects of the present war on the moral and intellectual life of neutral nations has been the development of proposals for a new basis of international relations upon which the future peace of the world may be built. The complex bonds of commerce and finance, of cooperation in science and of fellowship in letters, which existed between the present belligerents before the war and which it was fondly hoped by pacifists would prevent the catastrophe that has come about, have been shown to be too weak to restrain the forces of disruption. In place of these bonds it is now proposed to set over the nations some higher authority which will secure for them the law and order that courts and police secure to the individual State.

What is the nature of this proposed authority and what hope is there of its effectiveness for the task assigned it? To state it in its simplest terms, the proposal is to give to international law, which has hitherto been dependent largely upon public opinion for observance, a new and effective sanction similar to that possessed by the municipal law of each State. International law may be said to consist of those generally accepted rules of conduct which nations have come to consider binding upon themselves, and have observed in their usual practice. These rules deal on the one hand with the rights and duties of nations in their ordinary intercourse, and on the other hand with the means which may be adopted for the settlement of a conflict of rights or duties between two or more of them.

In the former respect it can be said that the rules of international law are fairly definite, though in need of amendment, and are as faithfully observed as is the municipal law of the State. But in respect to procedure for the settlement of differences, international law is seriously deficient. Arbitration is, indeed, not unknown as a means of adjusting disputes, and adequate provision was made at the First Hague Conference to facilitate recourse to it; but there is no power to compel the nations to submit their disputes to arbitration and no power to enforce obedience to the decision of the arbitral court, when rendered. It is in this respect that it is now proposed to make international law true law by creating an executive arm which shall make arbitration a compulsory instead of a voluntary procedure. Just what is to be the jurisdiction of the new international court and what the force to be put behind its decisions is still a subject of discussion. But before examining the details of the various schemes proposed it may be well to consider somewhat carefully the legal foundations upon which the present relations of nations have been built; for these foundations, if they be not those upon which the new structure is to be erected, can at least in their strength and their weakness offer an argument as to the possibilities of success of a radically new plan.

The year 1648 is commonly set as the beginning of the modern period of international relations. Prior to the Treaty of Westphalia the States of Europe lived under traditions inherited from the Holy Roman Empire, though in some respects the influence of that magical name had ceased, several centuries before, to exercise any actual restraint. The Holy Roman Empire, created when Charlemagne was crowned at Rome by Pope Leo III in 800, A.D., was to be the successor of the Roman Empire that had given way before the barbarian invasions. It hoped to create a unity closer than ancient Rome had been able to attain, because it brought into action the bond of a common religion to support the political bond of a central empire. It represented, therefore, a union of separate States based upon the personal allegiance of feudal princes to the elected emperor and cemented firmly by the ideal of a united Christendom personified in the Pope. It offered, as it seemed, the true solution of international wars and rivalries and the hope of national progress in a federal empire in which the individual States were at once independent and sovereign in their own realm and yet dependent and subordinate in their acknowledgment of the unifying authority of emperor and pope. But never was a brighter dream doomed to a sadder disillusionment. Dynastic struggles between the princes of the empire, the conflicting claims of heirs to innumerable dukedoms, the contest between pope and emperor over the dividing line between spiritual and temporal authority, little by little loosened the bonds of union; and when the religious revolt of the sixteenth century came, the last cords were snapped. Europe was left in a state of anarchy in which each nation's hand was against its neighbor.

The way out of this anarchy was found in the establishment of an international system based upon the legal equality of the States of Europe and their complete independence of one another in political and religious matters. The Treaty of Westphalia which brought the Thirty Years War to a close proclaimed the principle of the territorial sovereignty of individual States as against the World Empire of Charlemagne and his successors. But though the bond of feudal loyalty and of spiritual obedience had been broken, forces were at work to create a new law in its place.

The character of this law had been slowly taking shape in the minds of the civil and canon lawyers of the century preceding the Treaty of Westphalia, as if in anticipation of it. In a classic passage of his treatise, "De Legibus et Deo Legislatore," published in 1612, Francis Suarez, professor of theology at the Jesuit college of Coimbra, laid stress upon the fact that the States of the world, although independent in their national life, were nevertheless members of the human race and as such subject to a law of conduct based chiefly upon natural reason but also upon international custom. Thirteen years later Hugo Grotius published his famous treatise "De Jure Belli et Pacis," in which for the first time is set forth a fairly consistent system of international law.

Grotius follows the canonists in making the natural law the basis of his system. This "natural law" he defines as "the dictate of right reason which points out that a given act, by reason of its opposition to or conformity with man's rational nature, is either morally wrong or morally necessary, and accordingly forbidden or commanded by God, the author of nature." It lays its obligation upon nations as upon individuals, so that when applied to international relations it gives rise to a series of moral rules which are binding upon nations independently of their individual consent to be governed by them. It is true that Grotius recognizes a law of nations based upon their voluntary consent as expressed in usage and custom, but the natural law is to him the fundamental and essential law of nations and its authority cannot be contravened by the practices of nations when they run counter to it. Such is the new system of law with which the modern period of international relations begins. There is no central authority dominating the political and moral life of Europe. But there is, nevertheless, a law of nations to which each State, whether great or small, owes obedience by the very principle of its moral being.

After the death of Grotius the development of international law proceeded along three fairly distinct lines. One school of writers led by Puffendorf discarded the usages of nations as a source of international law and emphasized the law of nature as the sole source. Another school, known as the Grotian school, of which Wolff and Vattel are the chief representatives, follows Grotius in elaborating a law partly theoretical, as based upon the law of nature, and partly concrete, as based upon the actual customs of nations. A third school is chiefly concerned with stating the rules of conduct which may be regarded as accepted by nations from the fact of their regular observance of them. It occupies itself, therefore, with searching the records of international practice in much the same way as a lawyer resorts to case books for precedents, not being concerned for the moment with the question whether the rule of practice conforms in every case with the principles of abstract justice.

What, then, is the present state of international law? In the three hundred years since the publication of Grotius' treatise it has become more and more definite and precise; it has elaborated rules of conduct which in many respects bear a close analogy to the municipal law operating within the individual State; it recognizes the legal equality of the members of the family of nations, their independence within their own boundaries, their rights of self-defense, their control over persons and property within the State, their jurisdiction over vessels on the high seas, the validity of naturalization, the sacredness of the ambassadorial character and numerous other mutual rights and duties.

Unlike municipal law, however, it has no international legislative body to amend and develop the law, it has no permanent judicial body to interpret and apply the law in cases of conflicting claims, and it has no executive body to enforce law and order within the international community. It is true that in some respects the lack of an international legislature and an international court has been to a certain extent supplied. The Peace Conferences which met at the Hague in 1899 and 1907 acted the part of a legislative body, notwithstanding the fact that the conventions adopted by them had to be submitted to the individual States for ratification. But the legislative scope of the Conferences was extremely limited and their entire labors were taken up, not with expanding and defining the law of peace, but with providing for arbitration and in large part with regulating the conduct of war.

At the Conference of 1899, the so-called Permanent Court of Arbitration was established, but the institution is more impressive in name than in fact, for it consists merely of a list of judges from which the parties to a dispute may select arbitrators to try their special case, and there is no element of permanence in the composition of the court which might give continuity to its decisions. But the most serious weakness of international law is its lack of an executive body. There is no power, as has been said above, to compel the parties to a dispute to bring their case before a court and no supra-national force to compel obedience to the award rendered.

These are the legal foundations upon which the present international system has been built and upon which in all probability any new developments of international relations must rest; though it is not impossible that more or less revolutionary changes may be brought about as a result of the present war.

A Modern "Grand Seigneur"

B. DE COURSON

SELDOM did a man unite such varied natural gifts as the Marquis de Vogüé, whose recent death deprived his country of an eminent servant and the French Red Cross, in particular, of a chief whose great age—he was eighty-seven—did not hamper his action as a leader. In appearance the Marquis de Vogüé was a typical grand seigneur. Tall and straight, even to the last, he looked every inch a chief. He was refined in speech, gravely courteous in manner, large-minded and large-hearted, and, although faithful to many traditions of the past, keenly alive to the necessities of the present.

The Marquis was also a many-sided man and his notable mental gifts found employment in different branches; his birth and fortune, far from encouraging a life of leisure, were in his eyes spurs to action, and his activity spent itself to the very last in the service of all the great interests that had always filled his thoughts and his time.

Of an old provincial family of Central France, the Marquis de Vogüé was deeply attached to the mountainous region of Le Vivarais, where for nine centuries past, the Vogüés have had their house. It is typical of his dislike of vulgar publicity that, having written the history of the past Vogüés, he stopped when he came to his own father "because," he said, "I should then be obliged to write about myself." There was a certain reserve about him, that has become rare in these self-advertising days and that, like his studied courtesy and careful speech, had an old-fashioned charm.

He began life as a diplomat in 1849 and his first post was St. Petersburg, but, in 1852, the accession of Napoleon III put an end to his diplomatic career. He was then young, wealthy and absolutely free, and he yielded to his strong attraction towards the archeology of the East. The Holy Places of Palestine inspired him with a passionate interest, and the result of his prolonged and profound studies was an important work, on the "Churches of the Holy Land," in which he started and developed the theory that the Crusaders brought to the East, noble traditions of western art: but the conquest of Palestine by the Mussulmans hopelessly ruined the cities where these traditions had taken root and flourished. In 1911, three years before the war, M. de Vogüé revisited Jerusalem and on the spot where he had, as a young man, learnt to love the ancient history of the East, he was able to add to and to rectify certain points in his former discoveries. Distinguished as an archeologist, the Marquis de Vogüé was eminent as a historian and possessed the qualifications of a first-rate student of history: clearness and strength of expression, rectitude and independence of judgment.

For many centuries, the Vogüés had actively served their country; they loved, it was said, "God, the King, the soil and war" and it is curious to trace the "call of the blood," in the Marquis de Vogüés remarkable personality. The military spirit of his race breaks out in certain passages of his writings and it dominated his attitude as president of the Red Cross. But this student and scholar was also the descendant of generations of country gentlemen. It was in keeping with the traditions he had inherited from them that the Marquis de Vogüé was keenly interested in agricultural questions. His historical works opened before him, in 1902, the doors of the French Academy and his competence in all questions connected with agriculture caused him to be chosen as President of the Agriculturalists of France, a post that he filled during many years.

He united much practical sense to wide general views, was keenly alive to the improvements that are the logical result of scientific discoveries, and at the same time, respectful of the lessons that are handed down from one generation to another and that it would be presumptuous to reject, simply because of their origin.

Speaking of his own father, the Marquis once wrote: "He was open to the lessons of experience and knew how to adapt the traditions of the past to the conditions of modern life." The words, carefully chosen and full of meaning, might be applied with equal truth, to the Marquis, lately deceased; they well describe the attitude of a grand seigneur, the descendant of an ancient race, who, while keeping faithful to all the best traditions of the past, is sufficiently alive to modern transformations, to adopt those that can serve the cause of right, justice, science and humanity. It is this attitude that, in democratic and revolutionary France, gave the Marquis de Vogüé a unique position and made his rare and manifold gifts of such use to his country. These gifts were crowned and vivified by sincere religious faith; M. de Vogüé practised his religion, as he did all things, without timidity and without ostentation. There was nothing of the invertebrate Catholic about this nobleman.

The last work of his life, was the Red Cross. In August 1914, when his sons and grandsons, faithful to the examples of their fighting ancestors, enthusiastically took up their post at the front, the Marquis de Vogüé started a campaign, where he spent himself unstintingly. As president of the three branches of the French Red Cross, he had to face a stupendous task, and to the last he continued, in spite of his age, to be a real, not an honorary president. His safe judgment, his tact and moral prestige, made him an invaluable leader, who, inside and outside France, enjoyed universal consideration.

The example of the Marquis de Vogüé is one that the French men of his class will do well to meditate. In a country like France, democratic in its government, revolutionary in its tendencies, their position is by no means an easy one. They are kept out of politics because their name and traditions inspire jealousy and suspicions; their own prejudices have in certain cases prevented them from taking up careers that demand hard work. M. de Vogüé, whose ideas on this vital subject directed his own life, was a warm advocate of labor under every form. He believed that the "law of labor" is an obligation that even wealthy and nobly born citizens ought never to evade, that no man has a right to remain a stranger to questions that interest the country, its history, art and industry.

He believed that the men who have sprung from ancient races going far back into French history, have the duty "to throw themselves into the fray, their heads high and their hearts brave." The new conditions of modern France may sometimes irritate and wound them, but the law of labor binds them as it does others, and the past history of their families qualifies them to play a useful part in the destinies of France. Going into detail, this grand seigneur, whose own life was a life of labor, urged the young men of his class to take part in the social, industrial and intellectual movement of the day; keeping faithful to the traditions of honor and generosity that are in their blood, but making it their bounden duty to participate in some "honest and useful labor." This, by increasing their influence and developing their personality, will enable them to serve France; not as their ancestors served her under the ancient monarchy, but as usefully in other ways. The Marquis de Vogüé was qualified to preach what he practised and of him it may be said that, during more than seventy years, his spoken and written words and his line of action were in perfect harmony. No Catholic gentleman of our day could have a nobler epitaph than that.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Catholic Publications in Latin America

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you kindly send me a list of the Catholic papers and periodicals published in Mexico and South America? If you would, I should esteem it a great favor, as I am anxious to become familiar with Catholic thought in countries about which non-Catholics have so much to say that is unfavorable.

Montreal. R. P. JASMIN.

[As the list we prepared for our correspondent from data furnished by the Revista Catolica will be of interest to the readers of AMERICA, we publish it herewith. Regarding the letters following the name of each publication (W) means weekly, (M) means monthly, (F) means every fifteen days, (TW) means twice a week, and (D) means daily.

The Advent of War

AT last our country is at war. For many months dark clouds have lowered over the land, and despite the hopes and prayers of a host of people, the storm has finally broken. Needless to say it finds the nation calm in the assurance of right. War is not our choice: strife has been thrust upon us by repeated and wanton violations of our rights. For a long time the American people bore these outrages with a patience that was heroic, and when at last they spoke through their Chief Executive, their message was a calm, noble document inspired by an elemental and honorable desire for justice. The nation is not seeking power or territory, but only the right to pursue its legitimate avocations without let or hindrance from a foreign government. Less could scarcely be demanded, and the country is determined to fight for it with all its strength and resources.

There is no fear that in this crisis American Catholics will be slack in their duty to their country. To imply or suspect for a moment that they are disloyal or pusillanimous would be an act of downright folly, made doubly absurd by the record scored by their fellows in the Faith in every war and act of war from the Revolution to the fateful expedition to Vera Cruz. Catholic soldiers and sailors are as ready to fight and die for the flag as are their Protestant companions in arms. The former need no exhortation to show their love of the United States. They know their duty and will do it bravely. Our hopes will be with them and their companions, our prayers will follow them, until flushed with the joy of victory, they bring our banner home in honor.

But our fighting men are not the only ones who are at war; the whole nation is at war; both those who fight and those who remain at home, and both have stern obligations to meet. War-time is full of fears and sorrows and hardships of all kinds. And if those who are not under arms mean to do their duty also, they must be patient, self-sacrificing and charitable to all, especially to those of German birth, or ancestry, who make up a host of our fellow-citizens and who, with very few exceptions, are as loyal and true as any who have sworn allegiance to our flag.

For the rest, no Catholic should forget that God holds our beloved nation in the hollow of His hand and that He is ready to listen to our prayers for safety and peace. A people who live by faith, we should turn humbly towards Him, and beg that He may hasten the return of a just and honorable peace.

Russia and an Imprisoned Archbishop

IT was inevitable that in a country so devoted to democratic ideals as the United States the change of political complexion in Russia should have received an enthusiastic welcome. But over and beyond the sympathy of this nation with Russia on its emergence from a state of stern oppression, a sympathy which is common to all our citizens alike, there is a feeling of joy among Catholics. Our coreligionists in Russia have long been subjected to persecution, and in the new régime it is confidently hoped that the Church may be accorded that liberty to minister to the wants of her subjects for which she has been sighing in vain for so many weary years.

If the new Government in Russia is to command the respect of the world it must grant to its people not merely civil independence but the right to embrace and propagate the true religion. To deny to the members of the Catholic Church full liberty to follow the dictates of conscience is an infringement of their essential rights. In a country like Russia, where for the present religious unity is impossible, neutrality towards various beliefs may be the most that can be expected of the civil authority; but this is also the least that can be expected. Russia being what it is, the representatives of the State are not under an official obligation to show special favor to Catholicism, but they have a strict duty to see that it shall not be oppressed and that its members shall not be deprived of freedom because of their peaceful religious profession. The intolerant policy of the previous Government in Russia should not be continued.

It will be remembered that during the temporary occupation of Galicia by the Russian army of invasion, the eminent and saintly Catholic Archbishop, Count Andrew Sheptycki, the head of the Ruthenian Church, was arrested for no other reason than his devotion to his priestly duties and his unflagging efforts to make the Catholics under his jurisdiction live in accord with Gospel principles. Since that time he has been detained in Russian prisons and subjected to cruel sufferings. His incarceration, which was a blot on the old régime, should be terminated without delay.

The present Russian Government would give a signal proof of its acceptance of democratic ideals and of its appreciation of the principles of true liberty, if it would hasten to repair the crime committed by the old autocracy, and restore the Archbishop to freedom. The perpetuation of this wrong would indicate either that the new régime is still alien to the fundamental requirements of true democracy or that it has not the courage of its convictions. In the United States the imprisonment of a prelate for the performance of his sacerdotal functions would be simply unthinkable. The same liberty should obtain in Russia, if that country is to take its place among the great democracies of the world.

Boston and Marquette

ON days when the east wind is not blowing Boston is a very charming place, provided, of course, the chilly breeze is not replaced by an after-dinner speech. Sometimes this substitution takes place, to the annoyance of the average Bostonian, but to the gayety of the nation.

There was such a speech last week, and history and religion are the richer for it. The Rev. Dr. Bradley, a Congregationalist minister, told sated diners that

> The God of the Jews, from whom we borrowed our religion, is as manifest in our republic as he ever was in their theocracy. In the days of Marquette, God saved us from the religion of the Jesuits. Steeling the hearts of English heroes and aiming the arrows of the Iroquois, he freed this country from the reign of Richelieu, the Bourbons and Loyola.

That paragraph is altogether perfect. Firstly, it is historical, because during the lifetime of Marquette God neither steeled the hearts of the British nor aimed the arrows of the Iroquois. Of course, this animadversion is not meant to imply that the Lord did these things after the death of the missioner; the devil was alive even then. Secondly, the paragraph is a splendid illustration of that Christian charity which rejoices in the bloody deeds of savages. Thirdly, it is most opportune in that it gives a chance for a comparison between the spirit of Marquette and the religious conditions which are our heritage from British hearts and Iroquois arrows. There are in this country over 50,000,000 unbaptized people; the stability of the marriage bond is illustrated by the fact that a stalwart Protestant has just divorced, unrebuked, his seventh wife, herself a divorced woman, thus adding one more social infamy to a catalogue which is a disgrace to civilization; the race from which Dr. Bradley sprang has lost its legs and hair and teeth through crimes against nature and—but why go on? We are all patriots. On the other hand, the spirit of which British hearts and Iroquois arrows deprived the country is described in these words by a creditable historian:

> They [his companions] drew near to him [Marquette] and he embraced them, while they burst into tears at his feet. Then he asked for holy water and his reliquary; and having himself removed his crucifix, which he carried always suspended round his neck, he placed it in the hands of one of his companions, begging him to hold it before his eyes. Then, feeling that he had but a short time to live, he made a last effort, clasped his hands, and, with a steady and fond look upon his crucifix, he uttered aloud his profession of faith, and gave thanks to the Divine Majesty for the great favor which he had accorded him of dying in the Society, of dying in it as a missionary of Jesus Christ, and, above all, of dying in it, as he had always prayed, in a wretched cabin in the midst of the forests and bereft of all human succor. After that he was silent, communing within himself with God. Nevertheless, he let escape from time to time these words, Sustinuit anima mea in verbo ejus; or these, Mater Dei, memento mei—which were the last words that he uttered before entering his agony, which was, however, very mild and peaceful.

This is not written to discourage Dr. Bradley; New England needs humor even more than it needs Puritan children.

The Lure of the Unintelligible

ONCE upon a time a journalist, being in a merry mood, wrote so exceedingly "high-brow" a poem that it was quite unintelligible to everybody, including the author himself. "It bore the ambitious title 'The Cry of the Ages,'" he avers "and meant nothing whatever." Nevertheless a magazine editor who knew "what the public wanted," eagerly accepted the obscure poem and published it. Letters of congratulation for the humdrum journalist's "wonderfully sympathetic poem" then began to pour in and a publisher tried to secure from him enough verses like "The Cry of the Ages" to make a volume.

This journalist's amusing experience could no doubt be matched by that of many of today's ambidextrous authors who write unlimited quantities of prose with one hand and numberless lines of verse with the other, and half the time know not what they do or what they mean. Nevertheless their foggy lucubrations seem to find a ready market with the editors of certain magazines, and their volumes cover the book-tables in our department stores. "The particular person" is told in the strictest confidence, for example, that

> On this New Thought table are those sweet little books of Ralph Waldo Trine's that all the world still seems to be a-seeking The "dear" lady says she dare not be without them. There is a popular work on "Concentration" by Dr. Julia Seton at only 44 cents, and a big volume called "Life Understood," by J. L. Rawson, which seems to take a place in England almost approaching that of Mrs. Eddy's famous volume here. By the way, it was good to see the latest work of Dr. Charles Brodie Paterson, one of the most spiritual of personalities in this city. "The Rhythm of Life," his new book, deals with that subject so much in the popular thought of today—the relationship of color and music to the states of body and mind.

The old Latin saw, "Omne ignotum pro magnifico," seems to be the simplest explanation of the vogue enjoyed by the authors of such "poems" as "The Cry of the Ages" and of such books as the foregoing. For the half-educated persons who affect a fondness for verse and prose of the kind described are ridiculously eager to be considered "intellectual" and are firmly persuaded that what neither they, nor the authors in question, or anyone else can possibly understand must for that reason be very profound indeed. And of course these "serious thinkers" are too vain to confess that all this solemn nonsense they devour is quite unintelligible to them.

Not Politics: Souls

"THE Catholic Church and her priesthood are constantly meddling in politics; their one end is to control the State." Of all the objections brought against us by our enemies, this, perhaps, is the most commonly heard. It is a difficult task even with the best of arguments to persuade them that the charge has no foundation in fact, or to convince them that the Catholic Church has but one end, the conversion and the sanctification of the individual soul and the extension of the Kingdom of Christ throughout the world.

The principles of any Church can be easily found in the authorized doctrines of its ministers, preached from the pulpit. The pulpit and its utterances are the authoritative, natural and popular means of reaching the multitude. What the press is for the general public, the pulpit is for the congregation gathered within sound of the speaker's voice. Thousands listen to its message, as the official pronouncements of the body to which they belong.

Therefore to learn the ideals and purpose of the Church, its enemies have but to spend a few moments in a Catholic church on a Sunday morning, listening to those priests who are so unjustly accused of political ambition. If the aims of these men are such, they would surely at sometime or other betray themselves. Yet what is their message? Of questions of state, of war, of worldly policies, of attempts against the liberties of the country, of the strife of parties, of electoral canvassing, of defiance of the Constitution, of insult to the flag under whose protection and shadow they live, not a single word. Instead, the listeners will hear, as Felix and Drusilla heard from the lips of St. Paul, "of justice, and chastity and of the judgment to come." The Catholic priest will, in their hearing instruct his people on the gravity of sin, he will describe the punishments, the degradation, the remorse, which it inevitably brings. Obedience to the laws of the land, respect for all legitimate authority, justice, temperance, charity, such will be the official message delivered to the listening throngs.

Pope Benedict XV surely knows what the purposes and ideals of the Catholic Church are. The Acta Apostolicæ Sedis, the official organ of the Holy See, containing the bulls, decrees, briefs and rescripts of the Pontiff himself, and the decisions of the more important Roman Congregations, may well be supposed to indicate his views and what he would have his priests preach to their people. The last number of these official "Acts" contains an interesting document.

At the approach of Lent, the Holy Father always receives in audience the little army of priests who are to preach to the Faithful in the various churches in Rome. This year, as usual, he addressed them a few eloquent words in which he reminded them of their sacred duties and responsibilities. If ever, there was an excuse for the introduction of worldly politics into the pulpit of the Catholic Church, now surely was the time, when Italy is at war, when the Papacy itself is brought into closer and closer contact with great world problems. The Italian press seemed to expect some such pronouncement from the Holy Father. But of statecraft, the Pope spoke not a syllable. Realizing that there rages in the world a fiercer war than that waged by visible legions and battalions, the war of the spirits of darkness against all that is fair and good, he told the priests gathered before him not to rely on "the persuasive words of human wisdom" but to preach Christ and Him crucified, and to do so "in showing of the Spirit and power," and this above all by their own priestly example and the practice of those virtues which they preached. That was the Pope's command to the priests before him. His authoritative words and the constant practice of her preachers the world over prove that the Catholic Church does not wish to control politics but merely desires to save souls.

A Memorial to Carranza

IT is always dangerous to canonize an astute politician before he has been dead at least three days. For, though sainted by evangelical lips, he is apt to fall, even in death, from his sublime height on Jacob's ladder, to the discomfort of the high priests who conferred upon him the honors of their altars.

Carranza is an instance in point, not that he is dead, for he is very much alive, but after he had been lifted aloft by the evangelists of the "pure Gospel" he missed a rung and fell with a crash in the estimation or imagination of those who, in the sweat of their zealous brows, had boosted him up. Hence a wail, thin and tremulous, much like the cry of a lost soul in the night.

This time the wailers are the American Baptists. The First Chief has not only fallen in their esteem, but beyond all peradventure he has become a "thwart and disnatured torment" to them. He has laid a confiscating hand, still wet with Baptist chrism, upon Baptist property, and of course that is an intolerable outrage, if, for no other reason, because the land and buildings are not Romanist.

Quite naturally, American Baptists have protested against the crime and have memorialized the swarthy bandit. It goes without saying that they should form a class apart from Catholics, for Baptists are ardent Carranzistas; they fought in the First Chief's army and their missioners "felt it their duty to give their lives, if necessary, for their country's freedom." These are pathetic words. No doubt they will melt the old sinner's heart to tender pity, and the pleaders will recover their land and houses. But it will prove a shock to those untouched by the pure Gospel to learn that Baptists lent their armed aid to men of blasphemy, murder, robbery, and uncontrolled lust; to men who have been plotting with a foreign hostile power against the United States. It is really dangerous to canonize a live politician, and more dangerous still to exalt a bandit. In that day the secrets of many hearts are revealed.

THE PROPHET-ORATOR OF POLAND

ALPHONSE ZAMIARA, S. J.

THE wonderful words of prophecy Peter Skarga pronounced 330 years ago, are now on the lips and in the heart of every true Pole. In the grand Cathedral of Warsaw, before the assembled Sejm or Senate of Poland in 1597, in the presence of a court and nobility which in pomp and splendor rivaled that of Louis XIV of the following century, that Jesuit Father uttered these portentous words about the future of Poland: "One part of you shall die of hunger, another by the sword, and the third shall be scattered over the whole world," and then consoled his hearers by saying: "He (God) shall revive us and after two days shall raise us up on the third."

This remarkable prophecy, which is being fulfilled to the letter today, is found in the "Kazania Sejmowe," or "Sermons before the Senate," the best orations in the Polish language. Many powerful speakers have risen since the days of Skarga, and Skarga himself published other volumes of sermons, but for impassioned eloquence, for sincere emotion, for uncompromising though bitter truth, his "Sermons before the Senate" are preeminent. Moreover they are classics and will so remain as long as Polish is spoken. Plain and severe in diction, Demosthenic in vigorous action, a vein of brilliant imagery runs through them all. Such a fervent patriotism breathes from them that they deserve to be known widely even outside of Poland's boundaries, for they can stir to the depths the hearts of every nation and will fan to a burning flame the devotedness to God and country dormant in the breast of every man.

In Skarga intense love of God and country was but one virtue: indeed he declared that to be a true Pole one must be a Catholic. Patriotism as well as zeal for religion drew from him those powerful sermons and incisive polemical writings by which he stemmed the tide of Calvinism and Lutheranism, and converted many prominent Lithuanian noble families to the true Faith. Just after his ordination in 1564 at the age of twenty-eight he began his active career of preaching. Four years later he became a Jesuit and on returning from Rome filled important positions in his Order, traveling meantime all through the land, until in 1587 King Sigismund III appointed him court chaplain, a post he filled till 1611, a year before his death. Amidst the court and nobility, Skarga saw Poland at the dazzling noonday of her greatness, but he saw too, with the vision of a prophet such subtle influences at work as luxury, disrespect for authority, oppression of the peasant and especially irreligion. His heart was filled with sadness, and he resolved to do all in his power to stay the impending ruin, to restore honor and reverence to the Almighty and real prosperity to his native land. In the year 1597 a unique opportunity to do this was offered him, for the nobles had been assembled by the King from all parts of the realm to deliberate on measures of reform. Now better than ever could he fulfil his sacred obligation so dear to his heart, and perhaps save his country from moral and material ruin. He fulfilled that obligation eminently well in these famous eight "Sermons before the Senate."

In the first he brings out the idea that Christian morality is the foundation of the happiness and strength of a kingdom. Poland, however, he says in the second sermon, has weakened this foundation. Poland is ailing not from one moral sickness only, but from several: lack of patriotism, discord, differences of religious belief, weakening of the royal power, unjust laws, and sins calling to heaven for vengeance. These he develops in the following sermons.

His deep patriotism burns on every page, but it is at a white-heat in the second where he speaks of the duty of loving one's country: "How should you not love and reverence your dearest mother, that mother who gave you birth and riches and honors? God commanded us to reverence our mother! Cursed be he who saddens her! And what mother can take precedence of your country from whom you have received your name and all your possessions?" He goes on to show how Poland had preserved their Catholic Faith, and had given them liberty, wealth, peace and military renown. "What else could she have done for you? Why should you not love her with all your heart and give up all, even life itself, to preserve her health?"

And in the eighth and last sermon, delivered just before the breaking up of the Senate he seems to be one of the old Hebrew Prophets come to life again, such is his zeal, earnestness, and clearness of vision. He was speaking of the "Sins That Call to Heaven for Vengeance" and in unequivocal terms he denounced the withholding of the hand of justice from punishing murders and other crimes such as the senators' cruel oppression of the peasant class, their luxurious lives, their utter neglect to provide for the defense of the Commonwealth, and their open blasphemy of God. He continued:

> What shall I do with you, unhappy kingdom of Poland? One beholding you leaders of the people here gathered together from all parts of the realm and seeing your habits and interests can well surmise what ungodliness and sin reign throughout the Commonwealth. Were I Isaias, I should walk about the streets barefoot and half-naked crying out to you who are reveling in luxury and pleasure and sin against the law of God: "So shall they strip you when the Lord God shall send enemies upon your head and bring you to such disgrace." . . . Were I Ezechiel I should shave my head and beard, and dividing the hair into three parts, one part I would burn, another I would cut into the minutest pieces and the third I would cast to the winds, and say to you: "One part of you shall die of hunger, another by the sword, and the third part shall be scattered over the whole world."

If we turn from these words to the battle-fields of Europe, and contemplate Poland torn into three parts by her enemies, her sons forced into fratricidal war, her babes in uncounted multitudes dying of hunger and cold, we shall begin to realize how terribly this prophecy has been fulfilled. But all hope is not gone. In the conclusion of the sermon Father Skarga bade his hearers return to God who would cure them. He then pronounced the memorable words full of hope for the suffering Poles: "He shall revive us, and after two days shall raise us up on the third." The first day of sorrow and contrition is past; the second day of penance and reparation has been a long and trying one; and now the day of revival, the third day of the glorious resurrection should dawn. Is this hope about to be attained? Is this part of the prophecy about to be fulfilled? Are these yearnings of an entire people about to be realized? Is the end of this war to see Poland independent? It is the confident expectation of every true Pole that Father Skarga's prophecy will now be at last fulfilled.

Introduction à L'Etude du Merveilleux et du Miracle. Par JOSEPH DE TONQUÉDEC. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne. 5 fr.

Few subjects in the whole range of apologetics deserve more careful treatment than that of miracles and the questions connected with that difficult matter. Those who are seeking an adequate exposition of the subject and one at the same time in accord with the advance of modern scientific thought, will find all that they look for in this Jesuit's volume. In the preface the author tells the reader of the scope and purpose of the book. He has not written what he calls a "fragment of the history of religions." But deeply interested as he avows himself to be in the study of all beliefs in the miraculous and in the objects of those beliefs, he is convinced that there is such a thing as a "problem of the miraculous" and that it is impossible to thrust it aside as chimerical. Father Tonquédec's book then is a method of research, whose purpose is to determine whether the phenomena of which there is question are real, and if so to what cause they must be attributed. In accordance with the answer given to these questions, the idea which men fashion to themselves of religion, and consequently the practical conduct and the spiritual life of the individual will be profoundly modified. The question is therefore of the deepest practical import, and, in some way or other, touches every one, for all men are called upon to meet the problem and conscientiously to solve it. The book, however, is addressed to those who lack strong and definite religious views, but who are anxious about the soundness of their opinions and seek for a fuller light and wish to have their doubts and uncertainty cleared away.

There are two parts in the volume. The first studies what the author pithily calls "les attitudes philosophiques présupposées à l' étude des faits" and among other things gives a clear exposition of naturalism, determinism, the philosophies of "contingency and continuity" as propounded by Bergson and Le Roy, then answers various objections, and finally lays down the arguments for the possibility of miracles. A chapter, "La Certitude du Miracle" closes this section.

Once the author has determined and explained the philosophic spirit in which the facts must be approached, he comes to the facts themselves and asks what the tests are that must be applied to them in order to know whether they are really miraculous or not. Here we have a study of those facts of which we ourselves are the witnesses, those testified to by others, the general rules of interpretation and critical control that must be applied to these, and the methods employed to detect fraud: questions all of the highest interest. There are sections on "Believers," "Crowds," "The Middle Ages," which furnish the author with good opportunity to develop further his thesis. The book does not make easy reading. The nature of the subject scarcely allows of lightness and delicacy of touch. But it is a solid contribution to one of the most important chapters of apologetics. J. C. R.

Obstacles to Peace. By S. S. McCLURE. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $2.00.

Central Europe. A Translation by CHRISTOBEL M. MEREDITH from the Original German of Mittel-Europa by FRIEDRICH NAUMANN, Member of the Reichstag. New York: Alfred Knopf. $3.00.

The first of these books is an American journalist's examination of the events of the present war that render peace hard to make, and the second is a well-known German publicist's proposals for a permanent military, political and economic union of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Holland, Turkey, Greece, Roumania and Scandinavia. Besides making extensive travels last year in Europe, Mr. McClure has studied carefully the diplomatic documents bearing on the beginning and the progress of the war. He brings out well the Great Powers' struggle for the control of Asiatic Turkey. He believes that Von Bethmann-Hollweg, Herr von Jagow and Dr. Zimmermann, supported by the Kaiser, worked for peace, but were overridden by the military party in Germany and by Austria's determination to punish Servia at any cost. The well-documented chapter on "The Neutrality of Belgium" is quite conclusive. As a result of the German occupation, he believes that Belgium is ruined, for the invaders have taken from the country in fines and requisitions, he estimates, more than a billion dollars. If the author's account of the Armenian massacres were but half true, the tragedy would be one of the saddest in history.

The Europe of tomorrow, as Herr Naumann pictures it, "will have two long ditches stretching from north to south": one from the Lower Rhine to the Alps, the other from Courland to Roumania. He sees that the religious question is likely to be one of the obstacles to the successful formation of the United States of Central Europe. He wonders whether after the war the "fellow-feeling between the German, English and American Protestants will be quickly revived." He continues:

> Protestantism is weak as a church, but strong as a union of convictions. Protestants recognize each other all over the world, but will they so recognize each other again during the next decades? The war injures us Protestants more than the Catholics, for the Papal center, in spite of its geographical position in Italy, has remained outside the war owing to the behavior of the present Pope. Among us, Protestant neutrals do, indeed, try to preserve the Protestant community, but they are not sufficiently powerful, since they themselves formerly derived most of their spiritual guidance from Germany and England.

No doubt one result of the present war will be the further disintegration of Protestantism. At any rate, the author does not look for unity of religion in his new Mittel-Europa. He sketches for it, however, a common military system, a joint diplomacy, common standards of money and measures, common banking and commercial laws, a system of tariff which will give an equable scheme of protection, and a system of commercial and industrial syndicates under official patronage. As the war is still raging, "Central Europe" cannot yet be called a very practical book. W. D.

Dark Rosaleen. By M. E. FRANCIS. New York: P. J. Kennedy & Sons. $1.35.

Irish life, looked at from countless angles, affords unique interest, and offers to literary artists an inexhaustible supply of material. From the vast storehouses of magical folklore, from the centuries laden with historical romances, and from the present-day wealth of varied realism, Ireland is lavish with the ore that becomes gold in literature. This fact must be taken into account in future histories of English literature. This recent story by Mrs. Francis Blundell, the material of which is taken from the Ireland of today proves the foregoing thesis. For "Dark Rosaleen" is powerful in its vivid realism and powerful, too, in the ethical impression which comes to flower out of the tragical dénouement. Mrs. Blundell's literary skill has long been approved; she wins new appraisement in her latest achievement. The cogent rapidity of the action, ascending with sure strides to the peripeteia of the tragedy, and along to the crisis; the charm of her literary pauses to note some enchanting scenic effect, or the more enchanting characteristics of the folk of Galway and the neighboring isles; the texture of romance that she weaves out of realism—these are but a few or the excellencies of Mrs. Blundell's artistry. She differs, toto coelo, from the writers of the "Irish Theater" School, for hers is a clear-eyed vision of phases of Irish life, not the befuddled leerings of a gild of Maeterlincks and Ibsens, who court "Playboy" applause from the English gallery. Yet she does not gild her characters to hide what may be undignified or even an approach to ridicule in their domestic conduct.

It is sufficient to say of the novel's plot that it deals in the main with a tragedy which arises out of a marriage between a girl belonging to a Galway Catholic family and a young Belfast Protestant. Therein is a complication which cannot be solved. Black is never so black as when it stands before a background of white; and in the prism's arrangement of the "seven colors," yellow stands between the green and orange. "Dark Rosaleen" should be in every library, for the problem with which the novel deals is one of universal interest. The mixed marriage may have accidental differences, but in its consequences it is substantially the same the world over. The dispensation makes such a marriage ecclesiastically permissible, but it does not prophesy domestic tranquility nor give assurance that the blessings of the Faith shall be the possession of the generations to come. The Russian School of Painting. By ALEXANDRE BENOIS. With an Introduction by CHRISTIAN BRINTON. With Thirty-two Plates. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. $4.00.

French Etchers of the Second Empire. By W. A. BEADLEY. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.50.

The history of Russian painting is, we are afraid, a sealed book to many even of those who are sincerely interested in art. It is more than probable that, with the exception of Vereschagin and perhaps Repin, no other Russian painter could be mentioned offhand by any one of the thousands who throng our galleries and museums. The volume, therefore, of Alexandre Benois, translated by Mr. Abraham Yarmolinsky, will supply a clear, concise and fairly complete view of a subject unfamiliar to American readers. The book opens with what may be considered the beginning of Russian painting of the western type under Peter the Great and brings us down to the modern school of the Moscow phantasts and symbolists, like Kuznetzov and the Milioti. A clear view is given of the various stages through which the art of painting has passed in the land of the Czars. The eighteenth-century classicism, romanticism, the religious painting of Ivanov and his school, realism and "purpose-painting," free realism and the contemporary state of art in Russia as represented by Vruvel, Malyavin, are in turn discussed. In the masters represented there is no Raphael, no Fra Angelico, no Murillo. East and West meet on the canvases of the Russian artists. There is power, dramatic atmosphere, richness and depth of color. There is lack of balance, of repose and of that heavenly calm, the infallible test of true art, and at times there is a painful realism that shocks and revolts. The "Vision of St. Bartholomew" of Nesterov, finely reproduced in the book, gives us Russian art at its best, and with its saint and listening boy, makes an altogether charming and impressive picture.

The studies gathered together in "French Etchers of the Second Empire" first appeared in the Print Collector's Quarterly. They derive their unity, as the introduction tells us, from the fact that they deal with a group of French artists viewed against the background of French life and letters under the Second Empire. The book is unpretentious yet interesting and gives a new insight into the life, work and methods of Meryon, Lalanne, the Goncourts, etc. There is a special chapter on "Corot as a Lithographer." The illustrations are excellent.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In "Masters of Space" (Harper, $1.25), Walter Kellogg Towers gives interesting sketches of Morse and the telegraph, Thompson and the cable, Bell and the telephone, Marconi and the wireless telegraph, and Carty and the wireless telephone. The story of the progress made since Morse, in 1844, sent his telegram from Washington to Baltimore, until Carty, in 1915, phoned through the air from Arlington to Honolulu, a distance of nearly 5,000 miles, reads like a romance. As the author's account of how these persistent inventors overcame the difficulties they kept meeting is an excellent lesson for the young, the book is a good one to put into their hands.

"In the Wilderness" (Stokes, $1.50), by Robert Hichens, has for its "moral" that a good woman can be so wedded to her own idea of what goodness is, that she becomes narrow, selfish, obdurate, and deaf to the bidding of the higher life of sacrifice. Rosamund, the leading character of the story, makes a mistake only too common—she thinks too much of her rights and too little of her duty. She realizes only in the end that a willingness to make sacrifices is the meter that measures the reality of love. One's first impression is that "In the Wilderness," in spite of the publisher's disclaimer, was written as a serial. The author is not sure of himself in the earlier chapters and feels his way with difficulty. Diffuseness in description, and analysis, and conversation that is dawdling, are prominent faults. However, the novel-reading public of today seems to take kindly to a writer's "teasing with obvious comment, and torturing with inevitable inference"——Well-drawn characters in "Up the Hill and Over" (Doran, $1.35), Isabel Ecclestone Mackay's new novel, keep the story interesting. The hero's wife whom he thought dead turns out to be the stepmother of the girl he is about to marry. He nobly stands by his lawful but unworthy wife, however, and his fidelity is rewarded when she is conveniently carried off by an overdose of self-administered drugs. The early part of the book is pleasanter reading than the later.

"Workmanship in Words" (Little, Brown, $1.00), by James Kelley, is a little treatise on fitness and force in the use of words. It is as instructive and systematic as any text-book, and pungent and entertaining because it is not a text-book. We wish that everyone who is thinking of dashing off a book would examine his conscience on the points the author gives on how not to write slip-shod English. The literary world would surely be richer, though "rapid-returns" authors might become poorer. ——The extensive collection of "American Prose (1607-1865)" (University of Chicago Press), by Walter C. Bronson, will prove a serviceable volume to the student, and likewise to the general reader who wishes to find copious extracts from early American writers. The religious moralizations of colonial authors and that solemn atmosphere which marked their character-studies find here ample illustration. Professor Bronson has made his selections well and has furnished the readers with copious notes.

Here are some recent books of verse: Mr. James Oppenheim's "War and Laughter" (Century), is a further contribution to the vers-librist movement, which will gladden the hearts of all its adherents, and make everybody else regret that he has not seen fit to present his undoubted poetic gift in the legitimate restraints of real verse. The severe condensation of thought and the recurrent music-rhythm that characterize verse as something distinct from prose is wholly wanting, yet no one can fail to see how much so true a poet would gain by them both in name and real merit. In spite of his very vague notions of spiritual thought, there is a hopeful sign in the absence from the book of nearly all that hideous, so-called "realism" that mars so much of the recent work of this school. "The Blood of Rachel" (Morton, Louisville), by Cotton Noe, contains a dramatization of Esther, and other essays in verse that never reach any exalted pitch of poetic quality, and "Christus Consolator" (Crowell), by Rossiter Raymond, is the work of a busy man of the world, poems touching many aspects of life and nature, interpreted throughout from a sincere and always intensely religious outlook. Never very ambitious in scope, they yet succeed in conveying well the religious emotions that prompted them.

Among recent books on the war are "An Uncensored Diary" (Doubleday, $1.25), by Ernesta Drinker Bullitt, "Pan-Germanism Versus Christendom" (Doran, $1.00), by Emile Prüm, "Hurrah and Hallelujah" (Doran, $1.00), by J. P. Bang, "Campaign Diary of a French Officer" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25), by René Nicolas, and "The Judgment of the Orient" (Dutton, $0.60), by K'ung Yuan Ku'suh. The author of the first is the wife of an American journalist who accompanied him on his visits to the parts of Germany, Belgium and Austria-Hungary they were allowed to see. She jotted down every day her impressions of German efficiency and as they were for the most part favorable, it is not surprising that the diary was "uncensored."

The second volume contains an open letter of protest which a prominent Luxembourg Catholic wrote to Herr Erzberger, a leading member of the Center party in the Reichstag. The cruelties perpetrated in Belgium turned M. Prüm against the Germans and against the Catholic press in Germany. René Johannet edits the book, makes comments and adds an appendix on "The Evolution of the German Catholic Center." In the third volume named, the Professor of Theology in the University of Copenhagen, examines the sermons that a number of well-known Protestant preachers of Germany have delivered on the war and concludes that German Lutheranism must "do penance for the dreadful contamination of and distortion of Christianity," of which those ministers are guilty. "Attention! Forward, mes petits, and Vive la France!" called out Sous-Lieutenant René Nicolas as he led his troops from the trenches. He was badly wounded in the ensuing engagement but lived to be decorated and to publish his diary. K'ung Yuan Ku-suh divides the nations into those that are masculine and those that are feminine and places Germany among the latter.

Kathleen Norris's "Undertow" (Doubleday, $1.25) and Eleanor H. Porter's "The Road to Understanding" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.40) are recent novels largely concerned with the solution of that old domestic problem of making receipts exceed expenditures. Mrs. Norris well describes how Bert and Nancy Bradley became more and more entangled in extravagant habits, were saved by a timely accident from disaster and then began to love each other and their children as they should. Given a women of such pitiful anserinity as Helen Denby, who has a husband quite worthy of her, perhaps the complications that occur in Mrs. Porter's new story could happen, but it is hard to believe. However, it is a relief to find that this author has succeeded fairly well in keeping preternatural children out of this book. The dialogue is well managed, and there are amusing pages about Helen's long apprenticeship for becoming a lady.

The contents of the March Studies reflect the economic distress and political unrest from which the Niobe of nations is now suffering. There is a symposium on "The Food Problem in Ireland," an article on "What to Eat," another on "An Economic Study of the Great Famine," a third on "The Problem of Poland" and an excellent critical paper on John F. MacEntee, one of the "Poets of the Insurrection," who was executed last spring. This sonnet, "To Ireland," will give readers a taste of his quality.

Since thou hast proffered, Queen, for my guerdon
  The felon's gyves, and fire, and prison bed,
  I take them; for thy gracious godly-head
Hath made them meeter than a kingly crown;
And though my life should herewith be cast down,
  And all the hopes youth fostered should lie dead,
  And in obscurity my days be sped,
I hold oblivion greater than renown.

For I have built for the eternal years,
  Secret, unseen, like mite in tropic sea,
    That rears a wondrous isle from out its bone
And in the works absorbed yet perseveres;
  So they that honor thee shall honor me
    When thou art throned, Queen, upon thy throne.

The Queen's Work appears this month in a new form and at the advanced price of $2.00 a year. On the cover Our Lady is represented watching the earth whirling through an orange-colored universe. The leading articles in the number are "Argentina of Today," "The Church in Argentina," "The Baptism of Buffalo Bill," and "A Sodality Picnic in Asia." The best of this month's Marian poems is "Florenz's" sonnet entitled "My Mother's Son," which runs thus:

I hold within my heart, O Mother Queen,
  Thy little Son, thy Child. The right is thine,
  And yet, by wondrous gift this grace is mine!
'Twas thou who first within thy heart serene
Thy God received. By mortal eyes unseen
  He dwelt secure, thy loving heart His shrine.
  In first Communion with the Word Divine
Thou hadst a foretaste of our Gift supreme.

O thou, sweet Mother, who didst first embrace
Our God, teach me thy potent way of grace,
  That in these precious moments that are mine
  I may constrain my Guest, thy Son Divine,
To bide with me. Oh, may He ne'er depart!
Behold!—His living chalice, my unworthy heart!

EDUCATION

In the Calabrian Hills

AS every class of society must be molded to the precepts of the Gospel, Providence has ever brought forth at the right time teachers suited to the requirements of the age. A mere glance at the history of Catholic education convinces us that the problems of the hour always find the correct solution, and that out of her treasure-house the Church can draw forth good things, old and new, to fit a demand and supply a need. Let us confine ourselves to a single instance, one which perhaps has been often forgotten, but which from many points of view is singularly interesting. It is but just to recall the services rendered to Catholic education by Flavius Magnus Aurelius Cassiodorus Senator, the last of the Romans, the friend of Theodoric and Queen Amalaswintha, the interpreter of Roman letters and Christian morality to the Gothic races, the statesman turned hermit and monk, who, after years of service to the new masters of Rome, left the world and its honors and spent the second and more glorious half of his long life in solitude and prayer, the pursuit of letters and the education of youth, in the lonely gorges of the Calabrian hills.

Cassiodorus and the Goths

FLAVIUS Magnus Aurelius Cassiodorus Senator! What a sonorous and splendid name. It sounds like a roll-call of the departing glories of the Mistress of the world. He who bore it was but a child eight years old when Odoacer, the King of the Heruli, deprived Romulus Augustulus, the last of the phantom emperors who ruled in the West, of his scepter and crown. A few years after he saw Odoacer defeated on the banks of the Isonzo, familiar name, and then treacherously slaughtered by his Gothic conqueror, Theodoric, the ruler whose legendary fame and exploits as Dietrich de Bern are sung in the romances of the Middle Ages, and whose monument at Ravenna gives a startling glimpse into the rude splendors of his barbaric age. Cassiodorus was not yet twenty when he became treasurer of the new master of Italy. He is in turn, governor of Lucania and the Bruttii, consul and adviser, friend and prime minister of the Gothic monarch. On the death of Theodoric, he fills the same position under Amalaswintha, while she acted as regent for her son Athalaric. Like his father, he is made praetorian prefect under the three short-lived successors of Theodoric. In 540 when the Ostrogothic kingdom faces the crisis which will bring its fall, and Belisarius, the victorious general of Justinian, is entering captured Ravenna, he has apparently withdrawn from the world and settled on his estates among the wild but picturesque solitudes of the Calabrian hills.

Cassiodorus and his Times

CASSIODORUS had thus been trained for his duties as an educator. He knew his times. He had a statesman's experience of its many-sided problems. He was in touch with all their activities. He had come into personal contact with the rulers, the statesmen and people of the countless tribes which formed the Ostrogothic kingdom. Like the hero of the Greek epic, he could truly say that he had been a part of all that he had seen. The policies, the diplomatic secrets of the headstrong Theodoric and the wily Justinian had been laid bare before him. Rome had been overthrown by Odoacer; the Herule king had been murdered by Theodoric; the Ostrogothic kingdom had disappeared and Alboin and his Lombards had overrun Italy. Cassiodorus had been spared amid the rise and fall of empires and the overthrow and murders of princes and great men. He was a venerable centenarian almost when he died at the close of the sixth century. He was the Nestor of his age. Whatever treasures of knowledge, wisdom, experience and life that age had possessed, seemed to be hoarded in his heart and mind. He made good use of them.

Cassiodorus and the Papacy

THE statesman and the consul, the minister of Theodoric and his successors had seen too many tragedies in his long experience not to realize that the violence and the crimes which had caused them had to be checked if civilization was to be preserved. And if the splendid heritage was to be handed down to succeeding generations, he realized that religion must become its custodian. Letters, arts, law, culture, science, all the refinements of humanity and civilization had to be put under her safeguard. Although empires were crumbling under the frequent blows of the barbarians, and some splendid fragment was constantly being torn away from what was left of former greatness, while races were vanishing and others appearing on the scene soon to be blotted out of sight by the battalions of new fighters rushing to the fray, he saw that there was one power, permanent and strong, which might save the remnants of former splendor. He looked to the Papacy. It is true that the work which Cassiodorus and the Pope projected was never fully realized. Had they been able to carry it into execution, the sixth century would in all probability have seen in Rome the beginning at least of those mighty universities which were to be the crowning glory of the thirteenth. Cassiodorus had intended in conjunction with the Pope, cum beatissimo Agapito, papa Urbis Romae, to found something like a university in Rome, with trained masters in science sacred and profane. Rome, though uncrowned of the glories of olden time, was to become the mistress of arts and letters and the Church and the Papacy were to be the teachers of the new generation. The whole plan is a splendid proof of the practical wisdom of Cassiodorus and his loyalty to the Holy See.

Cassiodorus and the Monastic Life

CASSIODORUS was one of the wealthiest men of the times. His patrimonial estates in Southern Italy had escaped the ravages of the barbarians. If Rome could not, owing to the constant inroads of hostile squadrons, afford a refuge and sanctuary for letters, the groves, the woods, the secluded fastnesses, of his ancestral home at Squillacium, would become the haunt of the wandering and exiled Muses, nay, the sanctuary of the nobler wisdom of the Gospel. During his public life, as Father Grisar says, Cassiodorus had rendered incalculable services, to the Papacy, to the influence of the Church upon society, and to the reconciliation of the Latins and the Germanic tribes. His withdrawal into the solitude of Vivarium and Castellum may be considered "a great episode in the history of Italy and Christian learning." In his "Institutiones" the old statesman, now hermit, copyist and teacher, describes lovingly the beauties of his monastic retreat. He tells us of its well-watered gardens, its baths for the sick by the banks of the neighboring stream, the Pellena, "the fountain of Arethusa," fringed with its crown of rustling reeds, the old fort nearby with its encircling walls, and below, the sea, ever reminding the former consul of the fierce agitation and unrest beating against the ship of state which he had so sturdily guided in bygone days. An ideal spot for study and prayer. A refuge, a sanctuary, a school, an academy, in which to preserve and foster that love of learning which the iron heel of war and revolution was stamping out.

Benedict of Nursia had already retired to the solitude of Monte Cassino. The religious idea was first and uppermost in the mind of the great Patriarch of monasticism in the West. It was undoubtedly the most important factor in the regeneration of the new age. With Cassiodorus, to the religious ideal was joined the love of learning and of intellectual culture. He had labored hard for the rulers and the people of the Gothic State. Father Grisar declares that learning had had something like a second spring there. But Cassiodorus saw that with the passing of the Gothic empire, civilization was doomed to perish, if it did not find a champion. In his mind it was to find it in the one seemingly the least prepared to defend its rights and advance its cause. Monasticism was to be its standard-bearer. In this happy inspiration consists his contribution to the cause of true civilization and Catholic education. Monasticism was to be the ark carrying in its womb, the hopes and the founders of the new world. We may forget the "Chronicon" of Cassiodorus, his "Orthography," his "Gothic History" which survives in the abridgment of Jordanes, his commentary on the Psalms, his "Variae" and his "Historia Tripartita." We cannot forget that at a critical moment in the history of Christendom, together with the great Pope Agapitus, he divined the needs of the times. He remembered that men are heirs of the past, and that it is God's law that all that is good and noble and true should form their heritage. He realized that the treasures of Greece and Rome should be jealously guarded by the Church and her children. In Squillacium and Castellum therefore, the noble men who followed him, guided by his piety and learning, cast "into the blood-stained furrows of the ruined ancient world" the sturdy seed of monasticism, the preserver and nourisher of letters and art. It was the one seed that could thrive in the poisonous air and the impoverished soil. It was to bear a splendid harvest. We must not forget the far-seeing husbandman who cast it into the ground.

ECONOMICS

The Evolution of a Monopoly

A STRIKING illustration of the development of a monopoly is afforded us in Professor Reed's recent volume, "The Morality of Monopoly and Competition," issued from the Collegiate Press of the George Banta Publishing Company, Menasha, Wis. It is not surprising that he should have selected for his special study the Standard Oil Company, since, perhaps, no other monopoly has been so frequently and so thoroughly investigated. While we would not wish to attribute to all our large business enterprises the methods described, it is certainly true that the principles involved have been widely accepted in commercial life.

Professor Reed prefaces his study with the remark that the monopoly of the Standard Oil was due neither to superior efficiency nor to lower prices, but was attributable solely to the transportation privileges, or "rebates," which it succeeded in obtaining. In 1872 a most remarkable contract was concluded separately with the Pennsylvania, New York Central and Erie railroads by the South Improvement Company in which the directors of the Standard Oil held the largest interests. A single example will suffice to illustrate the practical working of this contract.

BEGETTING A MONOPOLY

WHILE the regular rate of shipping from the oil regions to Philadelphia was set by these companies at $2.77 a barrel, a rebate of $1.32 was to be given to the South Improvement Company. This rebate, it is to be noted, was to be paid to the company not merely on every barrel of oil shipped by it, but likewise on every barrel of oil shipped by any competitor of the South Improvement Company. Thus the excess of $1.32 paid by any independent producer to the railroads was turned over by these roads to the aforesaid company. Hence its rivals would begin their business with an actual handicap of $2.64 against them for every barrel of oil they sought to sell in Philadelphia.

The principle of the railroads was to charge one large shipper a rate which would leave a satisfactory profit for them, and then to take from all others "as much as the traffic would bear." Since shippers were forced to use these roads a monopoly would be in process of formation the very moment that such a contract of rebating was concluded. Efficiency or prices no longer constituted the dominant element of success. The records of the United States Industrial Commission Report on the Rockefeller investigation (vol. I, p. 64) show that immediately upon the conclusion of the contract of 1872 the officers of the Standard Oil presented themselves to the independents in Cleveland with the following convincing proposition: "If you don't sell your property to us, it will be valueless, for we have gotten advantages with the railroads." The result was that out of thirty independents in Cleveland twenty-five were bought out on that occasion.

GROWTH OF THE MONOPOLY

NEEDLESS to say, the contract at once called forth a determined opposition and its cancellation was effected. Rebates were to be abolished and no discrimination was to be shown between the various shippers. But this fair agreement implied a loss of remunerative shipping for the railroad companies, and in two weeks the New York Central was again paying rebates to the Standard Oil. It is unnecessary to continue in detail the description of the various methods by which, under one form or another, the railroads were henceforth made instrumental by the Standard in destroying its competitors. The pool of 1874, entered into by the Pennsylvania, New York Central and Erie railroads, gave such advantages to the Standard Oil that the greater number of competitors were forced to sell out and the Standard increased its pipage from twenty-five to eighty per cent of the total then existing. Every refinery along Oil Creek was forced to shut down and independents in Pittsburgh and Philadelphia were compelled to sell or lease to the great monopoly, which had then brought under its control ninety per cent of the refining capacity of the United States.

The entrance of new competitors into the field always called for new devices and new struggles, but the interested railroads were determined to maintain the Standard "against injury and loss by competition to the end that it may have a remunerative and so a full and regular business." The consequence was that between $3,000,000 and $10,000,000 was granted in rebates to the Standard from October 17, 1877, to March 31, 1879. "The lower amount even is considerable," remarks Professor Reed, "for it would pay a return of five per cent per annum on a capitalization of $60,000,000." The ultimate effect was utterly disastrous to competition. Whereas in 1872 there had been no fewer than 250 independent oil refineries in the oil country of Pennsylvania alone there remained in 1878 not over five independent producers in the whole country. Out of seventy-five refineries listed by Mr. Emery, outside of Pittsburgh, twenty per cent were "squeezed out" before 1872, thirty "dismantled" between 1875 and 1878, and seventeen "bought up." Out of fifty-eight refineries that existed in Pittsburgh itself thirty were "crushed out and dismantled" and the remaining twenty-eight bought up or leased by the Standard, which later shut down twelve of these (pp. 13-26).

PRODIGIOUS PROFITS

WITHOUT entering further into the details of this story it is sufficient to quote the following brief summary drawn up mainly from Congressional records:

> Because of these advantages (rebates and other railroad discriminations) it is not surprising that between 1872 and 1906 the Standard Oil Company acquired the interests of at least 200 competitors engaged in refining, marketing, and piping oil; destroyed without acquiring 245 competitors between 1872 and 1879, and an unknown number since that period; increased its assets between 1882 and 1906 from $55,000,000 to $359,000,000; earned during the same time $838,000,000 in profits; and realized twenty-five per cent annually on its investment and forty-eight per cent in dividends on its capital stock.

These profits were so stupefying that the national conscience was at last aroused and the railroads were brought under the public law. But it had taken forty years to abolish the system of rebates.

Price Cutting

BUT other means of perpetuating the Standard Oil monopoly remained. These had likewise been used during the previous period. The first to be mentioned is the system of local price cutting. Looking over a table of the price of oil in various states, computed from the Report of the Petroleum Industry, 1907, a marked difference in prices is to be noted in particular instances. They cannot be adequately explained by differences in transportation charges, since it is shown by Professor Reed that a river or a street between two purchasers might be sufficient to cause a difference in price. Two other tables throw further light upon this subject. One gives the prices and margins on oil in twenty-three States in which the Standard has no competition and we find that the average price there was 12.87 cents a gallon, and the average marginal gain 2.52 cents. The other indicates the prices in twelve towns having a competition of from thirty to fifty per cent. The average price here was 9.09 cents, while there was a marginal loss of .08 cents a gallon. The working principle may be best illustrated by the following quotation from the testimony given by Mr. Boardman, who at the time was employed by the Standard in Augusta:

> J. What was done when a company would come in there?
> A. Cut the price.
> J. How much?
> A. As much as necessary to get the business. It would depend upon what we thought the other fellow would be able to do. . . . Say they figured this fellow's oil would cost him twelve cents in barrels; they would make it eleven and a half—fix it so that he couldn't sell oil at a profit, if possible. (Boardman, Record, 5/2165.)

The Standard could then again raise its price. A convenient method often employed by it was to start bogus companies which might take advantage of the very prejudice against the trust to attract customers, and which could cut prices in a certain locality only and thus save the Standard from lowering them over a wide district. Sixty bogus companies were reported by witnesses in the Standard Oil suit against the United States. (Reed, pp. 77-90.)

The Espionage System

ONE of the best organized departments of the Standard Oil Company, according to Professor Reed, was that which had charge of its espionage system. In the New York office alone this department is said to have employed thirty-eight clerks. "The system was carried out by means of special arrangements not only with Standard employees but also with employees of railroads. Deputy public oil inspectors frequently assisted, and occasionally employees of independent companies." The effects of the system are thus described by Judge Woodson of the Supreme Court of Missouri in his detailed opinion regarding the Standard Oil Company:

> In order to drive out all competitors and drive out the entire trade, they inaugurated and carried on a perfect system of espionage, by which they acquired complete knowledge of their competitor's business, and followed almost every barrel of independent oil shipped over a railroad to the very door of the dealer, and, there, by means of cutting prices, offering rebates, misrepresentation and deception, attempted to have the sale countermanded and prevent him from purchasing independent oil in the future. (State ex inf. v. Standard Oil Co., 218 No. 1,444.)

The Result

TO summarize our study, we find that the Standard Oil monopoly was made possible solely by the system of rebating which was its mightiest weapon in crushing and annihilating its competitors. At the same time it was aided in this work by such other ruthless methods as ruinous price cutting, bogus independent enterprises, a throttling system of espionage and similar dark and devious ways. They are the extreme application of the individualistic principle which came with the Reformation and was unknown in the halcyon days of the Catholic gilds.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Strikes and Lockouts During 1916

ACCORDING to the latest official labor statistics there were 3,160 strikes and 108 lockouts in the United States during the year 1916. Practically every occupation was involved in these labor troubles. "The year 1916," says an expert of the Federal Bureau of Labor Statistics, "will long be remembered as the year of strikes." The fulfilment of this prediction will depend upon the material and moral improvement that the future may bring or fail to bring. "The scarcity of labor," he adds, "and the rapid increase in the cost of living seem to have caused wage-earners to feel that they were not getting their share of the present prosperity and to show their discontent by striking. Desire for higher wages and shorter hours was the cause of two-thirds of the strikes last year, while a large proportion of the remainder was due to causes connected with unionization." Of the strikes whose results are indicated, 471 were won by the employers, and 706 by the employees, 70 were arbitrated and 542 compromised.

Commercialism

AFTER enumerating what it considers the chief causes of the present high prices and food scarcity the Rochester Post Express strikes directly at the heart of the great modern evil:

> Probably no thoughtful person fails to realize that there is a spirit in trade today, by no means universal, yet everywhere manifest, which is after the last penny of possible profit and justifies itself in doing business in that way. The kindest name for this is commercialism, and it is so much in evidence in every civilized land that this is called the world's commercial age. Some of the profoundest minds of our times have feared that the nations, intent on gaining the world, were losing their souls, and believe that this great war grew out of those conditions and is to be corrective of them. Individual selfishness may long persist and sporadic extortion occur; but organized heartlessness which would wring unrighteous profits out of the necessities of the poor is incompatible with an improving civilization. If society had begun to condone this, to soften its characterization of it and tolerate it as an alleged necessity of our competitive system, then this war, if it is checking this tendency to social decay, may be averting a worse thing than the war.

In other words, if the war is bringing back religion to the world we may look upon it as a blessing to mankind, for without religion we shall hope in vain for the dawning of a better day.

Making "Darkness Light Before Them"

"EARLY last week," writes one of its patrons to the Xavier Free Publication Society for the Blind, "I returned 'The Church and Literature' which I so very much enjoyed that really it does not very much matter whether one sees or not, when one can get such delightful reading under one's finger." The society, which is established at New York, not only donates literature to such libraries as will circulate it throughout at least their respective States, but likewise lends its embossed books directly to any applicant in the United States who cannot otherwise procure this literature. We learn from its latest report that, in spite of the exorbitant price of print-paper and of all other requisite materials, there were published some twenty-one different books, consisting of twenty-five embossed volumes, during the past year. Its two monthly magazines, the Catholic Transcript for the Blind, in New York point, and the Catholic Review, in American Braille, have continued to make their regular appearance. The volumes published are carefully selected to satisfy both mind and soul. The first book in Moon print ever issued in the United States, and the first Catholic book ever produced anywhere in this tactile print, the "Baltimore Catechism," was published by the society last year. Since the apostolic enterprise generously undertaken by the society depends for its continuance upon the donations given for this cause, it is to be hoped that the number of its friends, patrons and contributors will constantly increase. So shall they make darkness light and bring joy and spiritual blessings into the lives of our Catholic blind.

A Federal Census of Religious Bodies

A CENSUS of Religious Bodies is to be taken, under authority of Congress, by the Federal Bureau of the Census. The editor of the "Official Catholic Directory," Mr. Joseph H. Meier, announces in this connection that to render the census perfectly satisfactory to Catholics a schedule will be sent by the Bureau to every Catholic priest and every Catholic church listed in the directory. The census officials have conferred with the Catholic Hierarchy and have received most cordial offers of support and assistance. The reverend rectors are therefore urged to comply with the courteous and earnest desires of the Director of the Census at Washington, to fill out the schedules and return them promptly to him. In this way the full strength of the Catholic population can for the first time be satisfactorily computed in a public census. It is reported from Washington that all Catholics are to be included in the present census, children as well as adults. Catholics will therefore have only themselves to blame if the figures in the final publication will not be accurate. Another item of interest mentioned by Mr. Meier is his approximate estimate of the number of Catholics in the City of New York, which he places at 1,867,500. This figure assigns a greater Catholic population to New York City than is to be found in any State of the Union, New York State excepted. The census of 1907 had credited New York City with 1,413,775 Catholics, but in these figures fifteen per cent had been deducted for children and infants.

A Golden Gospeller

THE Billy Sunday revival meetings have now successfully won their way from small western towns to the most populous eastern city. "To those," says Hamilton Schuyler in the American Church Monthly, "who are impressed by the ability of Sunday to command a cash return for his evangelistic efforts that far exceeds the salary paid to an operatic star of the first magnitude, to say nothing of that enjoyed by the President of the United States, the revivalist is doubtless regarded as the biggest success of the age." The so-called "free-will offering" he describes as obtained by districting a city and bringing pressure to bear upon the various individuals visited by the Sunday solicitors. "In some instances it is not too much to say that arguments are used which approximate the nature of a polite blackmail." The result of these methods may be judged by the following list of Billy Sunday offerings compiled by the Alarm: Colorado Springs, Cal., $5,611.58; Portsmouth, O., $7,100; Lima, O., $8,050; Beaver Falls, Pa., $10,000; Denver, Colo., $10,000; Wichita, Kan., $10,111; South Bend, Ind., $11,200; Erie, Pa., $11,565; Springfield, O., $12,000; Canton, O., $12,500; Des Moines, Ia., $13,000; McKeesport, Pa., $13,438; Johnstown, Pa., $14,000; Toledo, O., $15,423; Wheeling, W. Va., $17,450; Columbus, O., $20,939.58; Wilkes-Barre, $22,288.90; Scranton, $22,398; Pittsburgh, $46,000; Kansas City, Mo., $32,000; Baltimore, Md., $40,000; Trenton, N. J., $35,000; Syracuse, N. Y., $25,000; Omaha, Neb., $20,000; Paterson, N. J., $25,000; Philadelphia, $51,136; Boston, $55,000, a grand evangelical total of $566,114.91. This does not include presents and royalties on books, post cards, sermons, etc. While it is asserted in some quarters that the entire campaign is a syndicated proposition, the writer already quoted would not be responsible for this statement, but holds that "certainly a few persons in an inner circle receive an immoderately large return for their services."

Apportionment Plan for Missions

A VERY practical and valuable article on mission support is contributed to the April number of the Missionary by Floyd Keeler. The method outlined by the writer has already in a general way been described in AMERICA, but further details will be of interest. It is known as the "Apportionment Plan," and has produced the most remarkable results in Protestant churches. We have constantly and candidly admitted the immense superiority of Protestants in the business-like application of financial methods, and it is consequently entirely desirable that we should learn from them when their methods are not merely commendable but even highly laudable. Such is the apportionment plan by which practically every church member can be induced to contribute something for the mission cause, while parish interests are promoted at the same time. The following is a brief description of its operation in the Protestant Episcopal Church:

> The Board of Missions at its annual meeting makes up a budget for the coming year. There are thirty-eight dioceses, twenty-four missionary districts in the United States and its dependencies (corresponding to our Catholic Vicariates Apostolic) and ten missionary districts in foreign lands, which receive all or part of their support from the Missionary Society. The needs of each of these, as reported by their bishops, are carefully considered and the amount the Board feels it can safely promise is appropriated. The sum total of this appropriation is then apportioned to the different provinces and dioceses, being graded in such a manner that the wealthiest pay the largest share, the bases used being the number of communicants and the amount expended by themselves for the upkeep of their own churches. Each diocese in its turn apportions the sum that each congregation is expected to raise as a minimum so that the diocesan apportionment will not fall short. Every diocese pursues its own method.

It would be necessary within the Church to adapt the plan in such a way that full account could be taken of our various missionary societies and that their cooperation could be made most fruitful. But means should be found to obtain contributions from every church member. The results of such methods may be gauged by the fact that whereas before the apportionment plan only 1,993 congregations out of 6,546 in the American Protestant Episcopal Church contributed to the mission fund, the total of contributing congregations in 1912 was 5,742, with an aggregate increase in revenue of $554,000. Today the total sum from a church of barely 1,000,000 communicants is $1,500,000. Especially consoling for the Catholic pastor is the added information that contributions to local support have invariably increased wherever collections for the missions were taken up. The regular house-to-house canvass, made by the laity to secure the necessary mission pledges, overlooks no parish member and usually secures subscriptions at the same time for parochial support.

The Catholic Church and Billy Sunday

What Florida bigotry means is shown in the correspondence between Governor Catts and a well-known New York lawyer given in the CATHOLIC MIND for April 8. Billy Sunday and his methods are now popular themes. Why Catholics should avoid the gatherings at which his vagaries are the attraction, and how he works up his appeals to hysterical "converts" are told by Father Fisher in a convincing paper.

Home News.—Notable among the declarations of loyalty which the entrance of the United States into the world-war has called forth are the patriotic statements of our three American Cardinals and of other members of the Catholic Hierarchy. We have no need of publicly proclaiming our patriotism, which has been proved in every great national crisis, but the purpose of the prelates of the Church has been to guide Catholics in the fulfilment of their duties and to urge them to implore the Divine mercy that the blessing of peace may be speedily restored to us. Though Cardinal Gibbons has always preached the message of Christian peace, he declares that now the country is involved in war there must be no shirkers. He himself is ready to give it all his support. Maryland, he desires, should be one of the first States to offer the President the full number of men demanded of it for the navy.

Message of Cardinal Gibbons

In the present emergency it behooves every American citizen to do his duty and to uphold the hands of the President and the legislative department in the solemn obligations that confront us. The primary duty of a citizen is loyalty to country. This loyalty is manifested more by acts than by words; by solemn service rather than by empty declamation. It is exhibited by an absolute and unreserved obedience to his country's call.

Whatever Congress may decide in this crisis, the Cardinal insists, should be unequivocally complied with, and all should pray that the Lord of Hosts may inspire our national Legislature and Executive in the conduct of the war.

Cardinal Farley issued a special pastoral letter to be read on April 15 at the Masses in all the churches of his archdiocese. Long and anxiously he too had hoped that we should not be drawn into the seething vortex of the world-war. But what had been so ardently and wholeheartedly desired was not to be. "Our country had to take up the arms that were forced into her hands." His letter is a summons to American citizens to hearken to her call:

Cardinal Farley's Pastoral Letter

Our President having spoken, and our national Representatives having spoken, the response to the voice of authority they embody will be that we shall rally round the flag with the completest fulness of devotion, and with most loyal hearts and most sturdy arms place all that we have and all that we are at our country's service. We shall not shrink from any sacrifice in her behalf. We shall render to her what our Catholic faith and our Catholic teaching sanction, nay sanctify. No demand on our American manhood or American citizenship will go unanswered or will not find us true Americans, true children of our Church, that never was found wanting in any crisis of American history.

With our path thus lying straight before us, he implored the blessing of Almighty God that we might walk in it steadfastly and unwaveringly to the end.

No less decisive are the words of Cardinal O'Connell. There is but one sentiment permissible today, he says, and that sentiment is absolute unity. "We are of all races; today we are one—Americans. Whatever we can do in honor and justice, that we must in conscience do to defeat our enemies and make our flag triumphant." In the midst of Holy Week's solemnities our Government had decreed that we are at war with Germany. In recommending this action the President had called God to witness that he "could do nothing else." His Eminence therefore makes the following application:

Cardinal O'Connell's Appeal

That these events of tremendous import to us and to the world happened while still we were upon our knees around Golgotha, only added to their tragic meaning. Our country is at war—our nation therefore needs us all, every man, woman and child of us, to strengthen her, to hearten her, and to stand faithfully by her until her hour of trial has passed and her hour of glorious triumph shall arrive. So up from our knees! Our souls have gathered strength of sacrifice from the sight of Calvary. Our hearts are only the more deeply stirred to loyalty by the sight of Him who gave Himself to death for us. God and our nation! Let us lift up that cry to Heaven.

In conclusion Cardinal O'Connell points to the glory of the risen Christ, with His lesson of courage and triumph and that "not all the riches of the world are worth a passing thought in comparison with the things that endure forever."

"The moment the President of the United States affixed his signature to the resolution of Congress all differences of opinion ceased," declares Archbishop Mundelein. The hope that the country might be saved from taking part in this world-tragedy, he says, has passed, and therefore now he himself, his 800 priests and the 1,000,000 Catholics of his archdiocese will "seriously, solidly and loyally" stand by the Government. Even before the declaration of the existence of a state of war Archbishop Moeller had specially recommended to his clergy the Ohio Catholic Women's Association for War Relief. "If war should be declared," he wrote, "we are sure that Catholics will conscientiously do their duty and never be wanting in patriotism and loyalty during the awful crisis." Archbishop Prendergast, in turn, recalled to his priests the noble and heroic part which our fathers in the Faith had taken "in establishing and maintaining this home of freedom," and prayed that we too would be as ready as they to stake on the cause "our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor." In a discourse on "Patriotism" delivered by Archbishop Ireland in his Cathedral at St. Paul, he declared:

Words from Catholic Archbishops

When America sounds its bugle call we are all Americans, Americans by birth or Americans by the sacred oath we one day pronounced. Years ago we were Irishmen, Germans and Frenchmen; today we are all Americans. Americans we are resolved to be forevermore. The words of St. Paul, "Let everyone be subject to the higher powers," tell us of our duties to our country. . . Today we defy the men who belie us. and challenge them to equal us in sacrifice, to be as quick as we are to rally to the voice of the President of the United States.

Special prayers and devotions have already been ordered in various dioceses, for it is with sad hearts that all contemplate the inevitable miseries of war. "May the echoes of our sorrowing hearts ascend to the Sacred and Adorable Heart of Jesus," pleads Archbishop Moeller, that it may vouchsafe in its infinite mercy "to reunite all nations in one great Christian brotherhood."

The War.—During the week the British have achieved very important successes on the Western front. Their attack was made in three principal sectors. In the most northern of these they took Loos, Cité St. Pierre and Liéwin, and have entered the outskirts of Lens, which is now seriously in danger. In the second sector, which extends from Givency-en-Gobelle to Croisilles, they began by storming the western and southern slopes of the strong Vimy Ridge; later they carried by assault the northern slopes and eventually their offensive carried them about two miles and a half beyond the ridge and resulted in the capture of Givency-en-Gobelle, Petit Vimy and Vimy. This dominating position secured, they forced the Germans to retire from the line south of the ridge on a front of almost twenty miles. As a consequence the British occupied Willeral, Bailleul, Fampoux, Monchy, Guemappe and Reninel. The third sector is further south and runs from Ruyaulcourt to the outskirts of St. Quentin. Here the British took Metz-en-Couture, Gouzeaucourt, Epehy, Lempire, Hargicourt, Le Verguier, Gricourt and Fayet. At the last named place they are only 400 yards from St. Quentin.

Bulletin, April 9, p.m.-April 16, a.m.

The French have made important, though less spectacular gains. They have advanced in the region northeast of Soissons, reaching the western edge of the upper Coucy Forest and pushing forward beyond the eastern edge of the lower portion of the same forest. In Belgium the Germans have evacuated Dixmude. In Mesopotamia the British are still pressing hard on the Turks. Near Khanikin they have occupied Kizil Robat, and further west, near Deli Abbas, they have taken Balad and Herbe.

On April 8 the Minister of Foreign Affairs at Vienna informed Mr. Joseph C. Grew, the American Chargé d'Affaires, who has been acting in place of Ambassador Penfield, that diplomatic relations had been severed between Austria and the United States. The information was communicated in the following note, signed by Count Czernin, the Austrian Minister for Foreign Affairs:

Austria Severs Relations

Since the United States of America has declared a state of war to exist between it and the Imperial German Government, Austria-Hungary, as allies of the German Empire, have decided to break off diplomatic relations with the United States, and the Imperial and Royal embassy at Washington has been instructed to inform the Department of State to that effect. While regretting under these circumstances to see a termination of the personal relations which he has had the honor to hold with the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America, the undersigned does not fail to place at the former's disposal herewith the passport for the departure from Austria-Hungary of himself and the other members of the embassy. At the same time the undersigned avails himself of the opportunity to renew to the Chargé d'Affaires the expression of his most perfect consideration.

The next day, April 9, Baron Erich Zwiedinek, the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires at Washington informed the State Department that he had been instructed by his Government to ask for passports for himself and the entire Austrian consular force in this country. The Treasury Department at once ordered the seizure of all Austrian vessels in American ports. Fourteen ships, aggregating a tonnage of 67,807 tons, were taken over and their crews interned.

Holland has decided to continue her stand of strict neutrality. Spain issued a decree to the same effect, but the subsequent sinking of a Spanish ship by a German submarine has again thrown the country into a state of unrest. Sweden has officially informed Ambassador Morris that that country intends to preserve the strict neutrality proclaimed at the beginning of the war. Of the Latin-American countries, Argentina, while not going to the length of breaking relations with Germany, has abstained from any declaration of neutrality and has formally indorsed the principles that led the United States to declare war. Germany has demanded an explanation of her statement. Costa Rica has sent a similar official indorsement to the United States and has declared that she is willing to prove by action the sincerity of her approval. Chile and Uruguay have declared for neutrality. Paraguay has officially voiced her sympathy with the action of the United States. Peru has done nothing except to send a special naval commissioner to Washington. Guatemala has proclaimed martial law throughout the country and Nicaragua has refrained from official action. Mexico while preparing for national defense, has signified her intention of not participating in the struggle, but has deferred official action until Congress convenes.

Brazil and Bolivia have severed diplomatic relations with Germany, and Austria with Brazil. It is reported that Bulgaria has dismissed the American Minister, but the report has not been officially confirmed at Washington.

President Wilson, on April 16, issued a proclamation to his fellow-countrymen in which, after touching on the nobility of the cause in which we are engaged and the efforts which are being made by the Administration to prepare the army and navy, he pointed out the important work to be done far from the scene of conflict. He pleaded for cooperation of all the industrial forces of the nation, which he called the "great international, service army." To the farmers, middlemen and railroadmen in particular he made an earnest appeal for unified efforts to obtain the highest possible efficiency in the production and transportation of supplies, and to all the people he recommended the practice of strict economy.

The President's Proclamation

The Government is making far-reaching and thorough preparations for war. Profiting by the experience of the European nations, the United States has appointed through the Council of National Defense, a general munitions board, at the head of which is Mr. Frank A. Scott, a munitions expert. Associated with him are other civilians, and representatives of both army and navy. The board is similar in scope to the office of Minister of Munitions in Europe, but must submit contracts for final approbation to the Board of National Defense.

New Boards Appointed

A railroad war board has also been appointed to facilitate the transportation of troops and supplies during the duration of the war. The railroads have pledged themselves "to coordinate their operations in a continental railway system, merging during such period all their merely individual and competitive activities in the effort to produce a maximum of national transportation efficiency." The board which is called the Central Executive Committee, and has as chairman Mr. Fairfax Harrison, was nominated by the Special Committee on National Defense of the American Railway Association.

The Council of National Defense has also appointed a food board to supervise and regulate the production and distribution of food supplies. The chairmanship of the board has been accepted by Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, head of the American Commission for Relief in Belgium. Both Mr. Hoover and his colleagues, who until recently were laboring in Belgium, are making a thorough study of the methods of food regulation now in force in Europe.

Another board, entitled the "Committee on Public Information," has been named by President Wilson. It is composed of Secretaries Lansing, Baker and Daniels; Mr. George Creel has accepted the post of civilian chairman and as his task has to direct the execution of its orders. The function of the board is to safeguard secrets of value to the enemy and to see that the affairs of the nation are laid before the people as frankly and fully as possible.

The first step taken by Congress since the severance of diplomatic relations towards financing the war was the introduction into the House of a bill authorizing the issue of bonds to the value of $5,000,000,000, and of Treasury certificates of indebtedness to the value of $2,000,000,000. The measure was reported favorably by Mr. Kitchin, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, after a unanimous vote by the committee. The bill provided that both bonds and certificates should bear interest at three and one-half per cent and be convertible into higher rates should subsequent issues bear higher rates; and that three-fifths of the bond issue, that is $3,000,000,000, should be used at the discretion of the President in the purchase of bonds to be issued by unnamed foreign governments. The only serious opposition to the bill was caused by the vagueness of the term "unnamed foreign governments." This was amended, after a conference between Secretary McAdoo and Representative Lenroot, so as to designate foreign governments which are now or in the future shall be at war with enemies of the United States.

Financing the War

As so amended, the bill, with several other minor modifications, was passed without a dissenting voice by a vote of 389. Prior to the announcement of the vote the two leaders in the House announced that all the absent members would have voted for the measure had they been able to attend. On final approval, the bill will put into the hands of the President power which will enable his representatives to exert very strong influence in the war council, soon to take place at Washington, at which commissions from Great Britain and France, headed by Mr. Balfour and M. Viviani respectively, will confer with a commission from the United States.

An official statement published at Washigton states that German submarines had sunk 686 neutral vessels from the beginning of the war up to April 3; seventy-nine other neutral vessels were attacked but succeeded in escaping. The heaviest losses were sustained by Norway with a total of 410 ships sunk and 312 lives lost. The United States lost 19 ships and about 250 lives. To safeguard American shipping, the President has issued stringent harbor regulations for all the ports under the American flag.

Russia.—The revolution is still progressing quietly. The deposed Czar and his wife who are prisoners in the palace of Tsarskoe-Selo, have been isolated, all their attendants being incarcerated elsewhere. Religious liberty has been granted by the Provisional Government. Thousands of political exiles are returning by sledge from the mines and convict-settlements of Siberia. Five days after the triumph of the revolution 6,000 exiles entered Irkutsk, and there are said to be 100,000 Russians in Siberia whom the amnesty decree of the Provisional Government has set at liberty. A delegation from the army at the front was introduced to the Duma on April 6 and expressed regret that a resolution offered by the Workmen's and Soldiers' Council is causing misunderstandings in the army. "We have recognized the Provisional Government," they protested, "and sworn allegiance to it and in the domain of reform it is our duty to be guided by it alone and regard the orders, laws and decisions emanating from it as the only official ones."

The Progress of Freedom

Dispatches from Petrograd dated April 14 announced that "Present tendencies of public opinion in Petrograd, Moscow and the Russian provinces clearly point to the probable establishment of a Russian republic. Pending the convocation of a constitutional assembly the position of the Provisional Government is noncommittal." But earlier advices reported that outside the capital a monarchical form of government is believed to be the only kind that would be successful in Russia. Just now four institutions are exercising partly legislative, partly executive powers in the country, namely: the Provisional Government, the Executive Committee of the Duma, the Military Commission and the Committee of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates. The latter body is made up largely of radical Socialists who tried, without success, to secure control by violence of the Duma and the Provisional Government. The Constitutional Democratic party, which favors a republic, recently adopted a resolution urging the establishment of a parliamentary form of government, and that all land should be handed over to the working classes.

Republic or Monarchy?

Premier Lvoff, President of the Council, has issued a proclamation declaring that:

> Free Russia does not aim at the domination of other nations, at depriving them of their national patrimony, or at occupying by force foreign territories, but that its object is to establish a durable peace on the rights of nations to decide their own destiny. . The Provisional Government feels that it has no right to hide the truth. The state is in danger, and it is necessary to employ all our powers to save it. . . . The old régime left Russia in a sadly disorganized condition, especially in the matter of finance, food supply, transport, and munitions.

"The Party of the Fatherland and the Army" which includes most of the Petrograd garrison, has passed a resolution urging "the continuance of the war to a victorious conclusion, namely, a peace restoring the ancient frontiers of Russia and free Poland, including the German and Russian territory." In reply to the question "How can America help Russia most in the present crisis?" the Premier is reported to have answered:

> It is not men that Russia needs, but the means of keeping her armies at the front and in proper fighting trim, under efficient transport managers. We need railroad locomotives, cars, and tracks, for example, as much as ammunition. We need railroad experts to deliver ammunition promptly at required points as much as we do artillery. We need American equipment under the direction of quick American methods.

Apropos of the United States' entrance into the war, Premier Lvoff sent to the American people a message in which he said:

> The news of the entry of the United States into the war, in defense of principles common to all free peoples, was received by me personally and by the Russian nation with the liveliest satisfaction, pride, and hope. We interpret it as foreshadowing full and solid action with the Allies and as removing the last doubts as to victory. It is impossible to exaggerate its importance, either from the military or political standpoint. Considered from the military standpoint, I am convinced that it will materially hasten the final triumph of the Allies; from a political standpoint it guarantees a satisfactory and lasting solution of the world problems which will arise for settlement when the hour of peace negotiations strikes. Its moral significance is tremendous. Coming after the magic transformation of Russia from an Asiatic despotism to an ultra-progressive democracy, it emphasizes the already observed fact that all the world's great free nations feel and think in common on international problems.

He regards America's appearance as the latest "champion of the world's liberties" to be a "potent pledge" of Russia's "complete regeneration."

Spain.—Vigorous measures adopted by the Government have checked the recent agitation which, according to some reports, had assumed a revolutionary aspect. Premier Romanones, however, in a formal statement, has declared that the Government refused to treat the movement as revolutionary.

Outbreak Checked

The troubles were based on a manifesto signed by twenty-six heads of labor organizations. The manifesto recited the grievances of the workmen, attacked the present form of government and announced that a general strike would be called. The demand for a change in the form of government was regarded as more serious than the threat of a strike, owing to the unrest that followed upon the upheaval in Russia, and the Government decided upon drastic measures. Sixteen of the leaders who signed the manifesto were arrested, and charged with seditious utterances. The labor exchanges in Madrid and the provinces were closed, and a royal decree was issued virtually placing the country under martial law, thus nullifying the movement.

The East Judges the West

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D.

AS is so often the case, it seems very probable that the poetry of the Indian poet, Rabindranath Tagore, which has been most popular, especially with our people, has been perhaps least worthy of him. Western readers of relaxed fiber themselves have grasped eagerly at some of the Orientalism of the Eastern poet so susceptible of varied interpretations. And from the poems they have taken what would apparently justify their own complacent feelings toward the duties and responsibilities of life. Despite this there seems no doubt that the Indian poet, whom his compatriots look upon as their highest intellectual representative, can both think unerringly on difficult problems and express the thoughts that come to him with a vigor and precision that leave no doubt of his meaning.

Since the war he has been visiting the West and has been deeply impressed by the cataclysm that bids fair to ruin our civilization. With poetic insight, he has formulated his conclusions about the actual significance of the great Occidental conflict in very striking terms. After reading some of these expressions it is much easier to understand why he was given the Nobel Prize for literature a few years ago. Manifestly it was not merely because the committee of award, unable to find a really great literary man in Europe, turned with relief to India to crown the one prominent writer of poetry there who was known beyond the bounds of his country.

Some recent writing of Tagore shows clearly that it was no mere chance that sent the Nobel Prize to India. He can see the meaning below the surface of things much more clearly than most of our Western philosophers and poets.

In the current Atlantic Monthly he calls attention to the fact that this war should show the people of the world that "Europe owes all her greatness in humanity to that period of discipline, the discipline of the man in his human integrity," which constituted so important a feature of life during the time so often contemptuously referred to as the Middle Ages. Tagore formulated what so many in the West have failed to grasp, the fact that "In your medieval age in Europe the simple and the natural man with all his violent passions and desires was engaged in trying to find out a reconciliation in the conflict between the flesh and the spirit. All through the turbulent career of her vigorous youth the temporal and the spiritual forces both acted strongly upon her nature and were molding it into completeness of moral personality."

The Oriental poet has naturally nothing but the bitterest condemnation for that desperate struggle for existence, supposed to be the last word of science, which has characterized European life during recent generations. The ruthless barbarism on account of which small defenseless nations have had to suffer the severest trials and hardships at the hands of the larger nations, is the special subject of Tagore's deprecation. Above all he desires to know why a nation must organize all its material resources in order to be ready to resist the aggression of a stronger, yet civilized, nation. He writes:

> But you say, "That does not matter. The unfit must go to the wall—they shall die; and this is science."
> Now, for the sake of your own salvation, I say, they shall live; and this is truth. It is extremely bold of me to say so, but I assert that man's world is a moral world, not because we blindly agree to believe it, but because it is so in truth which would be dangerous for us to ignore. And this moral nature of man cannot be divided into convenient compartments for its preservation. You cannot accept it for home consumption and ignore it abroad.

He recognizes very clearly the root-cause of the present gigantic struggle in Europe and, while he does not mention Christianity, he makes it clear that neglect of moral forces which ultimately depend upon Christianity is the cause of our present difficulty. Above all he deprecates the hoarding of wealth which is now feeding the fires that are consuming the world. We were very proud of all that wealth. There were some who thought it a very special blessing of God. Some Catholics have even thought that they should defend Catholicism against the aspersion presumedly cast on the Church by the fact that the Protestant nations in Europe were, as a rule, much richer than the Catholic nations. It was as if the Lord had said in Scriptures, "For money is the greatest blessing of all and lo, I will bestow it on those whom I love and who do My will." Rabindranath Tagore, however, has something very different to say, for he remarks:

> Has not this truth already come home to you now, when this cruel war has driven its claws into the vitals of Europe, when her hoard of wealth is bursting into smoke and her humanity is shattered into bits on her battlefields? You ask in amazement what she has done to deserve this? The answer is, that the West has been systematically petrifying her moral nature in order to lay a solid foundation for her gigantic abstractions of efficiency. She has all along been starving the life of the personal man into that of the professional.

The Indian poet measures the complacent optimism of our civilization with fine appreciation of its real significance. The "disharmonies of life" is a term Metchnikoff made familiar, mainly in relation to man's body and its health. The Oriental scholar calls attention to the fact that disharmonies between man's body and soul are still more important, though we have lost sight of them. He declares:

Of this present disharmony in man's nature the West seems to have been blissfully unconscious. The enormity of its material success has diverted all its attention toward self-congratulation on its bulk. The optimism of its logic goes on basing the calculations of its good fortune upon the indefinite prolongation of its railway lines toward eternity. It is superficial enough to think that all tomorrows are merely todays with the repeated additions of twenty-four hours. It has no fear of the chasm, which is opening wider every day, between man's overgrowing storehouses and the emptiness of his hungry humanity.

Perhaps in the light of these judgments from afar, almost beyond the din of battle and the smoke of conflict, the meaning of the great war, the greatest war of human history, may become more clear. At about the middle of the Civil War, Lincoln said: "Perhaps in the order of Providence this great war will not end until for every drop of negro blood shed by the lash a drop of free white blood shall be shed in compensation." Preceding American generations had allowed a great social wrong to go on and the social order had to be vindicated. Does the violated social order require another vindication, and can the moral order be reinstated only after severe trials have restablished its significance? Might one venture to say that perhaps this war will not end until for every dollar made at the expense of the moral order two shall have been spent on war costs? Do we need for this the discipline so characteristic of the medieval period, the discipline of the whole man, body and soul, such as comes in war-time? Will the war be after all a blessing in disguise, one of "the happy faults" that Providence takes advantage of to give a series of generations a new impulse to a higher and better life?

A League to Enforce Peace

CHARLES G. FENWICK, PH.D.

THE existing system of international law rests upon the theory that the States of the world are a group of sovereign and independent units, equal in respect to legal rights and free of control in the determination of their domestic and foreign policies. This theory, of course, does not conform to the facts on all points, just as the abstract principle of an individual's personal liberty of action is seriously qualified by the circumstances and conditions under which he lives.

In the absence of any higher power exercising authority over the nations a State is in theory, true or false, free to be the arbiter of its own disputes with other States, free to pursue its own aims without consultation of its neighbor's interests, free indeed to break its engagements and to override the rights of another State when that State is physically unable to resist, free to go to war for the enforcement of its rights and the redress of its wrongs. But in fact a State cannot as a rule do such things. It lives in a world where it cannot safely play the outlaw without alienating the sympathies of other nations and possibly ranging them on the side of the special victim of its unlawful conduct. Thus while there is no supra-national power to control a State's action, there is what may be at times an equally effective sanction of good conduct in the possible co-operation of a number of nations against it. This is a material fact of great significance in a world where the strength of the leading nations is about evenly balanced. In consequence, international law has always had some measure of effective sanction in the public opinion of the civilized world.

But this public opinion has worked with great unevenness, at times exercising a controlling influence to restrain a nation from illegal acts, at other times scarcely able to make itself felt, and again collapsing completely, as at the beginning of the present war.

Something more is needed, therefore, than the mere unorganized public opinion of the nations to secure an effective sanction for the observance of international law. There must be some co-ordinated action on the part of the great body of nations to restrain an individual offender against the law. There is need of a federation of all civilized States for the common purpose of securing the peace of the world. Such a federation would, of course, differ radically from the world-empire which was the ideal of the thirteenth century. It would be a group of sovereign States united together for a common interest and constituting by the fact of their union a higher authority and power than any of them individually possesses; it would not involve their submission to any external authority or any loss of their individual control over their domestic affairs; it would be a union of equals.

It is not the first time in history that a federation of nations has been contemplated as the basis of international peace. As early as 1623 Emeric Crucé proposed that differences between nations should be settled by an international council sitting at Venice and acting, as it were, as a guarantor of peace. In 1693 William Penn proposed the establishment of a European parliament which should compel the submission of outstanding disputes and enforce obedience to the decisions rendered. In 1713 the Abbé St. Pierre proposed a modification of an earlier peace project of Henry IV of France. Similar projects were put forward by Rousseau, Franklin, Kant, Bentham, and other statesmen and men of letters, not to mention the appeals of successive popes for a peace based upon greater Christian unity.

A more definite step towards international organization seemed to be taken in the gathering of the two Hague Conferences. The call for the first Conference, issued by the Czar of Russia in 1898, voiced a desire for "the maintenance of the general peace and a possible reduction of the excessive armaments which were burdening all nations." But the Conference of 1899 could do no more than adopt an elaborate arbitral procedure of a purely voluntary character. An effort was made by Russia to secure the adoption of a provision for obligatory arbitration within a limited field, but the opposition of Germany defeated the project. Again in 1907 at the second Hague Conference obligatory arbitration was urged by the American and British delegations, but again it was defeated by the opposition of two of the Great Powers, although the vote stood thirty-two to nine in favor of it. At neither conference, however, was there any intention on the part of the nations to impose upon themselves anything more than a moral obligation to submit their disputes to arbitration, and this moral obligation, although not in the solemn form of a contract, existed of course independently of a deliberate affirmation of it.

The present war by its very magnitude and by the almost irresistible manner in which it has drawn one nation after another into the conflict has made the need of international reorganization more urgent than ever. What was ridiculed three years ago as the idealism of the pacifist is now discussed by sober statesmen as a definite possibility. To take as an instance the most widely known of the many proposals now offered on all sides for the reconstruction of international relations, there was formed in Philadelphia on June 17, 1915, the League to Enforce Peace. The League proposes that all disputes arising between nations shall be submitted to a judicial tribunal or to a council of conciliation, according to their character; and in order to secure such submission the signatory powers are to agree to use jointly their economic and military forces against any one of their number that goes to war against another of the signatories without first submitting its case according to the agreement. Nothing is said about the method of enforcing the award of the court or the recommendation of the council, and it appears to be felt that public opinion can be counted upon in most cases to accomplish that end.

Doubtless the program of the League is no more than a tentative one subject to such amendments as further discussion will show desirable. It is, as it were, a working basis for the propaganda of an ideal, not a final and definitive rule of proceeding, as some of its critics would seem to think. The functions to be exercised by the international court are analogous to those of the Supreme Court of the United States, except in so far as in the latter case the executive power of the Government not only compels submission of the dispute to the Court but obedience to its award. The international court will hear all cases which are justiciable in character, that is, cases such as boundary disputes and disputes relating to the interpretation of treaties, to which the established principles of law and equity can be applied. On the other hand questions of a political character, such as the conflict of commercial policies or the exclusion of certain aliens from citizenship, for which no fixed law has as yet been developed, will be brought before the council of conciliation for hearing, consideration, and recommendation.

The establishment of a league of peace is, it is to be noted, a political problem entirely distinct from the moral problem which relates to the possibility of attaining that greater self-restraint on the part of nations which is needed to bring about an adjustment of national aspirations and conflicting policies. It bears the same relation to the morality of nations that the judicial organization of the State itself bears to the private morality of individuals. In other words, the political organization assumes the moral law as a necessary postulate without which it could not hope to be effective. A league of peace is not, therefore, an attempt to replace the principles of justice between nations by an international armed force capable of tyrannizing over the small States. Rather it rests upon cooperation to promote justice as the very condition of its existence, for lacking that basis it is inevitable that factions would spring up within the league, and we should have over again Alliance set against Entente, as at the outbreak of the present war.

The Origin of Human Life

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

DR. MUTTKOWSKI, Instructor in Zoology in the University of Missouri, offered in AMERICA, March 24, a differentiation theory as to the time and stage in the development of the human embryo when the soul is infused. He is inclined to the opinion that the soul is not present in the primordial cell, as I said, but comes in when the embryo has arrived at "about the morula stage." The morula, morum, a mulberry, from the appearance, is a clump of cells within the somewhat expanded wall of the fecundated ovum. No embryologist has yet seen a human ovum in the morula stage; the earliest human embryo observed was found by Teacher and Bryce in 1908, and it was twelve days old; it was nearly the size of the lower case m in this type, and it was in the fifth stage of development. The morula is the first stage. Dr. Muttkowski, then, would have the human soul infused at about the third day of gestation; I think it is infused within three hours after the germ nuclei unite, reasoning by analogy, so far as the three hours are concerned, from the beginning of the process of segmentation as observed in lower mammals. Dr. Muttkowski's argument is erroneous in its biological data and its philosophical deductions.

His argument begins with the statement that he thinks one of the most difficult problems in biology is the definition of an individual. He cites the example of the shaken or cut sea-urchin embryo, the separated cells of which develop into "complete" adults, and thus a fertilized egg is potentially many individuals. He says "this experiment may be continued until the 64-cell stage of the embryo, I believe." A like result, he says, is obtained if a starfish, an echinoderm like the sea-urchin, is cut into pieces containing part of the central disc. Again, if an ascidian, a very low-grade, almost microscopic, form of animal life, is divided through the gill sac, the pieces "grow into individuals." A somewhat similar result is possible if we separate the two cells of a frog embryo in the two-cell stage. In the armadillo a single egg divides into four at the blastula stage, just beyond the morula stage, and becomes four armadillos.

Professon Conklin of Princeton University, one of the greatest living authorities in biology, said in a letter to me: "The germ cells are alive just as certainly as is the embryo or the adult into which they develop. Differentiation does not begin at the morula stage, but at the first cleavage of the egg, and indeed some differentiations, such as polarity and symmetry, appear before the fertilization of the egg. It is now well-known to all embryologists that the capacity of the fragments of the sea-urchin egg to give rise to whole larvae is due to the power of regeneration in that animal, and is wholly comparable to the capacity of a hydra or a plannarian to regenerate the entire organism from a fragment of an adult body." The cut ascidian restores its parts, technically, "regenerates," just as the hydra, plannarian, or sea-urchin does. Dr. Muttkowski says that if we destroy one of the two cells of a frog embryo in the two-cell stage, the resulting tadpole is half the normal size, and if the dead cell is completely removed, a whole frog results. This is not true unless inversion is done after the cell has been destroyed or shaken off. The position of the blastomeres is most important in development. The notion that we can get "64 complete adults from the 64-cell stage" of a sea-urchin is now disproved and obsolete, and that error was based upon incorrect observations taken in earlier work. Driesch himself, whom Dr. Muttkowski quotes, Morgan, and others have demonstrated that you cannot get a whole larva from an isolated cell later than the four-cell stage, and that is before the morula is formed at all. The basic biologic postulate of Dr. Muttkowski's argument is therefore false.

It is true that if the embryos below the four-cell stage of certain very low forms of animal life are divided, two or three dwarfed animals may result, provided proper inversion is done; but this is all irrelevant to the question at issue, and that from a psychological point of view. What Dr. Muttkowski draws attention to is the well-known fact that the vital principle in the lower animals is toto coelo different from the vital principle in man. The vital principle of the former is not a spiritual substantial principle as the human soul is. The vital principle of a brute is a substantial form, not accidental; it exists immersed in matter in the organic body, and is distinguishable from the matter of that body, but not completely and perfectly distinguishable as the human soul is. The brute's vital principle is simple, otherwise the brute could not perceive anything, and that principle together with the animal organism makes up one essence, but there are various kinds of simplicity. Simplicity may be negative or positive, entitative, natural, perfect or imperfect. A negatively simple thing cannot be divided in itself, but it can be divided with the matter in which it exists. A positively simple thing is either absolutely indivisible, or it is divisible in ratio to the degree of positive simplicity it possesses. That, however, which is entitatively simple, as is the human soul, is absolutely indivisible, because it has no parts; hence it is not divided even at somatic death. A naturally simple thing, as the vital principal of the higher orders of brutes, is indivisible solely because division destroys it. Imperfect simplicity, on the other hand, is found in low orders of life like plants, sea-urchins, starfishes, and so on, and division up to a certain degree is possible. [Cf. St. Thomas's "Commentary on Aristotle," I, 2, De Anima, lect. 4; and I, dist. viii, Q. 5, a. 3, ad 2.] One then may make slips of a starfish as a gardener does of certain plants, and the starfish or sea-urchin may thus, from one point of view, be potentially multiplex, although it merely restores itself; but all this has no more connection with the argument for the advent of the human soul than with the nebular hypothesis.

A human vital principle is never potentially multiplex, but Dr. Muttkowski thinks it is up to the morula stage because sea-urchins and similar low grades of animal life are potentially multiplex up to the morula stage, although as a matter of fact they are not, and because the human embryo is thus potentially multiplex, although it is not, we must wait until it is fixed in individuality before the infusion of the human soul. That is, the human embryo is some kind of unclassified animal before the morula stage, and then the tardily incoming human soul turns it into a human being. The human soul thus becomes an efficient cause although we know the human soul is a formal cause.

Secondly, Dr. Muttkowski takes the example of the so-called identical or unioval twins. He says: "The supposition is that, as in the case of the sea-urchin embryo, the two cells of the two-cell stage failed to adhere to each other, with the result that each cell being equipotential, a complete embryo and later adult was formed from each cell." He further acknowledges that this supposition is "not capable of demonstration or experimental proof," but stands wholly on analogy with sea-urchins and similar low forms of animal life. Three paragraphs farther on he progresses so far that he accepts this analogy as an actual fact, and reasons from that gratuitous assumption.

In the first place the sea-urchin's cells are divisible only by artificial violence in the laboratory, which cannot occur in the human being, therefore I deny the whole supposition. Again, this absolutely theoretic and unproved assumption is only one guess at the origin of identical twins. Another theory is that two distinct ova have been fecundated. A third theory is that both these assumptions are false and that identical twins grow from a double-yolked single egg, as we get at times two chickens from a double-yolked hen egg. This last theory has the merit of some proof because double-yolked human ova have been actually seen by Kölliker, Stöckel, and Von Franque. Because twins at times resemble each other very closely in physical appearance, someone, to explain this accidental resemblance, suggested without any proof that they are the product of one split ovum. Any theory among a certain class of physical scientists repeated often enough with assurance becomes fact; witness the various evolution myths. Dr. Muttkowski himself passes from conjectured theory to accepted fact in the unioval twin matter in three short paragraphs. I deny that any pair of so-called identical human twins ever came from a single ovum with one germinal spot. This guess is as groundless as Weismann's childish fairy story about ids, determinants and biophors; moreover, it is in conflict with the notion of the nature of the human soul, a fundamental principle of Catholic philosophy.

In disputing any question there are two methods of dealing with the adversary. One is the honest, scholarly method. It states the opponent's argument, grants what cannot be refuted, and rejects what is erroneous. The second method is, first, to ignore the whole argument of the adversary, no matter how solid it may be, and to deny the conclusions although these conclusions are strictly logical; and secondly, to fill up space thereafter with men of straw, new irrelevant matter, foolish remarks about the flatness of the earth, St. Thomas's knowledge of Greek arguments he never heard of, et id genus omne. This is the method of men trying for points in a boxing match, not of seekers for truth. Because this second method has been used against me I am forced to repeat ad nauseam the outline of the original argument. The living zygote is certainly the first stage of the human embryo; in its cytoplasm and nucleus it has ample organism for carrying on vital metabolism; it receives and assimilates food, it carries in its chromosomes the heredity of the ages, the physical visitations of God unto the third and fourth generation, the material part of a Shakespeare, a St. Thomas, a St. Augustine; it is therefore fit for the reception of the human soul; it therefore at once receives the soul because God does nothing in vain, and the interpolation of inferior vital forms is a vain work. Why, then, bring in this morula affair, which is even bad biology?

Mr. Stuntz and "Cardinal" Liguori

RICHARD H. TIERNEY, S.J.

MR. STUNTZ is a Methodist Bishop of queer tendencies and queerer actions. His see is South America, a tight little continent with an area of only 7,570,015 square miles and a sparse population of 55,779,000 people. Over this insignificant place the Bishop, clad much like a Romish priest, holds spiritual sway. Its mountains and valleys, its capes and islands, its lakes and rivers, including the "River of Doubt," have felt the inspiration of his presence, even though his Papal clothes, worn only in South America, sit upon him uncomfortably, as if he realized they had been diverted from the holy office of clothing a good Papist.

Mr. Stuntz's task is prodigious, but he is equal to it. He had not been in his see long, before he knew about everything and everybody there. His knowledge covered the widest possible range, but, as was to be expected from a man of his position and attainments, he specialized in Romish scandals. And, true to his obligation of breaking the Bread of Life to the hungry, he spread the glad word far and wide. Of course his zeal involved him in difficulties. But what are difficulties to a man of his versatile genius?

Not long since he characterized Fray Mocho, of Buenos Aires, as a "weekly comic paper like the Asino of Rome . . . maintained partly for the purpose of ridiculing friars, priests and the Catholic faith in general. This paper," declared Stuntz, "is hostile to Christianity, as it is represented by the Roman Church. . . . Its cartoons are leveled at immoral and medieval priestly leadership." These perfectly plain words of the near-ecumenical prelate were read by one of his strayed and erring diocesans, Mr. C. Puig Corradino, advertising manager of Fray Mocho. The effect was instantaneous, an indignant letter to AMERICA, denying every one of Mr. Stuntz's assertions. "We can categorically state," wrote the offended manager, "that the pages of Fray Mocho have never contained an attack direct or indirect against Catholicism or against the clergy." As if this were not enough, another correspondent took up his flaming pen and declared that "It is singularly unfair to compare Fray Mocho with L'Asino of Rome. The comparison is as unjust as if your Saturday Evening Post were compared with the Menace. . . . Under separate cover I am sending you a copy of the current issue, and I am sure that you will find nothing in its pages derogatory to Catholicism." And the Bishop was silent, until the General Conference, if that name be correct, held at Saratoga, last summer. Then he opened his mouth, not to explain how he made so strange a mistake about Fray Mocho, but to tell his audience a most amazing story about a Romish bishop who caused thirty stalwart Peruvian Protestants, men and women, "to be tied to a rope and marched through the streets to the common jail." Charity, no doubt, impelled Mr. Stuntz to omit the wicked prelate's name. As a consequence, he cannot be placed, but he must be a real monster with six hoofs and three horns. He even perverted the function of a rope by tying people to it, not by it. Wretched man!

But, despite appearance to the contrary, let no one think that the Bishop of all South America is not an exact scholar, profound in thought and careful in statement. In the first place his name is Homer, and in the second place he writes text-books for missionary schools. What better recommendations could he have? Poetry, eloquence, truth, scholarship, sanctity are connoted by the name and work.

Providentially or otherwise this work imposed upon him the unpleasant task of exposing the corruptions of Rome. How well fitted he is for the office is clear from the already quoted examples of his transparent probity. No Romanist but may profit by his scholarship and truthfulness. His latest book, "South American Neighbors" illustrates his temper and methods almost as well as his words about Fray Mocho. An example in point is contained in the chapter on the "Evangelical Message and Method." Therein the scholarly, sanctified author tells his readers that "the doctrine of the double sense" is one of the Roman errors that zealous Protestant missionaries will have to combat successfully before they can bring Latin Americans to a proper realization of "the seriousness of sin in the sight of God." Lofty words these! What follows? Would you believe it? "Cardinal" S. Alfonso Maria de Liguori, friend of Robert E. Speer, of 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Once again the Cardinal is trotted in, this time rather cleverly, for Mr. Stuntz is a bishop, Robert E. Speer is not. The stage is set, the curtain is rung up and the villainous Count Guido Franceschini, a character from the "Ring and the Book," "secretary to Rome's most productive plant—a cardinal," is introduced by a quotation, just for the sake of preparing the way for the next scene, by joining a cardinal with a liar and murderer. The next scene is now ready; Stuntz appears, leading "Cardinal" Liguori, all abashed at his wickedness. The degenerate Cardinal is silent, the holy Bishop speaks as follows:

> The doctrine of the "double sense." This is nothing less than teaching that deceit is justifiable under certain circumstances. Incredible as it may seem, the religious history of the Roman Church has this black mark upon it. Cardinal S. Alfonso Maria de Liguori, in his book entitled Moral Theology, teaches this perversion of Scriptural truth. He died in 1787. In 1803 the Sacred Congregation of Rites declared that "in all the writings of Alfonso de Liguori, edited and unedited, there was not a word that could be justly found fault with." Pope Pius VII ratified the Decree and made Liguori a saint less than thirty years after his death. In his book, chapter IV, page 160, we read: "If a guest is asked if his dinner is good when really it is bad, he may answer that it is good, namely (in an aside) for mortification." Again in chapter IV, page 172: "If a man makes a false promise and swears to it, what sin does he commit, and to what is he bound? . . . A man may make a false promise with an oath in three ways: 1. Not intending to swear. 2. Not intending to bind himself. 3. Not intending to fulfil the promise." Additional items are not necessary to prove this point.

Here is the whole content of the indictment: A proposition that the Roman Church teaches the "double sense;" a "proof" which does not touch the proposition even slantwise, and the assertion that the proposition is proved. An examination of the passage will add to Stuntz's reputation and to the gayety of the nation. In the first place there was no "Cardinal" Liguori; in the second place, if there had been, he would not have been the Roman Church; in the third place, Pope Pius VII did not make Liguori a saint, Gregory XVI canonized him; in the fourth place, this event did not happen less than thirty years after Liguori's death: it happened fifty-two years after his death. So far Bishop Stuntz is just 100 per cent wrong, a fair showing for a scholar of immaculate probity. Further, and this is pathetic, the Bishop speaks of the Saint's "Moral Theology" as one book or volume, with one chapter IV and one page 160, whereas in reality in all authentic editions, there are several fair sized volumes, with many chapters designated IV.

Here again the Bishop is 100 per cent wrong and 100 per cent devoid of the "double sense," a tribute which I gladly pay, even though he caused me to lose time in looking through the several chapters IV of the Ratisbon edition of St. Alphonsus, eight duodecimo volumes of some 600 pages each. Somehow the search appeared to put the Bishop in the wrong, and after much trepidation I decided to cast aside episcopal guidance and follow my own knowledge of theology. Sure enough, the Bishop was 100 per cent wrong again. The passage was in chapter II of volume I, under De Juramento. Strangest of all the Saint was misquoted. For instance in the original test there is no trace of the phrase "in an aside." That was slipped in by the consecrated hand of the Bishop. Thus a point was scored by a sleight of finger or brain. A clumsy fraud was resorted to in order to picture a sly-faced old man clad in scarlet speaking from both ends of his mouth at once, consoling his hostess from one end, ridiculing her from the other.

Moreover, in the passage mangled by Mr. Stuntz, St. Alphonsus simply records the practice of gentlemen, in every-day life. In other words he approves of "Not at home," "Delighted to see you," and so on. The Bishop of South America reprobates this. He goes through life telling his hostesses that their dinners are the vilest things he ever attended, that their music is excruciating; and when a sinner tells him his tale of woe in confidence Mr. Stuntz repeats it to the unfortunate man's wife, as soon as she questions him. This singular absence of the double sense makes it extremely difficult to explain the corruption of St. Liguori's text and the charge against Fray Mocho.

But a greater difficulty is to come. By suppression and distortion of words Mr. Stuntz actually makes St. Alphonsus teach that a false oath is entirely legitimate. Without a tremor he jots down the Saint's doctrine as follows: "A man may make a false promise with an oath in three ways: (1) Not intending to swear. (2) Not intending to bind himself. (3) Not intending to fulfil the promise."

Harken to the cry of horror that escapes the lips of prospective Methodist missionaries to Latin America: they tremble before the abyss of depravity into which Romanism has cast a simple people. Latin America were lost were it not for guileless, sainted folk like Bishop Stuntz. But what does St. Alphonsus say to all this? That is the question. In his "Theologia Moralis," Lib: IV, Tract: II, Cap: II,, Dub: V, Num: 172, there occurs this passage, the very one of which Mr. Stuntz fell foul.

Question: What kind of a sin does he commit who makes a false promise under oath, and to what is he bound? I distinguish. A man can [potest: not may, mark it, but can, is able to] make a false promise under oath in three ways: 1. Without the intention to swear. 2. Without the intention to bind himself. 3. Without the intention to fulfil the promise. 1. Now, if anyone takes an oath (pronounces an oath) without the intention of swearing he sins, in accordance with proposition twenty-five, condemned by Innocent XI, which declared: "For cause, it is licit to pronounce an oath without the intention to swear, whether the affair (involved) be light or grave." . . . (The Saint then discusses the nature of the sin.) 2. If anyone takes an oath without the intention of binding himself (by oath), but with the intention of fulfilling the promise, he commits a mortal sin. 3. Finally, if anyone pronounces an oath without the intention of fulfilling his promise, but with the intention of taking an oath and of binding himself, he most certainly commits a mortal sin.

In other words. St. Alphonsus teaches a doctrine directly contradictory to that attributed to him by the Methodist Bishop. In the very act of pretending to exalt the truth outraged by Rome, the Bishop is guilty of a gross calumny perpetrated by the suppression of an all-important passage—the only passage in which the Saint's opinion is contained—and by a mistranslation that is the outcome of evil prepossessions. At the risk of repetition I shall restate the case this way. St. Alphonsus puts a question about an oath; then, in order to answer intelligently, sets down the ways in which it is possible to take that oath and finally declares that all such oaths are sinful. Mr. Stuntz copies the question and then, incredible as it may seem to those who do not know him, jots down the possible ways in which the oath can, not may, be taken, as the Saint's answer to that question, suppressing altogether the real answer. That were bad enough, but the Methodist Bishop goes further and perverts the text of the portion he quotes in order to pretend that he is giving St. Alphonsus's solution. Stuntz makes the Saint approve of the oaths, the Saint himself condemns the oaths as sinful. Therefore Bishop Stuntz's achievement consists of a proposition and three calumnies.

The pall of silence may well be thrown over such moral perversion, too great for even a benighted Papist to appreciate, but not too vile to be a trait of a Methodist Bishop who prances about the world striving to get Romanists to embrace his high standard of honor. Simon Magus is not yet dead. St. Alphonsus is dead and he rests in the Bosom of God, a Saint glorified in life and death by a holiness beyond the ken of his calumniators.

The Iroquois Village at the Rapids

HENRY J. SWIFT, S.J.

VARIOUS are the motives that may draw the traveler from the "States" to Montreal, the metropolis of Canada. Religion may call him thither on his way to the world-famed shrine of St. Anne de Beaupré; business may prompt him to display his wares for Montreal's merchant princes; and the relaxation of life in the northern wilds may lure him to Montreal on his way to the Laurentians. Yea, and erstwhile there were other motives, too, but of late years the extradition laws have conspired to keep some men, widely if not altogether favorably known, far from Montreal's American colony.

But whatever be the motive for the journey, the pilgrim and the pleasure-seeker, like the commercial traveler and the lover of seclusion, if they enter Montreal by the New York Central Railway, note the striking contrast between modern Montreal with all that goes to make up a great modern hive of industry, and the quiet, almost old-fashioned village of perhaps four hundred houses which are grouped on the river bank a short distance up-stream from the city.

The village is Caughnawaga. Its inhabitants are the descendants of those members of the dread Iroquois confederacy, or Five Nations, who were converts to our holy Faith and sought under the protection of French guns safety from their pagan tribesmen, in the pursuit of the ways of peace and religion.

Caughnawaga is not of yesterday; it harks back to the time when the fleur-de-lis stood for majesty and power, and the tricolor was a thing unknown. The present site of the village was selected and occupied two full centuries ago, in 1716, namely, when the converts chose it after nearly fifty years spent in less desirable locations.

The first Catholic Iroquois to see Montreal, as far as we have been able to learn, was an Oneida chief named Peter Tonsaboten, who with his wife and five followers visited the city in 1667. It was then that the possibility of a reservation or "reduction" for converted Iroquois occurred to Peter Raffeix, a Jesuit missionary of the period, and he lost no time in putting his plan into execution. Peter and his companions having agreed to settle in the projected village, they were sent to the mission of Lorette, further down the river, where all were duly instructed through the medium of the Huron tongue, with which, as a closely related language, they were conversant. After sufficient preparation, the six converts were solemnly baptized at Quebec by Bishop Laval himself. He took the proposed reservation under his special protection and dedicated it to his own heavenly patron, St. Francis Xavier. The settlement, therefore, began with seven Oneidas; but other Iroquois, especially of the Mohawk canton, joined them in numbers so considerable, that the Mohawk dialect became and yet remains the language of the village.

The reservation of Caughnawaga consists at present of about 2,100 people of Indian blood, not one, however, it would seem, without some trace of mixture with whites. Far from being of the wigwam or tepee style, the houses are substantial structures of frame, stone, or brick with here and there a survival of the log houses of a former generation.

The reservation embraces, roughly speaking, fifty square miles of land, much of which is arable; but the Iroquois of Caughnawaga have seldom met with much success as farmers. It is for this reason that the Dominion Government permits them to let their fields to white tenants, who, however, are excluded by law from acquiring any title to the land. So there is no danger of the Indians being robbed.

Formerly, the chief occupation of the men was to wander through the country as peddlers of various gimcracks and curios; but of late years they have developed so great a fitness for bridge-building that their services are in great demand. When a span of the great Quebec bridge buckled and fell a few years ago, it carried with it into the depths of the St. Lawrence upwards of sixty Iroquois from Caughnawaga. The spelling "Caughnawaga," it may be remarked here, is an English corruption of "Kahnawaka," which signifies in Mohawk, "at the rapids." The official name of the reservation in the province of Quebec is that which it has borne from the days of the French domination, namely, Sault St. Louis, or St. Louis Rapids.

When the village of Caughnawaga was established in 1716 on its present site a few miles west of Montreal, a rather formidable stone fort was erected by the French authorities. The walls, pierced at intervals for the convenience of the musqueteers, have remained intact, though their loftiest purpose for many years has been to guard the missioner's truck-patch against the attacks of strolling cows. Within the enclosure there is still the powder magazine, its arched roof protected with several feet of earth. Venerable lilacs, their stems six inches in diameter, tell how long they have flourished above the pit where the gunpowder was stored. The missioner's supply of ice now replaces the gunpowder. The missioner's house, a substantial stone edifice has stood as we see it today, since 1716, the year in which it was built.

The church, originally completed in 1719, was enlarged in 1845. One of its bells was a gift of King William IV of Great Britain and one of its altar-pieces was presented by King Charles X of France.

The high altar with its baldachino, all of elaborately carved and gilded wood, where the French crown, the fleur-de-lis and the grape are the most conspicuous decorations, was brought from France in 1680. At the same time, the mission received from the same source a silver ostensorium which has been the only one in use from that day to this. Several crucifixes with an ivory corpus on an ebony cross also come down from the early days and are of very considerable value. For the preservation of these and other similar relics as well as the records of the mission, the Dominion Government has constructed in the missioner's house a fire-proof vault, of which the missioner is the recognized custodian.

Besides religious objects and the records of the mission, the reverend custodian has in his care some truly precious samples of Indian skill and art in the shape of richly ornamented moccasins and articles adorned with bead-work in a pleasing variety of contrasting figures and colors. Even the alms-basins for the offerings of the Faithful at the Sunday Mass are so delicately and artistically ornamented with bead-work that, though relatively "modern" and "cheap" in comparison with the carefully guarded specimens in the vault, they seem little suited to be the receptacles of mere vulgar coins of the realm.

One of the treasures of the collection is a belt of wampum about twelve inches wide and four feet long. It is composed of white and black beads so arranged and combined in a design as to be a lasting memorial, or rather a mnemonic chart, of the harangue which was made when the visitors presented the belt. Intrinsically, the material of the belt is worth little; but, as each bead was laboriously and painfully shaped and pierced by hand with the aid of crude tools, the belt represents an immense amount of time and labor.

The mission church is hardly large enough to meet the wants of the Indian congregation. Then there are their tenants, the French Canadian farmers, and to these must be added the white baker and the white blacksmith; for the Iroquois do not take kindly to the oven or to the forge. Chairs, therefore, are placed in the aisles for the accommodation of those who are on the reservation through sufferance, but the pews are for the Indians and their families.

On the epistle side of the sacred edifice, there is a life-size crucifix. It was presented by a wife and mother whose husband was one of the victims of the first Quebec bridge disaster. When the span which was being hoisted collapsed and fell, there were fewer fatalities. We may never know the "true inwardness" of either mishap, but there are vague whisperings to the effect that an auxiliary casting was imperfect, but that, as all seemed to be going very well, the two companies of men engaged in hoisting the immense mass of metal began to vie with each other in speed. Thus the span became tilted and collapse followed. Quien sabe?

From the early days of the mission, the feast of St. Francis Xavier has been observed as a holyday of obligation on the reservation. When the Indians worked for themselves at their own trades or occupations they could easily keep the holyday, which was the occasion for an elaborate church function and an imposing procession with a great display of feathers and other Indian finery; but so many of the men are now employed elsewhere that the patronal feast cannot be solemnized as of old. An official pronouncement on what is to be done in the present circumstances may have been communicated already to the dusky clients of the Apostle of the Indies.

The usual sodalities and church societies are found at Caughnawaga. With one exception, they are like those in any well organized parish, but the exception is so striking that it merits a few words. Who has not heard, now and then, from a boy who is just "blossoming out" into long "unmentionables" that he is "too big" to serve on the altar? Such boys should attend the Sunday High Mass at Caughnawaga, for there the first master of ceremonies is a spry and supple youth of some sixty-five summers and his assistant is a boy of fifty or thereabouts. Both sit in their stalls as decorous and attentive as prelates. It is the third master of ceremonies who really assists the priest and directs the acolytes. It happens that the third master of ceremonies has a twelve-year-old son among the more youthful servers.

In matters of domestic economy, the Iroquois have adapted themselves to the ways of the paleface. Their dress is that of their white brothers and sisters; of their house furniture, even including player-pianos and gramophones, the same is to be said; in their kitchens, but one strictly Indian dish remains, and this makes its appearance on Sundays and other special occasions. It is composed of maize brayed in a wooden mortar by means of a wooden pestle and cooked until it is of the consistency of thick porridge. The early American colonists called the dish samp.

It is only in their everyday life, however, that the Iroquois are content to wear the ordinary garb of the Caucasian; for, on festive occasions, men and boys, all and sundry, bring forth their headdresses of feathers, their tomahawks and their scarfs and parade in barbaric splendor through the streets of the village. One of these festive occasions is the solemnity of Corpus Christi, when there is an outdoor procession through streets and by houses decorated with flags, streamers, pictures of saints and mirrors. Of late years, so many idle spectators have been drawn to the reservation on this occasion that it may be necessary, or at least advisable, to do away with the distinctive features of the outdoor celebration.

If one were to visit the schools when the Sisters of St. Anne, salaried by the Government, teach the boys and girls of the reservation, one might well be astonished at the sight of certain names and also at the sight of those who bear them. Williams, Rice, Hill, Stacey—what have such family names in common with the Iroquois? But the mission records tell the tale of warlike marches and bloody forays and captive children.

Many will remember reading with a thrill of horror of the midnight attack in the winter of 1703-04 on the town of Deerfield, in the colony of Massachusetts, when the snow had drifted to the very top of the stockade. Then was captured and carried away a little girl some seven years of age, whose name was Eunice Williams. She was adopted into the tribe and eventually was made the wife of a chief named Arosen, that is, "Beaver." Thanks to the care and researches of the missioners, and especially of the Right Rev. L. G. Forbes, D.D., now Bishop of Joliette, Canada, the genealogy of every family name on the reservation has been traced back to its earliest appearance in the records. It was almost startling to an American to be brought face to face in 1916 with the dusky descendants of the American captive girl of 1704. One of these descendants, a boy of 14, with all the outward appearance of an Iroquois but with the well-mannered ways of a Caucasian youth of good family, is professor of Mohawk to the young Jesuit who is now qualifying to carry on the work which was begun in 1676 by the zealous Jesuit, Père Raffeix.

Considering the ease with which, in the summer, the trip can be made from Montreal to Caughnawaga, no Catholic visitor should forego assisting at the Sunday High Mass on the reservation. The congregation is a model of decorum, attentiveness and piety, as has been often remarked by non-Catholic visitors. The sermon, however, is in Mohawk, as is also nearly all the chanting done by the choir. The Asperges, the Kyrie, the Gloria, the Credo and the Agnus Dei are all heard in the choicest Mohawk from singers who follow the music composed long ago for their use. The officiating priest kneels at the altar and intones "Asknekoserawe," and sprinkles the congregation with holy water while the choir takes up and continues the chant. The vespers too, with the exception of the collect of the day, are sung in Mohawk.

The Iroquois take their religion seriously. It does not consist merely of a few pious ceremonies, but it reaches their heads and hearts and influences their conduct. In the matter of morals, the mission records show a highly satisfactory state of affairs; and the Indians on the reservation have a positive aversion to mixed marriages. There have been Indian nuns in Canada, but so far no Iroquois has been raised to the priesthood. The visit of a Chippewa Indian priest to the reservation a few months ago gave great comfort and satisfaction to the Iroquois and may, perhaps have fanned into activity the ember of priestly vocation in at least one soul. May Catherine Tekakwitha, the Lily of the Mohawks, whose relics are reverently preserved in the church of Caughnawaga, obtain this precious grace for one of their blood!

Governor Catts of Florida

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is ample proof to show that individuals of the stamp of his Excellency, Governor Catts of Florida, are the occasion or the remote cause of many ultimate conversions to the true Faith. Thousands who would otherwise remain utterly indifferent are led by such instances of blind bigotry to investigate for themselves. Persecution and intolerance have always added to the growth of the Church, just as patronizing and fraternizing have tended to weaken and retard it. Governor Catts, if he be given enough publicity, can do a great work for the Church. The correspondence between his Excellency and Mr. Francis J. Sullivan, as published in the Catholic Mind of April 8, deserves wide circulation. We are anticipating good results from the circulation of the April number of Extension, which treats of the Mexican situation. Why could not the same be done for the April 8 number of the Catholic Mind? Governor Catts is not well enough known. What I want to see is the Governor himself turning Catholic. A similar thing has happened before.

Stamford, Conn. J. H. MILLER.

A Catholic National Service Association

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the news from Washington recording the President's war message it is said that among the first to stand up and applaud his fateful word was the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who is a Catholic. That event was a symbol. It was the symbol of justice itself sealing the act of our President with its sign manual of approval. For surely in all the wars of the war-torn world none before was ever more justly waged than ours. That is the basic fact upon which all our work as citizens from now until the end will have firmest foundation and support.

A little bit further on in the same news dispatch it is said that the head of the navy board of operations was called into council. And he is a Catholic. It is the navy that in all human probability will be called upon to do the bulk of the most dangerous work of the war, and the navy throughout the whole of its service, from top to bottom, is steel-ribbed with Catholic souls.

That Catholic citizens of all degrees will be, and indeed already are, in the very front ranks of those leaping forward to serve their country in the hour of its greatest need requires no argument; the facts speak for themselves. It was, of course, only what is to be expected of men whose faith gives the most solid kind of support to patriotism and the service of their nation, and of their fellows, always and everywhere. Nor is it my purpose to call attention to such obvious facts, further than to pass on after stating them, to lay stress upon something which will instantly occur to many minds, but which requires repetition and repetition again until we act upon our thought, namely, the immediate and imperative need there is for Catholics throughout the country to organize for efficient national service.

We should immediately form throughout the length and breadth of the country, in every State, every city, every town, a well-financed, efficiently organized Catholic National Service Association, or League, call it whatever is best and handiest, for the purpose of helping Catholics who have given themselves to the national service, army, navy, civil service, hospital, everything. We must urge upon all our Catholic Senators and Congressmen and editors and public men, and upon the non-Catholics as well, that plenty of Catholic chaplains be provided for. We must see that training camps and barracks and ships and recruiting camps are supplied with Catholic literature, rosaries, medals, prayer books, above all with God's helpers, priests.

When the European war broke out I was a correspondent with the United States fleet in the Pacific, in the Mexican adventure, and for five months was stationed off the Mexican coast. There were a battleship or two, a number of cruisers, a whole fleet of torpedo boats and destroyers and repair ships and supply ships. There was a Baptist clergyman. There was an Episcopal clergyman. There were hundreds and hundreds of Catholics on all those ships, but there was no Catholic chaplain. The only person the boys had to help them look after their souls was a petty officer on the flagship, named O'Donnell, mark the name, O'Donnell. A photograph of his sister, a nun, hung in his cabin, over his bunk, together with a picture of Our Blessed Mother, and her Son, and O'Donnell's rosary. Every once in so often O'Donnell, who was one of the most capable officers of the fleet, and everybody who knows anything about the fleet will tell you that the petty officers are the backbone of effective service, O'Donnell would round up the Catholic boys and march them off to Confession and Holy Communion.

Now, I ask everybody, are we going to let O'Donnell remain alone on his job? Are we not going to help all the other lonely O'Donnells who so wistfully wish to have a priest on board their ships? Surely that part of the job is "up to us," up to the Catholics who won't be able to go on the ships or into the fighting regiments. The creation of an adequate chaplain service is a primary duty.

At the end of his message the President calls upon God to help us, to help this nation; and this is the Catholic opportunity, to be as much and as greatly as possible the human instruments for God's work in time of war. Our cause is just; war waged for justice is a holy war; it is the Catholic literature which expresses this truth as none other may do as well. Let us print and distribute this literature throughout the length and breadth of the land. It is because the soul of man is starved for religion that the sins and crimes which brought about this scourging of the world were rendered possible; because the soul cannot remain empty, deprived of God it turns perforce to the enemies of God, and national pride becomes an obsession, avarice waxes monstrous and seizes whole nations, and law is trampled underfoot by maniacal ambition. Since our nation has now been forced to enter the bloody field, let us pray and let us work that through the clouds and the thunderings and the lightnings of the tempest of the cleansing the sunshine of truth may find its way, and sweeten the national soul. This is pre-eminently the task of Catholics. The holy ones among us will plead in prayer to Almighty God for this. But we who are in the world, Catholic laymen and laywomen, under the direction and guidance of our clergy everywhere, must be the Marthas and Josephs of the holy work which the Marys and the Johns inspire. An efficient organization is the slogan of the task before us.

"Catholic" Biology?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have followed with much interest the correspondence in your distinguished weekly on the subject of the "Origin of Human Life." I have no intention of entering the controversy, but I take occasion of asking, in all humility, and even with fear and trembling, what is meant by "Catholic" biology? If we succeed in getting a satisfactory definition of "Catholic" biology I shall feel encouraged to ask at some future time for a definition of "Catholic" hydrodynamics and "Catholic" geometry. I can readily understand that biology as well as other natural sciences has a bearing upon matters which fall within the range of Divine Revelation. But it is, as yet, a mystery to me how a purely natural science which is based upon fixed laws should be labeled "Catholic" any more than that two and two make four should be stamped as a truth of "Catholic" arithmetic.

Records of the Tenebrae

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Confirmed skeptic though I be in the matter of disarming fanatical ranters against "Rome," I nevertheless believe in the possibility of winning some rational respect for the Church through Catholic music. Unless my suggestion implies profanity, which is not in my thoughts, I should like to ask if phonographic records reproducing the chants of the Church for popular edification are permissible. If so, I can hardly conceive a reasonable human soul impervious to the Tenebrae. The Tenebrae music is pitched, keyed, and sublimely tided in a sphere so supernally above the reach of scoffers, ranters, detractors, that it should leave in the forum of all honest opinion no ground or warrant even for the utmost malice. If this be true, why not record the Tenebrae chants by way of practical illustration of the immemorial reverence of the Church toward one particular phase of the drama of Divine Redemption, comprehending all Christians in its ordained plan? To answer torrents of insane rant with one of those Tenebrae "shoreless oceans" of inspired appeal should move otherwise obdurate natures and lead them to the inference that the remarkable agency which not only preserved such music pure and undefiled through thousands of years, and still renders it pure and exalted year after year, is of good report and not a corrupt invention.

Savannah. WILLIAM PRICE.

An Irishman in Lawrence County, Mississippi

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Looking over the papers in an old cash entry of public land in the State of Mississippi (Old Credit System Final Cash Certificate, No. 634, issued on April 8, 1825, under the Act of Congress approved May 18, 1824, for Lot 1, section 1, township 5 North, Range 11 East, Washington Meridian, 237.94 acres), I noticed that at a sheriff's sale held on September 15, 1823, Aloysius M. Keegan bought the entryman's right to obtain the said certificate for $630.00. How a man with that unusually fine Catholic name could be at home in Lawrence County, Mississippi, in 1823 is surely a matter for wonder.

St. Augustine on Cosmogony

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some weeks ago Dr. O'Malley in his indictment of St. Augustine, (AMERICA, Jan. 20, and Mar. 10), averred that the Saint held that the earth was flat; that people could not exist on the other side of the earth; and that he started a tradition about the shape of the earth which misled scholars for "nearly 1,000 years."

On being requested to back his charges with documentary evidence (AMERICA, Feb. 24) the Doctor gives some excerpts from the Saint's "City of God," wherefrom he essays to show that the Saint held that "the earth is flat," by the following argument, namely: "St. Augustine held that it is not possible for men to be on the other side of the earth; he denied, moreover, that the earth is spherical; ergo the earth is flat." Among the reasons that misled the Saint was his belief, the Doctor says, in an "ocean stream," which would prevent people from dwelling on the under side of our globe.

His argument, rather odd-looking and on the whole not strictly in accord with the canons of dialectic art, if analyzed, will be found to be made up (1) of three gratuitous assertions, which, with the exception of the first, involve the very points in dispute.

(2) Moreover, the Doctor embodies in his conclusion a great deal more than is warranted by his premises. (3) He reads into the text meanings that the Saint did not employ even implicitly. Nowhere does the Saint use any word that means "flat," or that can be so twisted. Neither does he anywhere speak of an "ocean stream," or of any other kind of stream. (4) Finally, the "tradition," which the Doctor alleges was started by St. Augustine, is nothing but a myth.

But why so much bother taken, if the case against the Doctor's position is so plain at the outset? There is always danger that people will really believe that anything Dr. O'Malley asserts is therefore a fact, and that St. Augustine really did so teach. Is not this sufficient reason?

Dr. O'Malley may plead that his deductions as to what the Saint meant are admissible in argument. I answer that in debate no inference is so strong and so unassailable as one that is grounded on real evidence, on reasons of fact or principle; while conversely, no inference is so misleading as one that has no other ground than one's own personal fancy. We are thus constrained to list Dr. O'Malley's argument as taboo. Only after proper evidence has thus been submitted, may arguments follow. The Doctor, moreover, appears not to be posted in ancient cosmogony, else he would know that scholars held other views as to the earth's form besides that of its flatness. Among them some taught that the earth was ovoidal, egg-shaped, lenticular, cheese-shaped, conical, columnar, as well as flat. If St. Augustine held that because the earth was not spherical, therefore it must be flat, may I query, might not the Saint equally well have held it was ovoidal, or of any other of the shapes as above? How is it, by-the-way, that the Doctor hits on the term "flat," the very word, it will be recalled, which Dr. Draper used in his pronouncement over fifty years ago? To me this concurrence of views looks very significant.

But in order to settle this question, I offer the following suggestion. Let any one with open mind con carefully St. Augustine's own words on the point at issue. He will agree with me, I judge, that (1) the main point all through that section, the only one in fact whereon the Saint lays special stress, is not so much the shape of the earthly world, as the Christianization of the human world, which ever was the life-long concern of his heart and mind. (2) That nowhere does the Saint assert the flatness of the earth, nor anywhere does he deny its sphericity. Thus in his commentary on Psalm 76, wherein he likens the earth to a wheel, a rota, and rotella, may we not say that therein by a flight of genius the Saint describing the rotatory movement of our sphere forestalled by many ages the Copernican theory as to the rotatory movement of the globe around the sun? What cared St. Augustine whether the "City of God" (on earth) was of this shape or that? (3) That whatever reference the Saint may make to any anthropological or geographical speculation, is little else than one of merely minor interest, one in fact wholly irrelevant to his evangelical program. Such references, I maintain, are rightly to be classed among the Saint's obiter dicta. Is not this suggestion of mine fair? But, one may ask, did not St. Augustine in his inner heart really believe that "the earth is flat," may it not so be inferred from his own words? I answer, first, that any analysis of another's mind, or any interpretation of its multitudinous and varied and most complex workings has ever been an insoluble problem in psychology. I submit then that Dr. O'Malley's first averment remains unproved.

As to the Doctor's charge, "that St. Augustine disbelieved in the possibility of antipodes," I answer that nothing could be clearer than the Saint's own words to that effect. For his belief the Saint gives as reasons: (1) That in no history is there any positive record of such a people; (2) That no voyager, or traveler had ever visited those far-off regions. Possible existence is wholly a very different affair from actual existence. Nowhere, may I ask, does St. Augustine declare for the absolute impossibility of antipodes? Possibilities belong wholly to the realm of abstract principles; actualities, on the other hand, to the order of concrete facts. May not one then disbelieve in the actual occurrence of an alleged material phenomenon, without however disbelieving in the possibility of its so occurring? Such a distinction I contend, makes a deal of difference in our schools.

Nor was there any evidence that antipodes did exist until ages after St. Augustine's death, A. D. 430. Magellan completed his circumnavigation of the globe in 1522, the year when the news of his having thus encompassed the globe first reached Europe. Then only was the earth's sphericity and the existence of antipodes known by actual evidence. Were not St. Augustine's reasons then justifiable?

Hence the Doctor's charge that the Saint denied the "absolute possibility of there being antipodes," falls to the ground.

Lastly to the charge about the Saint's misleading the world of scholars for nearly 1,000 years. Had the Doctor said nearly eleven centuries, he would have been nearer the truth. But is his charge true? A tradition, I hold, if one exists, must show vestiges of its continuance throughout the ages in question. I requested the Doctor to tell in what writings this tradition of his was enshrined. He names the Celtic Feargal, also known as Virgilius, who, so good authorities attest, was the very first teacher in Christendom who came out flat-footed, publicly, some writers say, in maintaining not only the sphericity of our planet, but the existence of antipodes as well. This was eight centuries, remember, before the Magellanic discovery. By the way would he not also be somewhat surprised to learn that from St. Augustine's day down to the Magellanic discovery, the present-day view of the earth's sphericity was common among the scholars of the Middle Ages who touched on that topic? What then of his indictment of St. Augustine? What of his charges against the same Saint's scientific lore? Merely this: That in his indictment several flaws, and these by no means trivial, have been uncovered, while of his charges there is not one that holds water, that has not been shown to be against the evidence of the Saint's own text, and the verdict of history. Am I to blame then for having asked the Doctor for such proofs of his assertions as alone would hold in a trial-court of scholardom?

The following are fresh statements of Dr. O'Malley (AMERICA, March 31): (1) That "the 'Catholic Encyclopedia' proves that St. Augustine held that the earth is flat." Answer: That the "Catholic Encyclopedia" (vi. 449) says that "Augustine declared that the sphericity of the earth in no way conflicted with Holy Writ."

(2) That "the meanings of orb, sphere, globe, came into existence as applied to the earth centuries after St. Augustine's time." Answer: That Cassiodorus, who was born about 30 years after the Saint's death, in his treatise "De Astronomia" (Migne, P. L. 70: 1216), has these words: "Nam mundus ipse, ut quidam dicunt, sphaerica fertur rotunditate collectus," etc.

(3) The Doctor assumes that the Virgilius (AMERICA, March 10), who had a formal charge of heresy brought against him, was the same as the Virgilius (otherwise Feargal) who taught the sphericity of the earth. Answer: The Doctor seems unaware of the fact that scholars are not agreed in determining who was the Virgilius, defendant in the case above. Nor is the question of his identity settled yet.

Can fault then be found with my strictures on the Doctor's cocksureness in attempting to settle offhand "so dogmatically and positively" questions which obviously have more sides than one? All through this paper my chief contention has been defense against unwarranted assaults on St. Augustine's learning. Is a man now-a-days to be taken to task for standing up for the Fourth Commandment? To his suggestion that I read up a bit in St. Augustine's "City of God," I plead that it is far safer to know even but a little well, than many things which are not so.

St. Vincent's Centenary

MANY cities are under obligations of gratitude, beyond the possibility of payment, to St. Vincent de Paul; but with the possible exception of Paris, none is more deeply in debt to the "patron of practical philanthropists" than our own great metropolis. Nor is New York likely to forget the claim, for it is written in countless memorials of stone in its very heart. As the Statue of Liberty, lifting aloft its torch of freedom in the Upper Bay, is an heroic reminder of what we owe to the land that gave the Saint birth; so too Forrest Castle, which rises in placid beauty over the Hudson, tells to all who have wit to learn, the century-old story of our indebtedness to his spiritual children.

For a full one hundred years the gentle Sisters of Charity have been among us. How God has blessed their untiring labors may be seen from the fact that since the little band of three were sent in the summer of 1817 by Mother Seton to take charge of the orphans in the parish of the old St. Patrick's Cathedral, they have increased in numbers no less than five hundred times. Prodigal almost to an extreme, where the interests of God and humanity are at stake, they have given at least 1,500 lives to the people of New York, all of them worn out, but not wasted, in the strain of their apostolic work; and what they have done in the past, they are doing today in the humble, unobtrusive, courageous way that is their wont. Not for them the glorious paths in God's vineyard, but hidden places where ignorance and suffering are rife.

It reflects but little credit on the American people that we should have had no worthy memorial of France's share in the winning of our independence, until it was given us by Frenchmen; and it is somewhat to our shame that in spite of their endless benefactions to the people and especially to the Catholics of New York, the Sisters of Charity should still be left alone to struggle with the burden of their many works of benevolence in which the gain is not to themselves but to us. Who will refuse to take a share in testifying in a practical, material way the gratitude of the archdiocese to the heroic daughters of St. Vincent de Paul? The coming centenary celebration gives us an opportunity of doing something worth while in token of our grateful memory of ten decades of endless benefits. The Sisters themselves have never counted the cost, when the sick, the poor, and the ignorant asked them for help; we their beneficiaries should not be niggardly now that the Sisters have made their appeal not for their own personal wants but merely to increase their efficiency in ministering to our needs. To give, and give generously out of our abundance, will be only casting bread upon the waters. Our gifts will come back to us, increased a hundredfold.

The Cobbler's Last

THERE is an ancient saw which bids the cobbler stick to his last. The axiom is founded on common-sense. Some of us can do one or two things fairly well, but very few of us can do all things even passably. An excellent cobbler, despite the Poet of Agawam, may make a poor philosopher. A plumber of distinguished attainments in his useful and opulent art, may be painfully insufficient as a critic of old tapestry. Creakless shoes and insubordinate pipes are their métier. They will wisely leave art and philosophy to more practised hands.

Here in the United States, however, we accept the theory that eminence in anything, or even notoriety, makes one a doctor of universal learning. Washington Irving long ago pointed out the peculiar felicity which attaches to the jokes of rich men. Today we accept not merely their witticisms, but also their theories in art, literature, education and philanthropy, and that without question. We have infallible popes in everything except religion: priding ourselves on our intelligent freedom, we daily reject the scholastic principle that no authority is worth more than the reason back of it. Some years ago, Mr. Hudson Maxim, a noted maker of powder and guns, issued a rather dogmatic work on the essentials of true poetry. He was easily paralleled by Mr. Edison, who relied on his undoubted achievements in practical electricity, to lend authority to his sophomoric effusions, denying the immortality of the soul. Psychologists did not take Mr. Edison seriously. With none but the crudest notions of "soul" and "immortality," his conclusions had no interest, save as showing the possible vagaries of a constructive mind. They were in no sense conclusive, except to the unthinking multitude. Mr. Edison had made wires glow and discs talk. He was therefore competent, so their logic ran, to dogmatize in philosophy, Scripture and theology.

It was left for Dr. George W. Crile, of Cleveland, a surgeon of genuine attainments, to relinquish the scalpel on Easter Day, and prove to a Baptist congregation that the soul, if it exists, is not immortal. If correctly reported by the press, Dr. Crile did not state that physical science, as such, had nothing to do with the soul's immortality; a position which is not only intelligible but correct. On the contrary, the learned doctor held that physical science, having explored heaven, had rejected it as a very dull and dreary place; that science had demonstrated that "religion is unsupported by logic and facts"; that "individual resurrection" and "eternal life" are only dreams. Having thus extended the field of science, beyond the dreams even of the discredited Sage of Jena, Dr. Crile received with becoming modesty the thanks and congratulations of the assembled Easter Day Baptists.

No doubt Dr. Crile is a man disposed to cry out against the supposed attempt of religion to "dogmatize on science." He has no scruple, however, in leaving his last to dogmatize on religion. Eminent as a surgeon, Dr. Crile's own words prove that what he knows of the soul and its immortality, of the resurrection of the dead, and of future retribution, forms a notable contribution to the world's store of nonsense. Perhaps, after all, what is significant in the whole episode is not the fact that Dr. Crile chose Easter Day as an appropriate time for a public denial of the truth of Christianity, but that he was invited to do so by a church supposedly Christian. There is little doubt that Dr. Crile needs a truer sense of the limitations of science. There is no doubt whatever that the East End Baptist Church of Cleveland needs the first beginnings of faith in the promises of Jesus Christ.

Expatriated Catholics

IN these critical times when union of thought and action is essential for the safety of the country, it is disconcerting to find a paper so insensate in its desire to insult loyal citizens that it does not hesitate to rank Catholics as aliens. The insult is the more gross both for its gratuity and for the sordid event which occasioned it: by these same tokens, however, it loses half its sting.

On Good Friday, April 6, 1917, the New York Sun, with a solemnity worthy of a gentleman keeping a Connecticut Sabbath, in 1680, wrote, apropos of the Mitchel-Wagner controversy:

> Naturally Tammany leaders take just the opposite view. They profess to see a "crushing defeat" for the Mayor as a result of the Senator Wagner incident. Their line of argument is to the effect that the Mayor by his remarks about Senator Wagner alienated the German vote, if there is such a thing, and that he has already lost the Catholic vote because of the wire-tapping case. That would appear to leave him only the American vote.

The youthful scribe who dashed off that illuminating item is wise beyond words. By one fell stroke of his terrible pen he cleared American soil of Catholics, making answer to his profound reflections quite impossible. And since Good Friday, April 6, 1917, the angry sea is filled with the bobbing heads of Papists consigned to the deep by a quill. And the sea was never more illustrious. American Indians are there, and descendants of the Maryland Pilgrims, and men like Chief Justice White and Admiral Benson, and scores of others too un-American by birth and tradition, and perhaps by service to their country, to be tolerated in the United States by an anonymous scribe.

This from the New York Sun! Is it replacing its calm, far-visioned men by creatures of long hair, tortoise-rimmed spectacles, cigarettes, broad A's and the atmosphere of a free scholarship in a "jerk-water," evangelical college?

Why Poets Are So

WHY poets exist at all, and why they are what they are has at last been explained. The trouble really began because man "got up on his hind legs too soon." Had he only been considerate enough to remain on all fours a few thousand years longer than he did all would have been well. But because our primitive arboreal ancestors selfishly preferred to the permanent good of posterity some passing material advantage, they persisted in making untimely attempts to stand erect. Unfortunately they finally succeeded in their purpose and became forthwith creatures whose mechanistic reactions are so hampered and imperfect that they are the sole cause of all man's present errors, miseries and vagaries. Worse still these prematurely bipedal peripatetic habits of our simian forefathers eventually resulted in dividing the human race into two great classes, politicians and poets, the first consisting of those who reach out to the universe and try to draw it to themselves and the second class including those who are eager to extend themselves out to the universe.

Regarding the character of the poetry a given singer will produce, that all depends on the nature of the bacilli that have made him their home. If he is infected with tubercular germs he will make glad and hopeful music like Robert Louis Stevenson. But should he be a melancholy bard it is some neuritic microbe, in all probability, that forces him to write such somber poems as "The Raven" or "Ulalume."

The foregoing attempt to explain according to the mechanistic theory of life "The Biological Why of Poets" was recently made in New York by a physician of some reputation who gravely expounded the nonsense not by any means as a lame jest but in sober earnest, while an audience who had gathered to hear some poets read selections from their own writings listened to him with rapt faces. The doctor's talk seems to be a fairly good example of the absurdities that now pass for "modern scientific thought" with certain "little groups of serious thinkers." The conviction that "man got up on his hind legs too soon," and that as a consequence of that lamentable mistake all our thoughts, words and deeds are now produced by the action of bacilli on the body's nerve-centers is no doubt a very convenient one for those who find the Ten Commandments hard to keep. If the present world-war, for instance, is due to the ravages of an irresistible microbe, and not to the perverse misuse of man's free-will, the old-fashioned and uncomfortable doctrine of human responsibility is happily discredited. If we are one and all the helpless victims of predatory bacilli, what is the use of trying to live virtuously?

The Yiddish Press

A VISITOR to New York, availing himself of the street cars of the city on any evening of the week, will be surprised at the number of Yiddish papers unfolded about him by men and women returning from their work, and will naturally wonder at the nature of their contents. From a purely literary standpoint many of the contributions to these numerous dailies are held to be of unusual merit. They are the work of men who have gained experience and perfected their craftsmanship in the great centers of European Yiddish journalism. But charges of a most serious nature are brought against the papers on another score by Dr. Max Raisin in the American Israelite. With the best interests of his race at heart he beholds in these papers a source of appalling moral dangers to the Jewish people and a real menace to our American commonwealth. "Openly and as if on principle," he says, "these dailies have for a number of years been pursuing a policy so decidedly detrimental to public morals, that, had it been done by the English or German or even Italian press in America, it assuredly would have called forth not only the vengeance of the defenders of the law, but the righteous indignation and condemnation of the people themselves."

Jewish as well as national ideals are said to be utterly ignored by the proprietors of these sheets in their mad race for gain. The language in which these papers abuse their rivals in soliciting popular patronage would bring a blush "to the meanest huckster in a Berditchev or Wilna ghetto." This craze for money leads them to cater above all to the lowest sexual instincts of their readers. A story without an adulterous event, we are told, would have slight chance of acceptance at the hand of a Yiddish publisher. "The yellowest of American journals would hesitate to publish the kind of lewd and prurient stuff which finds such a ready market in the ghetto." It would be difficult to say more than is implied in these few words.

The first purpose of such papers, as Dr. Raisin rightly remarks, should be to combat the immorality of the cheap and vulgar stage, the hideous moving-picture dens, and the unutterable depravities of the burlesque theaters, the "clearing houses of all the sex filth of the gutter." The vilest of these places of amusement are soliciting the patronage of the immigrant and are pandering to his baser passions. Instead of responding to the sacred duty of protecting its immigrant readers the Yiddish press, we are told, is seeking to coin money by improving upon "the decadent American methods it has taken for its model." We might add that the dens of infamy to which allusion has been made are largely in the hands of the same class of Jews who are conducting the pornographic Yiddish papers, while Jewish physicians of a like type are among the leading advocates of birth-control.

It is not to humiliate self-respecting Jews that the criticism of the Yiddish press is quoted in AMERICA, but rather to aid Jews like Dr. Max Raisin in their noble fight for public morality. The chairman of the New York Kehillah was no less pronounced in his condemnation of the immoral Yiddish press. Qualified exceptions are made for papers like the Morning Journal and the Daily News, of New York City, which sometimes, "though not very often," rise to certain heights of dignity and respectability. But this small meed of praise is not given to radical journals such as the Forward, the Freiheit, and the Day, which scoff at religion and all that is holy in life, turning over their columns "to pornographic uses for the sake of gain."

It is not simply a Jewish question with which we are dealing here. It is a matter of public decency and welfare. Our cities must be protected from the effects of such a press whose harmful results are abundantly manifesting themselves. Yiddish journalism is a mighty factor in our national life and must not be permitted to become a menace to American civilization. Radical Yiddish papers are no longer Jewish in the religious sense of the word, but purely infidel.

Reverse the Questions

A SHREWD observer once remarked: "Our girls we keep asking from their earliest years, 'What are you going to wear?' whereas the question their brothers are constantly hearing from infancy to young manhood is, 'What are you going to do?' The practical effect of this catechetical system on the children's attitude toward life is of course obvious. Why not reverse the questions?" The experiment would be well worth trying. While Mary is little she could be taught that the number of ribbons and furbelows a girl wears is not necessarily the test of her value as a playmate, and thus incipient snobbishness could be cured. Later in life the reiterated question, "What are you going to do?" would perhaps make schoolgirls realize that a well-stored mind, a clean heart and a strong character contribute quite as much to "success in life" as do a pretty face, a becoming dress and a graceful carriage. Later still that same persistent question may remind these girls that the woman who can cook well, keep house economically and take proper care of children will bring her husband a richer dowry, no matter what his station in life may be, than if she were the heiress of a multimillionaire.

As for Mary's brother John, if he is asked, "What are you going to wear?" only half as often as he is forced to tell solicitous inquirers what he is going to do, he will be the gainer. Indeed during John's earlier years that question might help him improve his manners and be more careful about his personal appearance. Somewhat later in John's career the occasional recurrence of the question would no doubt impress him with the importance of cultivating the social graces, and of making his own the best literature in the world. Then perhaps John would not find himself so inferior in refinement and general culture to the convent-bred girls of his acquaintance, that the prospect of a happy marriage with one of them would be very meager. However that may be, if repeatedly asking our Catholic girls, "What are you going to be?" and our Catholic boys, "What are you going to wear?" would lessen the number of mixed marriages that we now have to deplore, a reversal of those time-worn questions should take place at once.

Literature

THE NOVELS OF "JOHN AYSCOUGH"

NEWMAN in his "Idea of a University" notes and laments that English classical literature is incurably Protestant. The age that witnessed England's loss of the Faith saw also a wonderful outburst of literary genius, culminating in Shakespeare and thenceforth pursuing a course little influenced by the old Catholic tradition. The Church has greatly suffered from this coincidence, for religion should number literature, as all the other arts, amongst her handmaidens. But English literature has suffered still more, for it has largely lost its grasp upon revealed truth, which is at once the inspiration and the guide of the natural reason. Still, although the great names in philosophy, history, poetry, fiction, and "letters" generally are predominantly non-Catholic, there is much in the classic literature of the English-speaking nations which is at least Christian in presupposition and treatment, and not a little which is definitely, if sometimes unconsciously, Catholic. Indeed, it may be contended that Catholic writers of eminence are out of all proportion to the numerical strength of their body. However that may be in the general survey, we cannot fail, if we narrow the question down to our own day and to a particular branch of literature, to be struck with the large proportion of Catholic authors, not indeed among the "best sellers"—a most fallacious sign of excellence—but amongst novelists of the first or second rank. After all, given the needful literary capacity, it is not strange that novels by Catholic writers should also possess certain exclusive merits due precisely to their Catholic faith. Such writers, in their criticism of life, are provided with fixed and sure standards; they are aware of the action of Providence; they have some insight into the workings of grace; their horizon is not bounded by matter and sense. No other Christians have these advantages in the same manner and measure, and they are naturally possessed in the fullest degree by such Catholic novelists as are priests.

It is no secret that the novelist who is the subject of the following appreciation is a Catholic priest of high distinction and of long standing, viz., the Right Rev. Monsignor Francis Bickerstaffe-Drew, K. H. S. and Senior Roman Catholic Chaplain at Salisbury Plain. Born in 1858, he was received into the Church in 1878 while an undergraduate at Oxford, became a priest in 1884 and an army chaplain some two years later. Although a frequent contributor to magazines from early days, he did not make his name as a novelist till 1908, when he was fifty years old. Yet his first novel, "Mr. Blake of the Blacks," which appeared in 1899 as a serial in Temple Bar, showed many of his characteristic qualities, as also did his second, "Admonition," published in 1903. Neither of these books gives any suggestion of the author's condition of life. Extremely clever and well-written, they deal with matters purely mundane and indicate no particular "philosophy." But his later books, beginning with "Marotz" (1908), are definitely and unmistakably Catholic. Their titles and dates are as follows: "Dromina" (1909), "San Celestino" (1909), "Mezzogiorno" (1910), "Hurdcott" (1911), "Faustula" (1912), "Gracechurch" (1913), and "Monksbridge" (1914). Besides this he has published two collections of stories, "A Roman Tragedy" (1909), and "Outsiders and In" (1910), several volumes of essays, besides frequent contributions to periodicals. These are outside the scope of the present remarks, but I may include another volume, "French Windows," which lately was published in the Month, and has now been issued in book-form.

It will be seen from this record of eight or ten years' work that "John Ayscough" shares one characteristic of the late Mgr. R. H. Benson—an immense literary fecundity. All these volumes are of a good length, yet they, and a companion stream of magazine articles, represent the parerga of a busy pastoral career. We have, and have had, many other priest-novelists, beginning with Cardinals Wiseman and Newman—Canon Barry, the late Canon Sheehan, Father R. A. Maher, and others—but in none do we find quantity so combined with quality as in these two Monsignori. It would be interesting, did space allow, to institute a more detailed comparison between the two writers, both fervent and uncompromising Catholics, yet both, by force of their genius, commanding a wide non-Catholic audience. But I must pass to consider, briefly enough, some characteristics of the work of the elder, still happily surviving, novelist.

No Catholic needs assurance that these novels, written by a zealous priest, have more than mere recreation for their aim, though they supply abundance of that. In so far as they criticize life, their purpose is to justify the ways of God,—God's Providence and God's institutions,—to men. One who prizes the Faith as the greatest good this life affords cannot be indifferent to its propagation and must use it as a touchstone to prove every spirit. It goes then without saying that, in John Ayscough's novels, without any directly informative or controversial object, there is a right appreciation of the wrong standards of the world, its false beatitudes, its lying maxims, the fleshly prudence it advocates, the poisonous atmosphere it diffuses.

I am not aware that he has written any professedly spiritual book, but in a very true sense most of his books are spiritual. With comparatively little set moralizing, and certainly no set preaching, in a thousand varieties of form and with always unerring skill, the interactions between reason and revelation, between mundane fact and Christian ideal, between nature and supernature, between this world and the next, between, in a word, God and His creatures, are herein developed and analyzed and illustrated. This undoubtedly is his chief charm for the Catholic and the Catholic-minded. Yet with all his grasp of essential truth and consistently high ideal, John Ayscough shows no rigid intolerance of human weakness, whether of mind or will. He upholds the law but, failing full evidence, he does not presume to judge or condemn. In the wide allowance made for the action of Divine Mercy, in the clear recognition of the blindness and feebleness of the creature, he displays the large-heartedness of true Catholicism. He does not ignore the world's attractions; it is allowed its say, for the virtue he praises is not of the "fugitive and cloistered" sort—there is indeed no such virtue, in spite of Milton's innuendo—but virtue "purified by trial." The Christian novelist uses the same material as the non-Christian but with far better and surer effect.

So much in general for the tone and atmosphere of these noteworthy volumes. They have not only truth but beauty to recommend them; in other words, they are also noteworthy from the purely literary point of view. John Ayscough is the master of an easy, harmonious style which does not call attention to itself, like Meredith's. He excels in description. Many beautiful vignettes of scenery—French, English, Italian—show an eye trained to observe and a pen well-skilled to report the vision. There is no careless writing. The selection of detail, whether it be a landscape or a room or an animal or, finally, a character that is to be depicted, is made with unerring effect. Accessories, both local and historical, are invariably in keeping. Not Thackeray himself ever concocted fictitious genealogies with more loving accuracy or greater verisimilitude than those in "Monksbridge" and others of the novels. At the same time, Ayscough does not disdain many of the conventions of the novelist: the attribution to looks and facial expression of more significance than they can bear, "speaking like a book," or too grammatically, etc., but generally his conversations are natural enough, or only unnatural in being too consistently sparkling.

His humor, indeed, is one of Ayscough's main assets. His Italian pages constantly recall the delicate spirit of Henry Harland, but the Ayscough variety is more robust and has a wider range. Occasionally somewhat obvious and sometimes forced, it bubbles, for the most part, spontaneous in narrative and dialogue, humor of allusion and suggestion, humor of phrase, humor, less often, of incident. It glows like prisoned sunshine through these books, the radiance of a mind quick to perceive incongruities and whimsical parallels, and of a heart full of human kindness, as befits a genuine Christian. Yet, as readers of "Monksbridge" will realize, the humor can sharpen into satire when pretense has to be unmasked or unrepentant wickedness rebuked.

No lengthy account can here be given of any of these remarkable productions, but a word or two about the chief may be acceptable. Ayscough's fame was made, as we have said by "Marotz," which was greeted by the great critical reviews with a chorus of unstinted praise and secured for its author the ear of the non-Catholic public. Strangely enough, it was the most Catholic part of it that met with most appreciation—a long and intimate description of the contemplative life. The same unique and penetrating spiritual insight was employed on a larger scale and with even greater success in "San Celestino," of which it has been said that "It is spiritual enough to be read with profit in any convent refectory, yet may compel, by mere human interest and grace of style, the attention of the worldling." These two books treat of modern and medieval Italy respectively; "Faustula" takes us to ancient Rome. The scene of "Dromina" is partly in Ireland and partly in Spain. In "Mezzogiorno" we are in Italy again, as well as in England. "Hurdcott" is mainly English, with a good deal of Indian lore introduced. "Gracechurch" is a delightful chronicle of English village life in the "Cranford" style; "Monksbridge," an elaborate study of upper-class snobbery, both social and ecclesiastical, and incidentally a valuable piece of Catholic apologetics. The forthcoming "French Windows" will be found in a class all by itself, one of the most moving books that the war has inspired.

Clearly the best way in which to counteract the modern plague of prurient fiction is to disseminate novels which shall possess a greater literary attraction than the noxious sort, without any of their evil. In the works of John Ayscough, the Catholic community have an antidote of the utmost value which it behooves them to use to the utmost.

REVIEWS

The Middle Years. By KATHARINE TYNAN. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $3.50.

This is a pleasant volume of personal and literary reminiscences, and a sequel to the author's "Twenty-five Years," which appeared some time ago. Mrs. Hinkson in her younger days was a violent Parnellite, so her preceding book of recollections is full of Irish politics. But the present volume eschews politics and, save for the author's expression of regret that "the whole country followed the priests" when Parnell fell from grace, the 400 or more pages of "The Middle Years" tell of friends Mrs. Hinkson made, the writing she did, and the authors she met and corresponded with from about the time of her marriage down to 1910. The Bellocs, the Meynells, the Sigersons, William Sharp, W. B. Yeats, George Russell, Francis Thompson and Lionel Johnson are the literary folk who figure most prominently in Mrs. Hinkson's "Middle Years." She gives this amusing picture, for instance, of Francis Thompson at the Meynells:

> Few ordinary—or even extraordinary—English households would have endured the disarrangement of all its order, all its conventions, as the Meynell household did; and did gaily as well as tenderly. Francis Thompson sat up all night and slept all day. He disregarded engagements and conveniences, his own included. When he was due to lunch out they began calling him at 8 o'clock and continued at five minutes' intervals so that there might be a reasonable hope of his stirring at 12. The children, who had their father's whimsical humor, much enjoyed, I believe, this harrying of the poet and were very energetic about it. I fear I enjoyed the tale nearly as much. Why is it that one loves to tease a poet? I can see him now in his ugly yellow-brick suit striding about the drawing-room at Palace Court, his dirty pipe in his fingers when it was not between his lips, an odd figure in the household the lady of which was the most exquisite of women.

Another interesting chapter is the account of how William Sharp successfully masqueraded as "Fiona MacLeod" and won from the reviewers praises which writings over his own name seldom elicited. Lionel Johnson was very intimate with the author's family. She gives a number of characteristic little anecdotes of him and takes occasion to nail the lying rumors that were spread regarding the manner of his death. "He was no François Villon or Kit Marlowe, as some legends would make him," she writes. "To the last day of his life he was a delicate, little, fine gentleman and scholar and poet and saint: and the grosser vices never came near him." Among the other especially good chapters in the book is that on "John O'Mahony," the author's brother-in-law, whose conscientious nurse used to wake him up during his last sickness to give him a sleeping-draught, that on "Mr. George Wyndham," and that entitled "Friends and Neighbors," which contains some very discerning pages on the human side of the priests the author used to entertain. Though readers of "The Middle Years" will no doubt suspect that some of Mrs. Hinkson's swans are more like geese, and feel that now and then too much space is given to narrating incidents of little importance, the book is bright and entertaining and full of literary charm.

The Liturgical Element in the Earliest Forms of the Medieval Drama. With Special Reference to the English and German Plays. By PAUL EDWARD KRETZMANN, Ph.D. Minneapolis: Bulletin of the University of Minnesota. $1.00.

In modern philological research the Catholic student, even moderately familiar with medieval Latin literature, with the liturgy of the Church and with the intellectual heritage that was once the common property of Christendom, is often strangely impressed, even unto edification, by the grave and indefatigable endeavors of modern scholars to prove the obvious and discover the self-evident and, per longum et latum, to explore rather patent literary affiliations which one to the manner born could have pointed out at first sight. Witness, for example, the excitement in modern language circles, some years since, when certain pioneers, after labored and circuitous researches, stumbled upon the "deadly parallel" between certain portions of Caedmon and the liturgy of Holy Week and Pentecost, and upon Chaucer's ill-disguised indebtedness, in "The Parson's Tale," to a well-known moral treatise of St. Raymond of Penafort.

The present dissertation, extending over partial studies of the early religious plays, surveys the entire liturgical year, and after a somewhat mechanical collection of liturgical tropes, sequences, lections, antiphons and responses and what the author calls "liturgical tags," establishes, from the manifest parallelism of incident and arrangement, especially for the great bulk of the early English and German dramas, the unquestionable causal nexus between liturgy and play. The universality of these liturgical productions, the preoccupation of the gilds, in rehearsing, everywhere and at every season, the sublimely dramatic mysteries of religion, and the cultural and devotional influences on a populace nurtured at such spectacles throughout the Ages of Faith, suggest to the Catholic reader rather melancholy contrasts with the forces now at work among the votaries and victims of the modern moving-picture world.

Dr. Kretzmann's monograph is freighted with the usual parade of references and bibliography, but it sets forth much valuable material in convenient form, and doubtless represents many months of relentless toil. In the Latin citations, typographical errors abound, and one wonders that a great university should stamp with its approval a work evidently not submitted to an eye familiar with the mysteries of Greek and French accentuation. Girlhood and Character. By MARY F. MOXCEY. New York: The Abingdon Press. $1.50.

In an age when our nature is scientifically analyzed only to be treated with every sort of unscientific experiment, a book like this presents a refreshing contrast to the average pedagogical work. The writer's extensive reading and experience are employed with exceptional power of analysis, guided by an intelligent devotion to high ideals expressed in practical terms. The various periods in the formation of feminine character are successively treated in their physiological, psychological, social and religious factors; the necessities of each, as the writer understands them, are stated, and the means of supplying them treated both in general principle and by practical suggestion. In the matter of tactual tokens of affection we are inclined to think Miss Moxcey's attitude a little too liberal. True modesty is not prudishness, and the physical habit of modesty must long precede its normal explanation, since it is the only safeguard against a passion insidious in its growth and then suddenly terrible in its force.

Perhaps the most welcome feature of the book is its attitude of reverence toward the family and the home. The duty of imparting to children certain delicate but necessary information is placed, as it should be, in the keeping of the parents; and the young woman's strongest natural motive to the perfection of her own character is supplied by the prospect of its transmission to her children. Here and there, it is true, one notices defective concepts of the origin and basis of certain principles, but nothing like tampering with the principles themselves. The fundamental defect of the work, as might be expected, is its imperfect ideal of the religious factor. The coming of Our Lord as a newly realized personality into the adolescent life is a concept all but unintelligible to the Catholic maiden, who has simply experienced an evergrowing acquaintance with the very Person whom she spoke to in her childish prayer, heard of in her catechism and met in her First Communion. Had our authoress known the powers of truth and grace in all their fulness, her little book might have been a treasure past valuing. Even as it is, it will repay careful and appreciative reading. W. The Ayesha, Being the Adventures of the Landing Squad of the "Emden." By Kapitän-leutnant HELLMUTH VON MÜCKE. Translated by HELENE S. WHITE. Boston: Ritter & Co. $1.25.

"I report the landing squad from the Emden, five officers, seven petty officers and thirty men strong." That was what Lieutenant von Mücke announced to the chief of the German Mediterranean Division at Haida Pasha, in Asiatic Turkey, on Pentecost Sunday, 1915, after a seventeen-months' journey by land and sea, which was as full of perils as of variety, and is told in this book with charming modesty and humor by the Kapitän-leutnant himself. Just before the unexpected battle between the Emden and the Sydney, the author and a crew of fifty had been dispatched in two cutters to destroy the telegraph station on Direction Island, situated south of Sumatra. On the destruction of the Emden, Lieutenant Mücke led his men aboard the Ayesha, a most unseaworthy little sailing vessel with accommodations for only five men, and made for Padang, Sumatra. Near there he transferred his landing party to the Chuising, a German steamer, which brought them to Hodeida in Southern Arabia. From there, traveling first by horse-and-mule caravan, then by water in zambacs, then on camel-back, and finally by railroad, the Emden's landing party at last reached the German lines, where the Iron Cross awaited the gallant Kapitän-leutnant.

Those who wish to learn how he and his little army successfully evaded the British blockade of the Red Sea, cheerfully bore the great hardships of the expedition, and from behind a barricade of dead camels kept at bay a largely superior force of Bedouins, should not fail to read this book. It is safe to say that all who begin "The Ayesha" will read it eagerly to the last page, for Lieutenant von Mücke's adventures, excellently translated as they are by Helene S. White, are likely to be one of the enduring books of the war. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In the April Month Father Sidney Smith sounds a warning that the new French law which makes war-orphans the wards of the nation may be so administered as to imperil the faith of Catholic children; Martin D'Arcy in "Mr. Wells: Theologian," shows the absurdity of Mr. Britling's "finite" God; a number of interesting letters Cardinal Newman wrote to Lady Georgiana Fullerton are published; Father Lucas makes a critical study of Mrs. Wilfrid Ward's "The Light Behind"; and W. M. Letts and Mary Samuel Daniel contribute good stories. Two valuable papers in the current Irish Monthly are Mary Butler's article on "The Ethics of Dress" and Père De Pouchéville's on "Woman's Social Activities."

The Catholic Mind for April 22 contains a powerful sermon on "Christianity and the War" which was preached last month by the Rt. Rev. John P. Carroll, D.D., Bishop of Helena. He shows that the failure of the nations to observe Christ's precepts cannot justly be called the failure of Christianity, and he sees in the present war a logical result of the world's cult of materialism. "Unlike individuals, nations have no eternity." The States of modern Europe had by repudiating or ignoring God, put all their trust in their own strength and wisdom, so He permitted them to turn their weapons against one another. "Their wealth, accumulated by the toil of generations, is being poured out like water. The mechanical inventions and scientific discoveries, which were hailed as the heralds of a golden age of peace and civilization, have only made the butchery more swift and horrible." In the second paper in the number, "The Failure of Fragmentary Christianity," the Archbishop of Liverpool shows that when Catholics and non-Catholics face death on the field of battle the comparative value of their early training stands out in bold relief.

Though not intended primarily as a text-book, Maud Going's "Our Field and Forest Trees" (McClurg), fulfils the requirements of one, for it is at once interesting and accurate. The author tells important facts about familiar trees, insisting especially upon their economic value, clear diagrams make for accuracy, while good photographs and careful statistics increase the volume's usefulness. The book will also appeal to the general reader.——"The Woodcraft Manual for Girls" (Doubleday, $0.40), by Ernest Thompson Seton, is a book that will undoubtedly make a strong appeal to all lovers of nature and outdoor life. The purpose of this interesting volume seems to be to make these bodies of ours by healthy and vigorous exercise worthy tabernacles of our souls. There is a mine of valuable general information in the book's 400 pages, besides illustrations in abundance.

Edward D. Jones's "The Administration of Industrial Enterprises" (Longmans, $2.00) contains such a wealth of information regarding the newest methods of conducting business efficiently that it is hard to see how any wide-awake tradesman, manufacturer, merchant or artisan can well get on without the book. Chapter-heads like "The New Method and the New Spirit," "Buildings and Equipments," "The Functions of the Works Manager," "Fatigue," "The Newer Wage Systems," "Selling," "Credit and Collections," etc., indicate the scope and the practical character of the volume. Writing of "waste" in advertising, the author says that a publication with 100,000 readers that produces 3,000 replies to an advertisement and 300 sales, is now considered a good medium.

"Contemplations of the Dread and Love of God," done into modern English by Frances M. M. Comper; "On Good Will," by Joseph Schrijvers, C.SS.R., which Francesca Glazier has translated from the French; "Maxims from the Writings of Katharine Tynan," by an anonymous compiler, and "A Year of Cheer," which Scannell O'Neill has "chosen from Catholic sources," are recent volumes of the attractive little "Angelus Series" (Benziger, $0.50 each). The first is from a fourteenth-century manuscript in the British Museum, and was probably written by a follower of Richard Rolle, and is full of sound asceticism quaintly expressed. The second book well explains how the man of good-will can tend to perfection by prayer, by action and by suffering, and the two other little volumes contain a thought for every day in the year.

Our readers will no doubt be interested to learn that Robert M. McBride & Company, 31 East Seventeenth Street, New York, have become publishers and purveyors of anti-Catholic novels. The firm is advertising widely "The Torch-Bearers of Bohemia," by V. I. Kryshanovskaya, which is described as "A splendid Russian historical romance of the days when John Hus held aloft the banner of national and religious liberty in his native Bohemia." The book is a bitter and mendacious attack on the Church, and one of the story's leading characters is an Italian cardinal whose profligate life is shamelessly described. Another anti-Catholic novel that Robert M. McBride & Company, 31 East Seventeenth Street, New York, are exploiting is "Martin Valliant," a very medieval novel, by Warwick Deeping, who seems to be a professional defamer of the Church. The story's "hero" is a young priest and monk who out of sheer love of purity abandons his monastery and leaves his loose-living religious brethren and goes roaming through the country in the company of a frail beauty who plays the lute. It should not pay Robert M. McBride & Company, 31 East Seventeenth Street, New York, to publish books of this kind.

"Edith Bonham" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50), Mary Hallock Foote's latest book, is the well-told story of an Eastern girl who goes out to Idaho to be the governess of her friend Nanny's motherless daughter. Little Phoebe's father, his agent Dick and the military surgeon all become interested in the fair and outspoken Edith, so the tongues of the village keep wagging. All the characters in the book are well drawn, it has literary finish, and the reader is seldom tempted to skip pages. ——J. H. Beresford's "The Wonder" (Doran, $1.50) is an infant with an abnormally developed intellect, who makes his elders feel very uncomfortable, and who comes to a tragic end none too soon. It is not much of a story.——"Lilla: A Part of Her Life," by Mrs. Belloc Lowndes (Doran, $1.35), is a good study of a possible and perhaps not improbable phase of the social disorganization consequent on the war. Hearing from an official report that her husband has been killed in battle, Lilla starts out on her second venture in married life, the idyllic character of which is emphasized by the colorless nature of her former union. In the event it proves that the report was false, and the climax is reached when the husband returns and the unfortunate woman has to make her choice. It is strange to read that a mixed marriage was celebrated in a Catholic church.——In her recent novel, "If Wishes Were Horses" (Dutton, $1.50), the Countess Barcynska has taken up another aspect of the selfishness of man and the noble devotedness of woman, which her readers will remember was delightfully treated in her earlier book, "The Little Mother Who Sits at Home." The story is well told, but it lacks the idealization and the charm of the former work. The author is more at home in dealing with the finer things in life.

In "Douris and the Painters of Greek Vases" (Dutton, $2.50), Edmond Pottier, Membre de l'Institut, presents in an attractive manner the wealth of learning he has acquired regarding Athenian ceramics. Douris was an Attic craftsman, who lived about 500 B. C., twenty-eight of whose beautiful vases, signed with his mark, have come down to us. The author describes the artist's social condition, manner of life, etc., and tells the reader just how the vases were molded, painted, baked and sold. Twenty-five illustrations, many of them in color, and some representing the potter at work, adorn the volume, and Bettina Kahnweiler's translation is a good one. Dr. Jane Ellen Harrison writes the preface.

Two of the finer lyrics in "The Oxford Book of English Mystical Verse" (Oxford University Press, $2.50), are Oscar Wilde's "E Tenebris" and Alice Meynell's "In Portugal, 1912." They run as follows:

Come down, O Christ, and help me! reach thy hand,
For I am drowning in a stormier sea
Than Simon on Thy lake of Galilee:
The wine of life is spilt upon the sand,
My heart is as some famine-murdered land
Whence all good things have perished utterly,
And well I know my soul in hell must lie
If I this night before God's throne should stand.
"He sleeps perchance, or rideth to the chase,
Like Baal, when his prophets howled that name
From morn to noon on Carmel's smitten height."
Nay, peace, I shall behold, before the night,
The feet of brass, the robe more white than flame,
The wounded hands, the weary human face.

And will they cast the altars down,
  Scatter the chalice, crush the bread?
In field, in village, and in town
  He hides an unregarded head;

Waits in the corn-lands far and near,
  Bright in His sun, dark in His frost,
Sweet in the vine, ripe in the ear—
  Lonely unconsecrated Host.

In ambush at the merry board
  The Victim lurks unsacrificed;
The mill conceals the harvest's Lord,
  The wine-press holds the unbidden Christ.

SOCIOLOGY

"Modern Sociology" Again

FATHER PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J., in an article entitled "A Page of Modern Sociology," appearing in AMERICA March 3, 1917, objects to a statement made in a paper I read before the Catholic Educational Convention last summer in Baltimore, in which I set forth some reasons why sociology should be taught in our Catholic Colleges. In the course of the paper I had occasion to say, referring to an article previously published in AMERICA by him: "It is rather pitiful to read in a leading Catholic journal the statement that modern sociology and Catholicism are absolutely irreconcilable. To those who know the meaning of terms, such a statement is nothing short of arrant nonsense." Perhaps it is regrettable that I should have used such blunt, inelegant, and possibly uncharitable language in reference to an assertion made by Father Blakely, for whose courage and brilliant talents I have the very highest regard and admiration, for then, in all probability, he would not have felt any compulsion to reassert what I am compelled to characterize as a regrettable and untenable position. Father Blakely said in the former article, "Between the principles of Catholicism and the principles of modern sociology there is an essential and irreconcilable antagonism," and I submit that my "version" of his words was therefore substantially correct.

A Thesis Denied

FATHER BLAKELY continues: "I pointed out what I then considered and now consider 'the precise reason for this essential antagonism.' The Church is from God; modern sociology is not." May I suggest that this is the broadest assertion, without a shadow of proof, and what is gratuitously asserted may be gratuitously denied? We all admit the Church is from God, but I positively and unequivocally deny that sociology, ancient, medieval, or modern, is not. Sociology is the science of society, or, more fully, the science which deals with the forces, constitution, phenomena, laws, and development of society, and surely Father Blakely does not mean to assert that such knowledge is in no way, directly or indirectly, from God. Apparently he denies that sociology is a science at all, but no one knows better than Father Blakely that the claims of sociology to be a science cannot be dismissed merely by a wave of the pen, and he is also aware that many men for whose opinions he must have the very highest respect, consider that it occupies an honored place in the hierarchy of the sciences. If he had paid attention to the really important part of my paper, in which I set forth some reasons why sociology may claim to be a science, and less to the obiter dicta, he would have understood my position better, and, understanding it, would not repeat that "between the principles of Catholicism and the principles of modern sociology there is an essential and irreconcilable antagonism."

Science and Its Teachers

I SAID in my paper last summer, and I repeat it now, "Catholicism and no science are irreconcilable, because both teach the truth. It would be true to say that Catholicism and certain modern sociologists are irreconcilable, but we must not judge a science by some of its would-be teachers, any more than we must judge a religion by some of its would-be followers." I maintain that all that Father Blakely's present article proves is my contention that Catholicism and certain modern sociologists are irreconcilable, yet he expressly refuses this refuge I had so hospitably offered him. I therefore ask Father Blakely what he means by modern sociology. Does he means the sociology of Herbert Spencer or of Comte? Then he will have many of the modern professors of sociology disagreeing with him. Does he mean the sociology of Dr. Small of Chicago University, or of Professor Giddings of Columbia, or of Dr. Cooley of Michigan, or of Professor Ross of Wisconsin? All these distinguished scholars do not agree in all things in sociology. Perhaps he means the sociology defended by Dr. Fairchild of Yale, since he quotes him so extensively. In that case I think I can hear vociferous protests from certain learned Germans, and even from some of the gentlemen I have already named. I grant that the sociology of many of these men, and of Ward, Stuckenberg, Fairbanks, and of others who might be mentioned, is in its philosophical foundation essentially antagonistic to Catholicism, but this does not shake my position in the least, namely, that Catholicism and true sociology are not irreconcilable, and true sociology is the only kind I am interested in defending. Father Blakely has gone to the arsenal of Newman to secure a bomb to hurl at my inoffensive head, and I go to the same well-stocked arsenal to reply that, if he had defined his terms, and stopped to consider their meaning, he would never have written what he did, and this controversy would never have begun.

Discussing a Term

THERE is and can be nothing in modern sociology, as such, opposed to Catholicism. "Modern" simply means pertaining to the present time, and "sociology" means the science of society. Father Blakely admits he does not object to a "conclusion simply because it is new," therefore he cannot object to sociology, because it is a new or "modern" science, in the sense that it is only in comparatively recent times the field of knowledge now cultivated by sociology was set apart from the rest of philosophy. He cannot object to sociology, because it is a science, and, if he denies this, the burden of proof is on him, as sociology is in possession of the title, therefore the title must be disproved. It is hard to believe Father Blakely means what he says, when we take into consideration the long line of sociologists in the Catholic Church, from the saintly Bishop von Kettler down to the present time. Did, or do these men teach anything that is not from God? Does he mean to say that Von Kettler, Father Pesch, L. Garriguet, Leo XIII, Dr. Kerby, Dr. Ryan, and many others who might be mentioned, have taught or are teaching sociology whose principles are essentially antagonistic to Catholicism? Will he contend that my very good friend, Father Siedenberg, S.J., the able founder of the much needed School of Sociology in Chicago, is at cross purposes with the Catholic Church? And yet all these men would claim that they taught or teach "modern sociology." Sociology is taught in many Catholic colleges and universities. Is it even thinkable that these institutions contain anything in their curricula that is not in accord with the principles of faith? The very fact that they are teaching sociology, and teaching it today, is proof positive that they are teaching "modern sociology," just as they are teaching modern chemistry and modern physics. Father Blakely cannot defend himself against this argument by saying he referred only to the sociology taught "outside the Catholic Church," for that sociology has no more claim to be called modern sociology than the sociology taught within the Church. His condemnation of "modern sociology" must so far as the terms go fall on this sociology as well.

Reconciling the Irreconcilable

AS a matter of fact, Father Blakely and I do not really differ an atom. He, unscientifically I think, chooses to call the aberrations of certain professors, modern sociology, and I object to this inaccurate terminology. On Father Blakely's principles and by his method of argumentation I will undertake to prove that between the principles of Catholicism and the principles of modern biology, zoology, chemistry, physics, psychology and anatomy there is an essential and irreconcilable antagonism, because there are certain biologists, zoologists, chemists, physicists, psychologists and anatomists who base their sciences upon materialistic principles. I am certain, however, that Father Blakely would indignantly and rightly reject any such conclusion. Therefore I do not think this matter of accurate terminology is unimportant, for it is lamentable to give the impression to our Catholic people that sociology as such is essentially erroneous and evil. It should have an honored place in the curricula of all our Catholic Colleges, and our students should be encouraged to study it, in order to counteract the evil tendencies so ably emphasized by Father Blakely. We must not only engage in destructive criticism; we must enter the field, and do constructive work. Therefore I repeat that what Father Blakely really means is that "certain modern sociologists and Catholicism are irreconcilable," and in this I cordially and fully agree with him; but the statements that "modern sociology is not from God" and "between the principles of Catholicism and the principles of modern sociology there is an essential and irreconcilable antagonism" are nothing but what I am compelled to regard as a gross and lamentable abuse of terms.

JOHN W. MAGUIRE, C.S.V.

[This gentle castigation, while good for the soul, is calculated to make one feel null and void. However, I beg leave to remark: (1) "Catholicism and true sociology are not irreconcilable," writes Father Maguire. Who under the sun ever said that they were? Certainly not I, who for some years have done my humble best to encourage the study of sociology among our Catholic people. I refuse to allow Father Maguire thus to shift the ground of the argument. He considers the phrases "modern sociology" and "true sociology" synonymous. I do not, and because I do not I wrote that between the principles of modern sociology, which I carefully defined, and the principles of Catholicism there was an irreconcilable antagonism. (2) "I therefore ask Father Blakely what he means by modern sociology." A most pertinent question, which Father Maguire should allow me to answer, but doesn't. Usually I answer questions for myself, having a preference for this method. Anyone interested in knowing my answer as distinguished from the answer attributed to me by Father Maguire can find it in AMERICA, May 6, 1916, March 3, 1917, and "A Campaign of Calumny," pp. 6-9. (3) "May I suggest," writes Father Maguire, after quoting my thesis, "that this is the broadest assertion without shadow of proof." "Suggest" is good. A thesis, as a rule, is an "assertion," not an argument. The proof follows; and I submitted what in my simplicity I deemed "proof" in the citations given above. (4) Father Maguire, arraigning me on the charge of uttering statements that are "pitiful" and "arrant nonsense," discovers that "as a matter of fact Father Blakely and I do not differ an atom," and closes his case by finding me guilty of "a gross and lamentable abuse of terms." I am glad to learn that we do not differ, and I am sure that we could sing the Credo together, with small harmony perhaps, but with much good fellowship. However, I would counsel Father Maguire a meditation on the difference between "modern" and "true" sociology, and close the controversy by intoning the "Ecce quam bonum."—P. L. B.]

EDUCATION

Spelling in the Grade Schools

THERE is no subject in the curriculum in which the public seems so deeply interested as in the teaching of spelling. The "inefficient" speller is easily detected, and the schools are forthwith condemned because they do not develop skill in this important basal subject. So much for the interested public, but for the teacher the matter is of even greater concern. English spelling is irrational and therefore difficult. No royal road to spelling has ever been discovered. During the course of the grades our children spend at least 1,440 hours in spelling, reading, and dictation, and yet results are very unsatisfactory to all concerned. Spelling reformers are, and have been, numerous, and their suggestions are more or less radical. The "educationalists" have not been behindhand in expounding theories doomed to failure. It "is easy enough to sit clad in a dressing gown and slippers before a grate fire, formulate a proposition, dub it a conclusion, and invent arguments to support it. A year or two of class-room drudgery would cure this pernicious habit."

"Word" and "Incidental" Methods

SOME of the theorists claim that pupils can be taught spelling by the "sentence method," or the "word method," used in teaching reading. Reading is a valuable aid in bringing constantly before the child words correctly spelled, but experience proves that the method successfully used in teaching reading does not work well in the spelling lesson, and vice versa. The failure of this sight method in teaching spelling has been so complete that many good principles in modern education were forthwith condemned as useless and unpedagogical. Business men clamored for the reinstalment of the alphabetic method, for this valuable tool, while never really eliminated from the schools is no longer used to teach the beginnings of reading.

Some educationalists claim that orthography is best taught in connection with other school subjects. No provision is made for a spelling period in the school program, hence this method relieves the somewhat congested curriculum. It is held that this incidental method is natural and dynamic, because spelling is taught in connection with language and in the situations in which the child will be obliged to spell. Realizing the influence of motivation, the incidentalist claims that the child will easily master the difficult subject because the practical use will be made evident. The advocates of incidental spelling, in objecting to the formal teaching of the subject, claim efficiency in spelling as the result of their own system.

The "Drill" Method

THE other stock method is the drill. In this method special periods in the school program are required for the teaching, study, and testing of the spelling lesson. Spelling is a tool and therefore its instrumental value consists in using the tool skilfully. Modern educators define education as the appreciation and control of values, and disciples of the drill method claim that correct spelling places the pupil in control of those values which depend upon his own field. This control may be gained by securing "a well-focused voluntary attention" and then maintaining a maximum of attention during the repetitions. The teacher who follows this system secures "the initial focalization of attention" by presenting the new word in an attractive way, directing attention to its parts, and familiarizing the child with the sign, sound, and sense. Education should never become a process of unlearning, and hence too much importance cannot be attached to the placing of correct models before the pupil. The repetitions must be stimulating, varied, interesting. Careful preparation by the teacher is required, so that the drill will not become paralyzed or mechanical. The so-called spelling "grind" is denounced by many educators because it does not develop judgment and originality. This may be true, but we do not aim to develop individuality or judgment in the spelling lesson, and it may be remarked that these do not result from the incidental method, because spelling in se does not possess this power. The disciples of the drill method hold, however, that mental stagnation is not consequent upon intelligent, properly conducted drill work. The importance of association of sense and the use of the word in its form is kept in mind. Words are presented in the natural places in sentences and their meanings explained. The power of motivation is not neglected because incidental spelling is not eliminated, and after the words have been formally taught drill work is supplemented by dictation and language work. Statistics prove, moreover, that spelling efficiency in lists and columns of words loses nothing in the transfer to the application of spelling knowledge.

Value of Dictation

METHOD is a valuable asset in remedying the great evil, but a good text is also very essential because formal spelling lessons should be definitely listed. The vocabulary should be practical and calculated to develop a spelling sense. Explanations of a few useful rules, simply stated, which will assist pupils in difficult cases should be logically arranged. Besides the lists of well-selected words, passages useful for dictation should be given. The dictation exercise trains eye and ear, fosters the formation of habits of attention, accuracy, and neatness. It is an excellent test of words learned in the formal spelling lesson. It is a useful device in the hands of a skilful teacher, who not only supervises and corrects carefully each exercise, but who insists that all errors be corrected by the pupil and the corrected exercise be returned to the teacher.

The "Spelling Bee."

THE old-fashioned spelling bee also comes in for a goodly share of bitter denunciation by our so-called educational reformers. Granting that at times this device has been subject to abuse, we should not neglect to use spelling contests which arouse the healthy interest, so essential in good teaching, and which stimulate emulation and enthusiasm. As an instance of this we would cite the case of the public annual spelling bee held at Loyola College, Baltimore, in which eighth-grade students from every parochial school are pitted against one another contending for a silver cup given by the Mayor of the city and which remains in the possession of the winner for one year, after which it passes to the successful contestant in the next annual bee. In expectation of upholding the honor of his own school, the pupil's interest in his work of preparation is an incalculable aid to a practical grasp of spelling. The "battle royal" wages for two hours, and the youthful contestants display not only a functional knowledge of their own grade work, but also an extensive vocabulary beyond their years. The pupils thus give testimony to the public of the merits of the Catholic schools, where pupils are taught not only to spell, but also to show true character by playing well a losing game and by taking defeat gracefully, congratulating the laurel-crowned. Interest aroused, interest sustained, successful drills on properly taught formal spelling—these secured and the stigma of inefficiency in spelling will be removed from our schools.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Are Women "People"?

MASSACHUSETTS' legislators have placed themselves in a very delicate position. An act was passed by them last year calling for a constitutional convention. It provided, furthermore, that the new Constitution should be submitted for approval to "the people." Massachusetts is not a suffrage State, and the women suffragists consequently proposed the following dilemma: either women are by this act permitted to vote on the new Constitution, or their claim to be "people" is denied by the legislators. Although it is obvious that the technical meaning of legal terms should not be confounded with the ordinary significance attached to these same words, yet the wise Solons of the Massachusetts legislature found themselves in sore perplexity. The Senate has shifted the responsibility of defining the term to the Supreme Court, which will decide whether women are "people" in the sense of this act.

A Lesson in Dietetics

THE General Chemical Bulletin suggests that if the domestic food question were systematically studied the high cost of living could be greatly reduced and the nourishment of the family made better than before. To illustrate the relative nutritive values of various foods the following figures are offered. They were drawn up by the noted dietitian, Professor W. O. Atwater, and show the calories per pound of each article of food listed here: Cabbage, 115; potatoes, 295; eggs, 635; tenderloin pork, 895; sirloin beefsteak, 975; brown wheat bread, 1040; porterhouse beefsteak, 1100; rye bread, 1170; graham wheat bread, 1195; white wheat bread, 1200; pork loin chops, 1245; dried beans, 1520; soda crackers, 1875; oyster crackers, 1910; cream crackers, 1925; butter, 3410. Many may be surprised to find that, according to this list, the food value of eggs and even of porterhouse steak is very low compared with other and far cheaper articles of diet. In general, it has been learned that the so-called cheap foods are the healthiest and the most nutritious.

Protestant Foreign Mission Contributions for 1916

ONCE more the tedious contrast between Catholic and Protestant contributions towards the foreign-mission cause obtrudes itself upon our notice, although at the same time we are taught to appreciate more deeply the heroic and successful labors of our own missionaries. The total offering of the Protestant Churches during the past year, according to the statistics gathered by a committee of the Foreign Mission Conference, was $25,554,000. This marks an increase of almost $7,000,000 over their total foreign mission offering for the year 1915. First among the societies whose exact figures are indicated is the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with $2,764,898. The Foreign Mission Board of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., comes second, with $2,328,026. The sixty Protestant foreign mission societies of the United States are accredited with 9,937 missionaries in the field and an additional force of 47,334 native workers. But if the financial success of these societies overwhelms us, the spiritual harvest reaped by them is not in proportion to that gathered by our Catholic missionaries. The total number of communicants claimed by the sixty organizations is 1,146,145.

Bishop McDonnell's Jubilee

THE silver jubilee of Bishop McDonnell, of Brooklyn, April 25, brings to our notice the marvelous growth of the largest diocese in the United States, whose Catholic population is surpassed by that of three archdioceses only, New York.

Chicago and Boston. During the twenty-five years of development under the enlightened direction of Bishop McDonnell the number of Catholics increased from 280,000 to 793,000; of priests, from 219 to 442; of churches, from 116 to 229; of ecclesiastical students, from 60 to 390; of academies, from 22 to 40; and of parish school pupils, from 28,815 to 63,377. The only foundations in the diocese in 1892 were those of the Lazarist Fathers, the Fathers of Mercy, the Fathers of the Pious Missions (Italian), the Franciscan Brothers and ten communities of Sisters. Bishop McDonnell introduced into his diocese the Redemptorists, Passionists, Franciscans, Capuchins, Benedictines, Fathers of the Company of Mary, of the Society of Jesus, Brothers of Mary, Brothers of the Sacred Heart and three additional communities of Sisters: the Carmelites, Daughters of Wisdom and the Nursing Sisters of the Sick Poor. The country district of Long Island, a stretch of nearly 100 miles, has been covered with fine churches and well organized parishes. Special care has likewise been taken by the Bishop of the spiritual welfare of the immense influx of polyglot immigrants into his diocese. A particularly beautiful feature of the jubilee celebration will be the children's Communions at the seven o'clock Mass in all the churches, for the intention of their devoted spiritual Father. They will honor him, moreover, by lining up along the sidewalk of the principal thoroughfares in their section, each child waving an American flag, while Bishop McDonnell will pass through their ranks, in an automobile, from one section of the borough to another. A similar triumphal tour was prepared for Cardinal Vanutelli in 1909.

Priests' "Human Side"

IN her recent volume of reminiscences, "The Middle Years," Katharine Tynan writes thus of her clerical friends:

> There is no such everlasting boy as the priest. He gives up the things that sweeten life for other men. He has the "loneliness," as the old Saints used to put it—very often a heart-breaking malady. On the other hand, he keeps the heart of a boy. There is no such place for jests and laughter as the community rooms of the Orders, and the diocesan colleges to which their students return from time to time like happy schoolboys. They are always laughing at each other, playing pranks on each other, telling sly stories of each other. If you are lucky enough to be in their confidence you enjoy a golden humor, a humor without malice. . . . One of my happiest memories of my English life is of the priests and our friendships with them. In England, that land of converts, the priest suffers from being placed on a pedestal, where he is most uncomfortable. He is always "the Father" and treated as though he were the Grand Llama. Those good people never understand the human side of the priest. . . . I think no greater kindness can be done than to receive a lonely priest into the family life in which he can be perfectly at his ease. A priest's friendship is a deeply touching thing. Where he bestows it he gives of necessity—he, the man of no ties—more than those with many ties can return him.

There are people in this country who do not understand "the human side of the priest" either, but for quite another reason. A mission priest reports that the population of a certain portion of our Southland, on seeing him for the first time, actually looked for the historic hoofs and horns.

Catholics in England and Wales

THE Catholic Herald of India quotes from the "Daily Mail Year Book" some important statistics concerning the numerical position of various religious bodies in England and Wales. According to these figures, compiled from "official" sources, there is a decrease in every total of the Church of England, while there is likewise a general decline in the communicants and members of the other large Protestant bodies. Of the Catholic Church the Year Book says:

> The Catholic population of England and Wales is officially stated to be 1,885,655; Catholic marriages, 13,729; archbishops and bishops, 18; priests, 3892; churches, chapels and stations, 1,891; secondary schools, 29,099; elementary schools, 1,198; children in same, 254,497; children's baptisms, 68,465; conversions, 9,034. In the matter of schools, both secondary and elementary, and in the number of scholars, the Roman Catholics show advance as compared with the previous year.

The Herald remarks upon these figures that while Catholics would seem to have every reason to congratulate themselves, there is one item which invites reflection, the marriages. The correctness of the statistics in this particular instance cannot be questioned, since by law "their occurrences and methods and places of solemnization are carefully recorded." Yet the marriage rate among Catholics is only 7.2 as compared with the general marriage rate of 15.9 per 1,000; while the birth rate, measured by the baptisms, is 23.8 per 1,000. The former would, on the average basis, depress the Catholic population to 863,459, while the latter would bring it up to the high figure of 2,876,680. The writer's impression is that, aside from an undoubtedly higher birth rate among Catholics, "many Catholics marry out of the Church and have their children baptized as Catholics," but, as he admits, it is rash to generalize without fuller information. Might a printer's mistake account for this exceedingly low marriage rate?

A Pilgrimage and a Parable

ANTICIPATING the dawn of Easter Day, vast throngs annually make their "pilgrimage" to the cross of Father Junipero Serra, which crowns the rugged height of Mount Rubidoux. California's civilization, says the Boston Evening Transcript, "was founded by the Catholic friars on their pilgrimage from Mexico to capture California for Christ." But these modern pilgrims who now journey to the humble friar's cross are of every Christian creed and many of no creed whatsoever. Thousands sleep in automobiles all the previous night for want of room at the crowded hotels, many do not sleep at all. One of the number thus describes the sight as witnessed from the mountain top:

> Once at the top and having climbed to some vantage-point where you could overlook the mountain's summit which had been blasted level so as to accommodate the multitude, your eye rested on a veritable sea of humanity, just coming into visibility in the dimness of the approaching dawn. Aged and children, strong and feeble, serious-looking and flippant of demeanor, they were all there, in wraps and sweaters and shawls and coats, many of them breathless from the effort of the ascent, but all with faces directed toward the East where now the deeping sapphire tells of a day soon to be born. It is as though you were gazing out upon a speckled landscape, the whites and darks of the clothing of twenty thousand people solidly packed together mottling all the summit. They are perched on pinacles of rock, distributed like fruit through the branches of the few trees, silhouetted in fantastic variety against the sky; and high above the highest worshipper, standing silent and afire, the cross of Father Junipero Serra, the Christian apostle from the mystic days of early California, sheds its radiance like the church's benediction on the reverent throng.
> Dawn is announced to the ear at ten minutes after five by the clear notes of the cornet lifting the harmonies of "The Holy City." But the eye has already caught the news from over the Box Springs Hills. There the brightening depth of color told of the rapid advance of the day. And now it is here, the cross picks up and advertises the clear sunshine, and another Easter is singing its message of sunshine into millions of hungry, saddened, lonely hearts.

The sight suggests to this pilgrim a parable of religious unity, a unity of all mankind in a "natural religion" which shall supplant all creeds. Were his eyes opened he might behold, instead, that actual unity of faith for which Christ had prayed, symbolized in the humble friar's cross on Mount Rubidoux.

The Church and Social Problems

By REV. JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.
Associate Editor of "America"

Could you tell an inquirer just why the Church is opposed to Socialism? Could you explain her attitude towards the vital problems of the day?

A book "invaluable," the press says, to Catholics and non-Catholics alike

Evening News, Newark
"The Protestant Church worker and the social reformer will alike be interested in this new book, which deals with its subject in vigorous fashion."

Catholic Standard and Times, Philadelphia
"We have no hesitation in saying that the work is a most admirable treatment of the subject—analytical, logical, scholarly and illuminative in the highest degree"

The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.

Christianity and the War
The Failure of Fragmentary Christianity

War literature dominates the "Best Sellers" of the day and a most effective kind is offered in this number of the CATHOLIC MIND. Bishop Carroll gives the reason why this dreadful world-war has been permitted and forecasts its lessons and benefits. To this Archbishop Whiteside adds the testimony of the value of Catholic religious school training when the war-test brought the crisis in the life of the country.

Home News.—In a letter to President Wilson, drawn up by the Archbishops of the United States at their annual meeting in the Catholic University at Washington, the loyalty of the Catholic Hierarchy. of the clergy and people is pledged anew to the country, its Government and supreme Executive. The following is the complete text of the document which was presented to the President by Cardinal Gibbons, chairman of the meeting:

Archbishops Pledge Loyalty

> Standing firmly upon our solid Catholic tradition and history from the very foundation of this nation, we reaffirm in this hour of stress and trial our most sacred and sincere loyalty and patriotism toward our country; our Government, and our flag. Moved to the very depths of our hearts by the stirring appeal of the President of the United States and by the action of our national Congress, we accept wholeheartedly and unreservedly the decree of that legislative authority proclaiming this country to be in a state of war. We have prayed that we might be spared the dire necessity of entering the conflict. But now that war has been declared, we bow in obedience to the summons to bear our part in it, with fidelity, with courage, and with the spirit of sacrifice, which as loyal citizens we are bound to manifest for the defense of the most sacred rights and the welfare of the whole nation. Acknowledging gladly the gratitude that we have always felt for the protection of our spiritual liberty and the freedom of our Catholic institutions under the flag, we pledge our devotion and our strength in the maintenance of our country's glorious leadership in those possessions and principles which have been America's proudest boast. Inspired neither by hate nor fear, but by the holy sentiments of truest patriotic fervor and zeal, we stand ready, we and all the flock committed to our keeping, to cooperate in every way possible with our President and our national Government, to the end that the great and holy cause of liberty may triumph, and that our beloved country may emerge from this hour of test stronger and nobler than ever. Our people now, as ever, will rise as one man to serve the nation. Our priests and consecrated women will once again as in every former trial of our country, win by their bravery, their heroism, and their service, new admiration and approval. We are all true Americans, ready, as our age, our ability, and our condition permit, to do whatever is in us to do, for the preservation, the progress, and the triumph of our beloved country. May God direct and guide our President and our Government, that out of this trying crisis in our national life may at length come a closer union among all the citizens of America, and that an enduring and blessed peace may crown the sacrifices which war inevitably entails.

The letter bears the signatures of James Cardinal Gibbons, William Cardinal O'Connell, and of the Archbishops of St. Paul, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Cincinnati, San Francisco and Chicago. His Eminence, Cardinal Farley, and the remaining five Archbishops were unavoidably prevented from attending the meeting.

Three different reports on the attitude of the Socialist party towards the present war were presented to the national convention at St. Louis by the committee delegated for this purpose. The majority and minority reports agreed in denouncing the war as unjustifiable. They considered it mere cant and hypocrisy to say it was not directed against the German people. Militarism, they held, can never be abolished by militarism, or democracy imposed on a foreign nation by force of arms. Though described as "ruthless" the submarine warfare "is not an invasion of the rights of the American people as such, but only an interference with the opportunity of certain groups of American capitalists to coin cold profits out of the blood and sufferings of our fellow-men in the warring countries of Europe." They believe that our entrance into the war will only serve to prolong the fiendish slaughter and "give the powers of reaction in this country the pretext for an attempt to throttle our rights and crush our democratic institutions and to fasten upon this country a permanent militarism." The following is the conclusion of both reports:

Socialist Committee Reports on War

> The working class of the United States has no quarrel with the working class of Germany or of any other country. The people of the United States have no quarrel with the people of Germany or of any other country. The American people did not want and do not want this war. They have not been consulted about the war and have had no part in declaring war. They have been plunged into this war by the trickery and treachery of the ruling class of the country through its representatives in the national Administration and national Congress, its demogogic agitators, its subsidized press, and other servile instruments of public expression. We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world. In all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage. No greater dishonor has ever been forced upon a people than that which the capitalist class is forcing upon this nation against its will.

The majority report is signed by Kate Richards

O'Hare, Chairman, Victor Berger, Job Harriman, Morris Hillquit, Dan Hogan, Frank Midney, Patrick Quinlan, C. E. Ruthenberg, Maynard Shipley, George Spiess, Jr. and Algernon Lee; the minority report bears the signatures of Louis Boudin, Kate Sadler and Walter Dillon. A third report is signed by Spargo alone. In it he says:

> We do not believe that the entrance of the United States into the war at this late hour is due to a determination to fight for democracy, or for the independence of peoples from autocratic rule. Our capitalist class has shown too great an interest in the war to make such a belief tenable. But even if it is conceded that the war of the United States against Germany has been brought on by the capitalists of this nation in their own interests, we must still desire that in the struggle this nation shall be victorious.

He believed, moreover, that we cannot be indifferent to the "fact" that we are fighting "the most powerful reactionary nations." Allan L. Benson, the late Socialist candidate for the Presidency, referring in the New York Call to the course of action outlined for the party in the majority report—"continuous, active and public opposition to the war, through demonstrations, mass-petitions and all other means within our power"—warns the members against ratifying this report, since it verges "so close to the line of treason that in the event of loss of life in outbreaks against the war the signers of the report would be in great danger of suffering the death penalty for treason."

The War.—During the week the Allies have been attacking the Germans in France on a front of 150 miles. The British have advanced northwest of Lens, east of Epehy and Fampoux, and have taken Villers-Guislain and Gonnelieu. Their main endeavor, however, has been to consolidate their former gains. The French have been on the offensive between Soissons and Auberive, and have made very important advances. They have occupied Laffaux, Jouy, Aisy, Vailly, Ostel, Braye, Chivy, Craonelle, Craonne, Juvincourt, and Condé, driving the Germans north of the Aisne along all this sector. They have also pushed back the Germans a considerable distance from Reims to Auberive and have occupied the latter place.

Bulletin, April 16, p.m.-April 23, a.m.

The Senate voted the War Credit bill of $7,000,000,000 without a dissenting voice. Some minor amendments were adopted, but the bill is essentially the same as that which was passed by the House. It was decided that the differences should be settled in a conference of representatives from both Senate and House. The Secretary of the Treasury, however, opposed the Senate amendment which restricts his authority, but, though at this writing no compromise has been reached, the bill will probably survive practically unimpaired.

The War Credit Bill

The Senate Judiciary Committee reported favorably on the espionage bill in practically the form given it by the Administration. The only important change made by the Committee was the insertion of a clause guaranteeing to the press and the public the right to criticize the acts of the Administration. This clause, however, was subjected to vigorous opposition, when it came up for discussion in the Senate, on the ground that it did not sufficiently safeguard freedom of speech and the press. It was argued that even as amended the bill placed in the hands of the Government the power "to stifle all hostile criticisms of its acts." The objectionable features were eliminated and the section finally passed by a vote of 43 to 33. Even in its present form, however, it is considered far from satisfactory, and by some of its opponents as unconstitutional; it has been suggested that the United States Attorney-General should rewrite it. Discussion of the bill has been laid aside to make way for the army bill.

The Espionage Bill

The army bill submitted by the Administration to Congress contains several unusual features. It carries with it an appropriation for $3,000,000,000, which is designed to cover the expenses for raising and maintaining an army of 43,000 officers and 1,018,270 enlisted men. The important feature is the selective conscription plan which renders liable for military service all male citizens between the ages of 19 and 25. The Senate Committee on Military Affairs, after a vote of 10 to 7, reported favorably on the bill, with only one minor change, by which agricultural workers were included among those exempted from conscription. The bill has come up for discussion in the Senate but has met with serious opposition, and there is a strong movement to increase the age limits with either 18 or 21 as the minimum age and 40 or 45 as the maximum age. The House Committee on Military Affairs reported favorably on the other features of the bill, but failed to include the selective conscription section. In place of this it substituted an amendment authorizing, but not directing, the President to raise the first army of 500,000 men by the volunteer system. The vote of the Committee stood 12 to 8. The minority report of the House Committee has been published. It emphasizes the following advantages of conscription: that it will ensure an equal distribution of the burden of preparedness; that it will give definite information to each man as to whether he is liable for service and when he may expect to be called, and so will permit more effective performance of normal pursuits; and that it will remove the odium and penalties attending the draft system when it is resorted to after the volunteer system has failed. The report calls attention to the fact that at the present rate of volunteering, that is, about 1,000 a day, it will take 724 days to raise the 724,718 volunteers needed to complete the full war-strength of the regular army and the National Guard.

The Army Bill

Mr. Arthur James Balfour, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the British Empire, and the other High Commissioners to the International War Council, arrived in the United States on April 21. Mr. Balfour declared, in a formal statement that the object of the Commission was "to make cooperation easy and effective between those who are striving with all their power to bring about a lasting peace by the only means that can secure it, namely, a successful war." After thanking the American people for their efforts to alleviate the sufferings of those stricken by the war and in general for their "beneficent neutrality," he referred in words of sincere appreciation to the tireless and fruitful exertions of Mr. Gerard and Mr. Hoover, and alluded with great satisfaction to President Wilson's purpose of making safe the world for democracy. In conclusion he said:

Arrival of the British Commissioners

> That this great people should have thrown themselves wholeheartedly into this mighty struggle, prepared for all efforts and sacrifices that may be required to win success for this most righteous cause, is at once so happy and so momentous that only the historians of the future will be able, as I believe, to measure its true proportions.

Immediately on their disembarkation, the place of which was kept a profound secret, the British commissioners proceeded to Washington.

The new Spanish Ministry has reaffirmed the intention of Spain to preserve its neutrality. Turkey has severed diplomatic relations with the United States. Argentina has sent an ultimatum to Germany, declaring that it will arm its ships unless Germany gives complete satisfaction for the sinking of the Monte Pretegido. The latest official report of German casualties, published in Berlin, brings up the total of German casualties, according to computations made in London from previous German official reports, to 4,180,966. It is reported that Mr. Baker, in his capacity of Chairman of the Council of National Defense, has invited the Governors of the various States to send delegates to a National Defense Conference to be held in Washington on May 2.

Other Items

Ireland.—All probability of a general election was removed on April 17, when by a vote of 286 to 52 the House of Commons passed the second reading of the bill for the extension of the life of Parliament until November. The Irish Nationalists were the chief opponents of the bill on the grounds put forth by Mr. John Dillon, member for East Mayo, that no solution of Home Rule for Ireland had been announced.

Home Rule

Towards the end of the debate Mr. Andrew Bonar Law admitted that a solution of the Home Rule problem would be a great advantage in the prosecution of the war. The Government therefore was most anxious, he said, for a settlement and was most hopeful that the spirit generated in Ulster by the war would create an atmosphere immediately favorable to Home Rule. He declared that there never had been a time when there was so much good-will and that it was needless to despair of arriving at a solution. He announced that Mr. Lloyd George hoped to make a statement very soon on the Government's intentions. A general election, he added, would not be without danger when all the energies of the nation were needed for the prosecution of the war.

Mr. Dillon, moving on behalf of the Irish Nationalists the rejection of the bill, said the Nationalists would vote against the measure at every stage. The present Government, he declared, appeared to be no nearer the solution of the Irish question and was continuing a state of things in which the Irish party in the House of Commons could rightly be taunted with the charge that it could not speak for Ireland. For thirty-five years, Mr. Dillon said, the Nationalist party had told the Irish people that, whatever had been the treatment of Ireland by England in the past, there was a sense of justice and fair play in England, if it could only be reached. This work had now been undone by repeated disappointments and breaches of faith and by the contempt with which the advice of the Nationalists regarding recruiting in Ireland had been treated. In conclusion he urged the Government to present no "mutilated" settlement, but one which would satisfy the Irish people.

Mexico.—The new Constitution of the United States of Mexico was officially proclaimed at Queretaro February 5, 1917. Against this Constitution, which is an attack on their civil and religious rights, five Mexican Archbishops and nine other Prelates have issued a strong and dignified protest. The protest declares that the new Constitution attacks the most sacred rights of the Catholic Church, of Mexican society, and of its members, both as individuals and as Christians; it proclaims principles contrary to the truth taught by Christ; it does away with the few rights which the Mexican Constitution of 1857 still recognized as belonging to the Catholic Church as a society, and to Catholics as individuals. Without the slightest attempt to interfere in purely political questions, but with the sole intention of defending the religious liberties of the people, the Prelates, before examining in detail the specific cases of flagrant injustice of which they are the victims, state (1) that in accordance with the constant teaching of the Roman Pontiffs and the dictates of true patriotism, they disapprove and condemn armed rebellion against all legitimately constituted authority. They maintain, however, that passive submission does not mean that they approve or willingly submit to the anti-religious and unjust laws which a government may impose, or that they consent to see the Faithful deprived of their inherent right to use legal and constitutional means to have these laws amended or annulled. (2) That in making this protest they are not moved by the slightest desire of vengeance, or spite, or concern for their own worldly prosperity, or that of their clergy, their only motive being to fulfil their duty of defending the rights of the Church and religious liberty.

In their analysis of the revolutionary movement from its inception to the present day, the Prelates point out that the systematic attacks of the leaders and their partisans on the Catholic religion, its churches, its priests, its institutions of education and charity, prove conclusively that the movement, political in the beginning, soon became anti-religious. To give some color to the attack, the most senseless charges were trumped up by the revolutionists. Bishops and priests were said to have conspired to overthrow the national Government of 1911, and to have been the accomplices and abettors of the Government established in 1913. Now it was said that they wished to get hold of the Government and stamp out liberty forever. At another time they were accused of being in union with the Government which so long held the reins of power in times of peace, and, while in collusion with the wealthier classes, of trampling the proletariat under foot. The priests were accused of every vice and crime. It was rumored that stores of arms had been found in the churches, that there were priests and even bishops in the ranks of the "reactionary forces." These slanders were reechoed by the press. It soon became evident, the Prelates add, that since the Catholic Church was shorn of all civil power in Mexico, after the separation of Church and State had taken place, the one aim of its enemies was to deprive it also of its influence as a moral power in the country. The debates in the Constitutional Convention of Queretaro make this plain.

Coming to specific instances of injustice manifested in the Constitution of Queretaro, the Prelates refer to section 4 of article 130, which formally declares that it recognizes no such thing as religious associations called churches. On this point the signers of the protest say that even if the Catholic Church were not Divine and had not received from its Founder all that makes it a true society, it would have, from its own individual nature and independently of any authority whatever, its own proper nature and character founded on the right of the individual to religious belief and to the practices of religious worship. And as this right is anterior to the State and consequently independent of it, the injustice attempted against that general right of association in the people at large, becomes an aggression against the right of the individual. They protest, therefore, against that section of the Constitution as a violation of the right which Mexican Catholics have to see their Church recognized as a lawfully constituted body. That section is then contrary to the Constitution of 1857, unlawfully annulled, and even to the "Reform Laws."

The Prelates protest as vigorously against article 3 of the Constitution which deprives members of religious corporations and ministers of religion of the right to teach in primary schools; against article 5, which forbids the establishment of monastic institutions; against article 27, which orders the confiscation by the State of churches, seminaries, parochial residences, and against the whole series of iniquitous laws contained under article 130, and with particular energy against those which attack the sanctity of the Sacrament of Matrimony.

In conclusion the Prelates again solemnly affirm that they are not looking for power, but for tolerance and religious liberty for themselves and their people, and peace, prosperity and happiness for their country.

Russia.—The Socialists are weakening the Provisional Government's control. It is acknowledged that the Government cannot enforce its mandates without appealing to the people's patriotism, and the Socialists' Council of Workmen and Soldiers' Delegates apparently determines to what extent the Provisional Government shall be supported. On April 16 the Council, in congress assembled, adopted a resolution affirming the

Socialists' Growing Power

> Necessity of exercising an influence over the Provisional Government which would keep it up to a more energetic struggle against anti-revolutionary forces' and the necessity of exercising an influence which will insure the democratization of all of Russian life and pave the way for a common peace without annexation or indemnity, but on a basis of free national development of all peoples. . . . The congress calls upon the revolutionary democracy of Russia, rallying around the Council of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, to be ready to suppress vigorously any attempt by the Government to elude the control of democracy or to renounce the carrying out of its pledges.

The Council has ordered the arrest of five prominent generals, has passed a resolution favoring the suppression of classes and titles, and the confiscation of all lands belonging to the Crown or the Church, has recommended that a constituent assembly shall be convened in Petrograd as soon as possible on the principle of universal suffrage, that the army shall take part in the elections, that women shall vote, and that the Council of Workers and Soldiers' Delegates shall control the election.

Spain.—Induced by the consideration that the neutral policy adopted by the country prevented the proper defense of Spanish lives and interests, that the nation's prestige had been shaken and that its failure to side with Latin America in its stand against Germany involved loss of the moral leadership of the race, the Liberal Premier, Count Romanones, has resigned. Marquis Manuel Garcia Prieto succeeds him as Premier at the head of a Cabinet which like its predecessor is Liberal in politics. After its first meeting, the Cabinet announced that the constitutional guarantees, which, owing to labor troubles and other difficulties, had been suspended in some localities, would be fully restored.

The New Cabinet

A League to Enforce Peace

CHARLES G. FENWICK, PH.D.

THE general plan of a league of peace has been approved in principle by the leading statesmen both of the United States and of Europe. In President Wilson's mind the idea has taken more and more definite shape, first in the form of "some feasible method of acting in concert," by which the States can secure their fundamental interests, then more recently in the form of a "covenant of cooperative peace" representing "the organized major force of mankind." The Prime Minister of Great Britain looks forward to the time when the nations "will band themselves together to punish the first peace-breaker who comes out." M. Briand, recently Premier of France, hopes for "a solid, lasting peace guaranteed against any return of violence by appropriate international measures." Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg foretells at the close of the war "a cry for peaceful arrangements and understandings which, as far as is within human power, will prevent the return of such a monstrous catastrophe." None of these statesmen has, however, committed his country to the adoption of any definite program.

In respect to the attitude of President Wilson no formidable opposition was shown until in his note of December 18, 1916, calling upon the nations at war to state the terms upon which they were ready to conclude peace, the President pledged the cooperation of the United States in the formation of a "league of nations to insure peace and justice throughout the world." Immediately protests were heard both against the policy of having the United States become a member of such a league and against the unwarranted assumption of power by the President in promising such membership without the consent of the Senate. In consequence the President appeared before the Senate on January 22 to justify his position and to set forth the conditions under which he considered it possible for the United States to cooperate with other nations in establishing an international authority to guarantee peace.

The most serious objection urged against the participation of the United States in an international league of peace is the fact that such a step would constitute a radical departure from the traditional foreign policy of this country. Within a decade after the adoption of the Constitution, when the country was all but drawn into a war with England in consequence of a treaty made with France in 1778, Washington uttered in his farewell address the solemn warning that the United States, in extending its commercial relations with foreign nations, should have with them "as little political connection as possible." This policy of political isolation was doubly emphasized in the proclamation of the Monroe Doctrine in 1823, when the United States endeavored to make the entire western hemisphere a chosen land, free to pursue its own ideals of independence and self-government, unhampered by the European system which was then attempting to suppress the rising tide of democracy. To this heritage the United States has been consistently faithful, and so far has it been influenced in its diplomacy by that heritage that in 1899 and 1907, in signing the Hague Convention providing for the settlement of international disputes by arbitration and other peaceful means, the United States entered a reservation announcing its intention not to depart from its traditional policy of not interfering in European questions and of regarding American questions as distinctly in a class apart.

How then shall we break with the traditions of a century, give up the security of our isolated existence, and enter into the arena of European politics in the hope of maintaining a more stable equilibrium than any yet attained? The difficulty becomes less forcible the more closely it is examined. In the first place there is no analogy between the alliances Washington warned us to avoid and the proposed league of nations for the maintenance of peace. Rather it is the precise object of the league to substitute for the unstable balance of power of alliance against entente, an entirely new combination of forces, and the vital condition of the success of the league must be the number of nations it can rally to its membership. Moreover, neither is the physical isolation of the United States such as it was in the days when the ocean was truly a formidable barrier to invasion by sea, nor is the relative strength of the United States among the nations of the world such as it was in the early days of the Republic. More significant still of the new order in which we live is the fact that the United States has not only become a world-empire by reason of its possessions in distant parts of the globe, but has through the intricate network of its financial and commercial relations identified its interests with the common welfare and peace of all nations.

It is commonly asserted that the United States would never consent to arbitrate a question involving an infringement of the Monroe Doctrine, that we would not submit to a foreign tribunal a matter so closely affecting our vital interests. But it is sufficient to answer that we have already by our arbitration treaties of 1914 agreed to submit questions "of every nature whatsoever" to an international commission for investigation and report, binding ourselves not to make war in the meantime. Besides, the presence of the larger South American republics among the members of the league would be a more adequate guarantee of our interests and theirs than would any individual action on our part.

These are, indeed, but material considerations based upon our own self-interest. More impressive by far is the moral argument that relief from the present state of anarchy into which international relations have fallen can scarcely be hoped for unless the United States lends its aid to the movement for constructive reform. Not from any inherent virtue of our own, but from the circumstances of our origin and from our geographical position have we been able to set up an ideal of liberty and justice, to which we may not always have been true, but which has nevertheless been a standard of conduct for us and one which we may well contribute to the reconstruction of Europe. President Wilson, in his address of January 22, stated this ideal in fairly definite terms—the equality in respect to rights of all nations, great and small, the right of every people to choose the government under which they wish to live and to pursue their domestic policies unhindered, the freedom of the seas, and the limitation of the armaments which have hitherto made a mockery of the elaborate plans of arbitration adopted in one treaty after another. To stand apart under such circumstances would be to defeat the one hope for the future peace of the world.

A league of peace may, indeed, not prove feasible; the forces of disruption may prove stronger than the forces making for union, and national policies may refuse to yield to the higher interests of the world at large. As in the case of every association of individuals for the welfare of the whole, the success of the league will depend upon the extent to which its members are willing to impose upon themselves the self-restraint essential to cooperation; material interests must no longer be the absolute rule in the trade rivalries of nations. Whether the nations are willing to make the necessary sacrifices is for the future to show; but at least the United States, which has proved the success of federation within its own borders, can contribute its experience and its influence to the establishment of that same ideal among the nations.

What Does Ireland Want?

SHANE LESLIE, M.A.

THIS is an exceedingly difficult question because neither Ireland nor her friends nor her enemies can agree, even among themselves, what she wants for herself or what they want for her.

At present only vague abstractions which sound better to wild music than to mild common-sense are being used such as "Coercion for Ireland" "Coercion for Ulster," "An Irish Republic," "Twenty Years of Resolute Government." These are all wanted by different groups in Ireland, but they all imply failure or threaten confusion worse confounded.

The colonial solution, that is, a workaday gift of autonomy based on the free dominions in the Empire, has the merit of being acceptable to more groups at one time than any other. What Ireland wants is not so much any particular system as the recognition of her nationality.

The trouble is that only extremists can make themselves heard in Ireland. The majority are not asking for the impossible. Ireland does not wish to hitch her wagon to the moon. Her people are not clamoring for revenge or republics. Vengeance anyhow belongeth to the Lord and republics are for countries like Russia and France which have discovered the art of putting up successful revolutions. The world we live in is one which believes more in success than in principles. Ireland is a country which has staked so much for principle that she has failed—of success. A humdrum, practical, cooperative, unromantic home administration is what Ireland needs whatever her most impulsive and gifted sons have demanded and continue to demand.

The time has come for the dead to bury their dead on both sides and for the bitterness of the past to be engulfed in the peace of the future. If Ireland wants anything she wants peace at home and abroad. To ensure peace at home the cessation of internal strife is not only a desirable expediency but an absolute necessity if Irish nationality is to be carried into the next era.

Agonized by the war, distraught by the insurrection and menaced by the submarine, Ireland is not the buoyant, irreconcilable nation some of her absent partisans imagine. She is sad and a-weary. She is just as prepared to make peace with the Ulsterman within her gates as the liberal majority of Englishmen are to give terms to Ireland herself. And it is time surely. For Ireland is no longer young. Even her lovers and her poets personify her as a poor old woman. She is not qualified for a republican adventure. There is no older, no more traditional, no more conservative people in Europe. Ireland only asks to conserve her nationality.

It is remarkable that every movement which has agitated Ireland in the past century has been a conservative movement to conserve land, language and religion. The supreme and outstanding movement has been one to recover an eighteenth-century parliament out of the past. Home Rule is not a hazy experiment or political phantasy. It is a fixed idea round which many proposals and solutions have gathered. It is the national yearning for a visible and central sign that forming part of an Empire does not preclude Ireland from being a nation. As the Jews treasured their temple in a nationalist as much as a religious sense, so the Irish still look to the desecrated buildings on College Green, and even if the latter were razed to the ground as utterly as the former, the Irish race scattered over the world would never cease dreaming and planning some such restoration as lies at the root of the Zionist movement.

Ireland wants to combine the satisfaction of an ideal with the hope of economic salvation. At the root of her troubles lies the economic squalor of congested counties in the west and of congested cities in the east. These she wants to remedy by home legislation.

Ireland has asked for very little. Her demand is two-thirds sentimental and one-third economic. O'Connell's Repeal was for the restoration of Grattan's parliament which meant practically a landlord's parliament. But Protestant and landlord as it was, it had kept Dublin among the first half-dozen capitals of Europe. Had Repeal been carried we should have had a mixed assembly of old-fashioned landholders and Catholic demagogues, who between them would have held off the horrors of the "Famine." A Home Rule Parliament in the eighties would have had no place for the gentry. It would have been fiercely agrarian but would have attracted a strong element from the radical Ulstermen. Since then Ulster Radicalism has passed over to Toryism and Radicalism itself has found a strange but striking guise in Sinn Fein.

What Ireland wants is a fusion Government in which agrarians, gentry, Sinn Fein, Ulstermen and other elements can be represented to the exclusion of the fanatic. Ireland does not favor the triumph of any particular partisanship, but she does want an ideal fulfilled. She is prepared to be governed by Conservatives on condition they are Irishmen. A government of Redmondites and Ulstermen ruling for the common good with a spice of Sinn Feiners and Laborites in honest opposition would not be a hopeless opening of the new régime.

So important is an unpartitioned Ireland that Carson must be welcomed at College Green. He should be removed from naval affairs, of which he could know nothing, to Belfast, which he thoroughly understands. His ladle, more than anybody's, stirred the seething pot, and no living man has more unrest to set right in Ireland today than the original begetter of civil strife.

The kind of government Ireland wants is neither republican nor reactionary, one that need not be identified with any one of the present parties, though of course a Dublin parliament would be considered the climax of the Irish party's thirty years of struggle. Though Ireland wants a practical, she does not want a machine government. Bosses are bound to make their appearance, but free-lances can be expected to keep up a critical and healthy opposition. It would be difficult to exaggerate the loss of such a citizen as the late Mr. Sheehy Skeffington in a Dublin parliament. An even greater misfortune would be the prevention by illness of Sir Horace Plunkett assuming the portfolio of Irish Agriculture.

All sects and classes, all the social strata left behind by Irish history should find interest, representation and pride in a Dublin parliament. The only types who may be profitably excluded are the gombeen men, graziers, absentee landlords and dynamiters. These are all uneconomic factors. Ireland wants cooperation to succeed the disastrous effect of the gombeen or local money-lending class, tillage to swallow grazing, dynamiters to become absentees and the landlords to take an interest in the community of which they are part and of which they might have become leaders had they recognized the bed-rock principle of Irish nationality as Parnell.

The ideal as it exists in Ireland herself will be satisfied by what must needs be a compromise. To say so is no slight on those who gave their lives in Ireland a year ago. They rose for Ireland and not for a type of government which could not possibly have claimed a united and unpartitioned Ireland afterwards.

The ideal as it exists in many minds outside Ireland is disturbed by emotion and distance and demands more than Ireland herself wants. Ireland wants less than any other small nationality in Europe today. She asks to possess and enjoy that full colonial independence enjoyed by Canada and of which the principle is assured to the world by the entry of America into the war. She cannot ask less. She need not want more at least in this generation. For the time we must be practical and reconstructive, remembering that Ireland is immortal and that her final form and destiny is with God.

National Defense

HAROLD HALL

THEY were watching the First New York Cavalry swing across the Manhattan Bridge. In the pelting rain this group of three men stood there, and bared their heads as the colors appeared. "It's good to see the Guard back," said one. "You're wrong," said the second, "the Guard isn't back. The men are, but the Guard died down by the Rio Grande."

There seems to be truth in that statement, if you can judge from the opinion of the men who went to the border last summer as members of the militia regiments. All but the highly-paid officers returned home with the strong conviction that the National Guard idea is obsolete. Look over the roster of the different regiments and mark the long list of members who have not reenlisted and you will realize that the remark made one day on the Manhattan bridge has a big grain of truth in it. Well, if the Guard is going what is to take its place in our military system? Since April 6 the war-drums have throbbed throughout the land, and the question of adequate defense is paramount in every mind. How is adequate defense to be secured?

The National Security League, with its office at 31 Pine Street, New York, makes a very good answer:

1. Compulsory military training and service, wholly under national control, for all physically fit male citizens. 2. A navy of such strength as to make the United States the second naval power in the Atlantic and concurrently the first in the Pacific. 3. That Congress should immediately make provisions whereby the industrial and transportation facilities of the nation may be effectively mobilized in case of need.

The League is not a "foundation" affair. It makes its appeal to all American citizens for support in its campaign for preparedness. Not being endowed, it is supported by the small contributions of the public. It is both non-partisan and non-political, having no politics but preparedness, and hoping to obtain through public sentiment such measures of preparation as will ensure the country against the violation by any foreign power of American rights on land or sea. The League holds with George Washington, who while a soldier was not a militarist, that "If we desire to secure peace, it must be known that at all times we are ready for war." While very outspoken in its pronouncements, the League places the blame of unpreparedness where it belongs, on the whole people. In the erroneous belief that we were protected from foreign invasion by two great oceans, we have been living in a fool's paradise. The world-war has shattered this fancied security, and for years the General Staff of the army, and the General Board of the navy have been reporting our needs to Congress and demanding adequate appropriations. In the past, Congress has ignored the warning of experts simply because these warnings and demands were not backed by a strong public opinion. The National Security League was formed with the avowed purpose of crystallizing public opinion and bringing it to bear upon Congress.

In its declaration of principles the League stands for universal military training and service as the first and most essential requirement for real preparedness. In addition to preparing a petition to the President and Congress of the United States asking for the training of young men prior to their twentieth year with subsequent liability to service, the National Security League has secured the introduction into five State legislatures now in session, of a bill providing for military training in the schools. More than 100,000 copies of a catechism on universal military training have been distributed throughout the land, in addition to several thousand pieces of other literature on the same subject. It hopes to inaugurate a university-extension system to spread the message of civic duty and responsibility into every section of the United States. With 100,000 members, and 280 branches and committees scattered up and down the land the League is well equipped to do this work.

In Switzerland universal military training has been in effect since 1848, and in Australia since 1909. At the age of ten every Swiss schoolboy begins his program of physical training with a selected series of exercises looking toward the harmonious development of the body. At this age the boys spend two hours a week in physical training and at fifteen one hour a day is devoted to such exercise. At nineteen the young Swiss undergoes a physical and mental examination, and if he passes these tests he is recruited as an infantry soldier to begin service in his twentieth year. From his twentieth to his forty-second year just 193 days of service are required of a citizen in the Swiss republic, which makes an average of less than nine days a year for twenty-two years. As a result of this system the Swiss citizen soldier is said to be almost equal to any regular soldier in the armies of the world, and yet he devotes the whole of the productive period of his life, not to the profession of arms but almost exclusively to the pursuits of civil life. In Australia the boy goes through military instruction during his school years, between the ages of twelve and eighteen, and at nineteen he is enrolled for a period of eight years in the battalion of the region in which he lives. During these eight years he is liable to service in the event of war, but in normal times he is obliged only to give two weeks each year to service with the colors.

Apply the lesson to our own country. About sixty-five per cent of the male population which reaches the age of twenty would, each year, prove fit for military service, supposing we had compulsory military training in our schools. Eventually this would mean an active army of 2,500,000 men under twenty-four years of age, and a reserve of nearly 8,000,000 trained troops between the ages of twenty-four and forty-five ready to be called into active service in case of a long war. Of course this does not mean that we should abolish our regular army. We shall always need a small regular army as a nucleus and training corps for the citizen army. As Mr. Henry L. Stimson, former Secretary of War, says, it would serve "not only as a nucleus, but to be what we call our first line of emergency defense, both against internal disorder and against invasion." So that our policy as a nation would not be changed by the adoption of universal service. There would be this difference: under universal training our citizen army would go to the front really fit, with every man a good fighting unit, while under our present volunteer system our citizens are sent into the field in a state of unfitness best expressed by the unpoetic term "cannon-fodder." Moreover with universal training in vogue, millions of trained men could be mustered into service in a fraction of the time that it now takes to mobilize thousands of unfit men or misfits. Witness last summer's mobilization when the war-cloud loomed dark over the Mexican border.

It goes without saying that the American people will never tolerate a large standing army. It has always been the policy of the nation to depend on two classes of soldiers, the regular and the volunteer. Universal service would make the volunteer more than a mere man in uniform, with a few vague ideas on soldiering as he is today in our present military system. Again the democracy of the universal service system is true democracy. For true democracy means equality of obligations as well as of rights and opportunities, and that is not the case today when the burden of defense does not fall equally upon all classes of the population, rich and poor alike. Moreover, under universal military service, the people will have a voice in their army as they have in their government, and no man, whatever his position in civil life may be, will be able to shirk his military duty, but he will gain a place in the military organization that merit wins him. It should be remembered that our Government has power to compel every citizen to fight for the country, and yet is under no obligation to prepare him for such a task. The Civil War draft was the exercise of this power. A system of obligatory training would simply oblige the Government to make the citizen prepare for the performance of a task which he is now obliged to perform, whether he is trained or not. It is no more unjust to oblige the citizen to train for service than it is to oblige him to do jury duty or to pay taxes. Government exists to secure the greatest amount of good to the individual that is consonant with the welfare of the community. If the individual's rights or tastes are a harm to the many, they must cede to the common good. In the present instance, however, there is no clash of interests, for it is just as beneficial to the individual as to the community that every citizen be prepared to do his utmost in defending himself, his liberties, his home and his native land.

There is no doubt in the minds of those who have the welfare of American youth at heart that military training would instil into the hearts of our youngsters qualities of obedience and discipline, that are very much needed in American civil life. It would make patriotism mean more than waving a flag or standing up when the national anthem is played, by bringing early in life before the minds of all the very salient fact that citizenship means obligations as well as privileges. It would make our democracy more real by doing away with all class distinctions in the training and disciplining of the great citizen army of defense. There might be less juvenile crime, less of the mad revelry of pleasure that has grown into our youthful population, if the duty of citizenship was taught during early youth, as only universal training can teach it. Switzerland has found universal training worth while, as Frederick A. Kuenzli, Assistant Appraiser of the Port of New York, and formerly a lieutenant in the Swiss army, made clear in a recent address:

> Why did not Germany strike at France through Switzerland instead of through unprepared Belgium and defenseless Luxembourg? What prevented France and Italy from invading Germany at her most undefended frontiers through Switzerland? To both questions the answer is the same: The big powers knew how tremendous an obstacle the well-drilled and equipped, efficient, patriotic Swiss army manning the well-nigh impregnable fortifications of Switzerland would be to any invasion conducted through her territory.

No true American can doubt that universal training is worth a trial. Why not try it, and try it now?

A Tendency in Modern Art

J. Harding Fisher, S.J.

EVEN the most casual observer must have noticed that the spirit which has so seriously infected current literature has affected art as well, not great art, but such forms of it as find place in popular magazines. No one is surprised at this. It is only a recurrent phase of the temper that planted a grove in honor of Venus and Adonis on the sacred spot where Christ was born. The grove has disappeared and in its place is the Church of the Nativity. The goddess of reason usurped the place of Our Lady in the Cathedral of Notre Dame, but eventually the Virgin of Virgins came back to her own. So it will be with the present decadence in art. Christ's ideals cannot be thrust from the world. Neither literature nor art can be permanently dechristianized. They may suffer an eclipse, but the period of their obscuration will be temporary. Yet it must be confessed that Christian standards are being replaced to a lamentable extent in the popular mind by pagan standards; and in certain quarters to object is to incur the odium of being considered a puritan or a prude. Many of our people are worried and distressed, especially for the young; the ideas of the uneducated are somewhat confused, and even some Catholics are wondering if the traditional attitude of the Church is not too severe, and if her teaching on the relations of art and morality should not be readjusted so as to meet the exigencies of present conditions.

Of course the attitude of the Church will not be changed. Long centuries ago she adopted a definite position based on common-sense enlightened by faith. It goes without saying that she is irrevocably and unequivocally opposed to the exhibition of those works of art, if such can be dignified by the name of art, which are lascivious or obscene. With this policy all decent men, of all creeds and of none, are in sympathy.

As regards morals the stage, the novel and the short story are by no means beyond reproach; but art, with its more sensitive appreciation of the beautiful and its more deep-seated revulsion against the ugly, has not yet become a confirmed offender. It is, however, undeniable that more and more of the draperies that the American sense of decency has hitherto demanded in works of art exposed to the public gaze, are being discarded. The nude, which by common consent only a few years ago, was hidden in studios or in galleries, is showing a more unblushing effrontery, and is endeavoring, not without a measure of success, to win the sanction of public sentiment. Against this movement the Church, as in the case of so many other modern movements, has deliberately set her face.

She deprecates with reiterated insistence the dechristianization of art, she frowns with undisguised disapproval on the substitution of pagan goddesses for classic Madonnas, she rebukes with God-given wisdom the glorification of the flesh, she insists that the human form shall be clothed with modesty. Basing her attitude on the teaching of Revelation, reinforced by an intimate knowledge of the frailties and weakness of man, and relying on the instinctive sense of mankind, both civilized and uncivilized, she has always taught, as she still teaches, that the nude is offensive to pious eyes, even when it is not in itself sinful, or an approximate occasion of sin.

Naturally, on this subject she finds herself out of touch with advanced thinkers. To the protest of "art for art's sake," she turns a deaf ear, for she is not blinded by the fallacy so vigorously proclaimed by certain artists. Art is not exempt from the mandates of the Divine law, and has no more right to demand that it be divorced from morality than any other field of human endeavor. To those who declare that according to Saint Paul "All things are clean to the clean," she replies that to make these words an excuse for license is a plain perversion of the words of the Apostle by whom they were applied solely to the distinction between forbidden and unforbidden meats.

Neither is she misled by those other clever phrases used by the modern movement. Had man retained his state of primitive innocence, he might look without scruple or fear on what the holy God made holy. Unfortunately, however, there has been a Fall, original sin has spoiled the preternatural harmony between man's higher and lower faculties; and the consequence has been that the beauty of the human form, although it remains unchanged in the fallen state, undoubtedly exercises, nothwithstanding Redemption and grace, like many another thing which is good in itself, a dangerous seduction that leads man to sin. Physical beauty only too often fails to awaken and inspire moral control. The Church is still old-fashioned enough to foster the sense of shame. She is glad when the cheek mantles with crimson, she denies that the shrinking sense of modesty is an outgrowth of ignorance and superstition, to be cast aside by the enlightened with other survivals of medievalism. On the contrary she holds it to be a precious God-given gift, a warning against betrayal of the soul by the flesh, a sign of its fear of contamination, an evidence of its aspiration toward the life of the spirit. Natural to all men, it is intensified by grace. Its loss bespeaks decadence, not progress or evolution.

The Church is a prudent mother, and while anxious to accord her children every legitimate pleasure, she does not indulge them in folly. She will not allow them to trifle with danger that tends to weaken, and may kill, the life of the soul. She bids her children look out on the beautiful world of God's creation, and contemplate its subtle and varied beauty; but with stern common-sense, developed by her reading of history and her personal dealings with individual souls, she makes an exception. The deification of the flesh in Babylon and Rome led to gross sensualism, and even in Greece, the home of refinement, the worship of matchless beauty ended in orgies of indecency. Nations are made up of individuals, and the latter no less than the former are preyed upon by passion. There are embers of sensuality in man that are apt to burst into flame on slight provocation. Christianity, wise with the wisdom of ages, has striven to isolate the smoldering fires in the depths of the heart, and warns her children, at their peril, not to supply them with fuel. If the soul is to live the life of the spirit, it must dominate the body and hold it in check; for its passions, though not evil in themselves, are blind, and prone to excess, they need a strong rule of repression. Undoubtedly this is the traditional attitude of the Church towards the nude in art. However, there is another side of her teaching that must not be overlooked, if the understanding of her position is to be clear and safe from exaggeration.

The Church has always been the champion of true liberty; she does not find sin where sin is not, nor does she impose obligations where they do not exist. All the same she is careful to warn her children of danger, and anxious to screen them from peril of soul. Therefore, although the Church has never held that the contemplation of the nude in art is in itself and of necessity sinful, she has always insisted that such representations have in them an ever present element of danger which may easily become an occasion of sin, more or less serious according to age and temperament and training. She herself has been the faithful custodian of the treasures of art, but throughout the ages she has been instant with young and old that just as the chaste tongue has reticences, so has the chaste eye restraints. While admitting that the portrayal of the human form may be made the glorification of a beautiful work of God, she has never forgotten that even its idealization does not take from it its seductiveness. In certain cases she is prepared to admit that the element of beauty may so far transcend the other element as to make the latter practically non-existent; but she knows full well that such cases are rare, and that even in them the esthetic appeal is by no means for all men the strong appeal.

This two-fold attitude sums up the position of the Church on the nude in art. Those whose position or training or culture or temperament have made them to a great extent immune to danger, are not forbidden by her to look at art studies that have a high artistic value, provided they are sure of their intention, and are conscious that for them the attraction is not to be sought in disordered curiosity or some other unworthy motive. In large cities, where unfortunately the plastic arts have obtruded the undraped figure even on unwilling observers, it is not unlikely that such studies when moral and genuinely artistic, produce little if any impression on the ordinarily serious and mature mind, and hence do not constitute a serious moral danger for the adult whose thoughts are habitually wholesome. In smaller communities, however, where Christian modesty holds greater sway, and where the people have not been more or less accustomed from youth to spectacles of this nature, the nude in art presents greater peril and must be reckoned with as likely to prove a great temptation.

The same holds true to a great extent of the young, and of those who, though not young, have been guarded from such sights either by deliberate care or by circumstances of environment. Such persons will experience more trouble of soul, at least generally, in the presence of the freer forms of art, some will shrink instinctively from it, others will need to be more on their guard. There is then in this matter, as is clear, the question of the personal equation. A painting or a piece of statuary, which is, in itself, quite innocent, may affect individuals differently; what is for one a source of artistic pleasure, may be for another an occasion of moral danger; in one case the response may be purely esthetic, in the other it may be largely that of passion. Individual conduct must be regulated accordingly, and the regulation of conduct will depend on the ordinary principles, which apply to all occasions of sin. Hence the necessity of a prudent director for the formation of the individual's conscience, so that he may be able to steer a peaceful and safe course between timorousness on the one hand and laxity on the other, and may arrive at that liberty of action which St. Paul says is the right of the children of God.

Maternal Instincts

Richard A. Muttkowski, Ph.D.

To eat, to fight, to love: around these three are built up animal instincts and adaptations. Food, shelter, and defense form the great trio that affect the self-preservation and race-preservation of a species. In very many animals reproduction terminates life: shortly after oviposition the parents die. The eggs are often scattered promiscuously, left to chance preservation, or exposed to a million dangers, and productivity must offset the usual enormous loss. Incubation is provided for by the mother, either directly or by extrinsic means.

It may be of interest to examine some of the kinds of incubation. An elaborate provision is that of the Australian mound bird. This bird is about the size of a turkey and constructs gradually a mound of formidable size, several, twenty-five feet in diameter and five feet deep having been found. In the middle the bird places a pile of decaying plant matter, and upon this her three or four eggs, and covers the whole with loose rubble. The warmth generated by the decaying matter hatches the eggs after several months. So, too, does the fly lay her eggs in warm manure for incubation. Of a similar nature is the instinct that prompts turtles to bury their eggs in the hot sands.

In its higher development the work of incubation is performed by the mother. Here the birds are familiar examples; the embryo is enclosed in a porous shell and the warmth of the mother's breast insures its development. The emperor penguin of the Antarctics, which has not even a nest, lays a single egg, that must not touch the cold ice and is hatched out on the parent's feet. The mother has a bare patch of skin on the underside ringed with longer feather to surround the egg, and later the chick; this affords both the necessary warmth. As a whole, however, birds conform to a general type, and usually there is a nest of some sort, if only a few twigs or stones thrown together to keep the eggs from rolling away.

It is surprising that among amphibians which are regarded as much lower in the scale than birds and reptiles, internal incubation, so to speak, makes its first appearance. I exclude a number of viviparous insects, sharks, and snakes. In certain Venezuelan frogs of the genus Nototrema one species carries its eggs on its back, preventing their loss by a little parapet of skin. In another species of the same genus the edges of the parapet meet and fuse, and thus is formed a large pouch. In the celebrated Surinam toad, Pipa Americana, the skin forms a pouch around each egg; the egg remains enclosed through all its formative stages until the miniature toad finally slips from its pouch.

The habit of carrying the young is found in widely separate groups. Among mammals an entire order, the marsupialia, kangaroo and opossum, carries its offspring in a pouch or on its back. Among arthropods the larger spiders and scorpions carry their progeny on their backs for several months. With her customary penchant for placing the biggest surprises with the lowliest of her creatures, nature has endowed the scorpion with one of the highest developments of the maternal instinct—the sacrifice of the mother for the offspring. The scorpion is literally devoured by her children, and permits them to do so. We stand perplexed at the complexity of an instinct which causes the mother to submit calmly to dismemberment, without offer of resistance; yet this same instinct causes her at the same time to ward off any foreign intruder who might interfere with the dismemberment and perhaps save her life.

Lest marvel carry us to extremes, let us note that the action is a fixed instinct, and is not controlled by the light of intelligence. Like most instinctive actions, that of the scorpion shows no logic. For the scorpion permits strange progeny to be foisted on her and to dismember her; she does not distinguish her children from strangers. It is not a self-sacrifice due to love, but a fixed instinct, which compels the scorpion to submit to dismemberment at that particular period. I venture to say that if, as in other such periodic phenomena, the offspring be removed for a while at about the time of dismemberment, this instinct will lapse; and after restoration of the offspring the scorpion will no longer tolerate dismemberment, nor even tolerate her young. Periodic instincts are usually perfect for the period of their duration, and then lapse completely. Such is indicated during the nuptial activities of some of the running spiders; if they are prevented from building a nuptial burrow, or if a finished burrow be destroyed, the instinct to build lapses.

The unreasoning blindness of an instinct is shown in the following instance. One of the digger-wasps lays her egg on a paralyzed caterpillar, encloses it in a burrow, and returns every day to inspect the condition of the food. If the caterpillar has died, decay naturally sets in, and the mother hastens to remove the dead caterpillar and supply fresh food. Experimentally, the young grub may be removed; yet the mother wasp will continue to supply the burrow with fresh caterpillars, taking no cognizance of the removal of her offspring. Or again, if the cocoon of eggs which a running spider carries fastened to her abdomen be taken away and a wad of cotton or cloth, or even a cork or bit of wood, substituted, the spider does not recognize the deception.

One of the thread-legged bugs has youngsters that have short legs. The mother has very long legs and stalks gravely over her offspring, shielding it like a canopy, and teaching it to feed and protect itself. So, too, does the adult bird teach the timid fledgling to fly, even pushing it out of the nest if the youngster be not sufficiently courageous.

In the defense of the young all the instincts of self-preservation come into play, intensified by mother love. Combat, cunning, coloration, all the various devices which aid in the battle for food, are now employed, perhaps more aggressively than ever. Would you observe this, then buy a box at the price of a "movie," and arrange it to hold a wren, or martin, or swallow. You can then see how the mother fights for food, fights her environment and fights her enemies, suffering herself to be torn to pieces rather than desert her young. Yet the young have perhaps as much to fear from their father as from their worst enemy. Cannibalism is widespread in the animal world, and the male, be he mammal, bird, snake, fish, or insect, will only too frequently make a luscious meal of his offspring. So the female watches her mate just as diligently as she must watch a foreign foe. Indeed, this probably explains why so many animals will not tolerate their mates after the nuptials.

Only rarely will a mother turn on her kind; yet such is the case with various red water-mites, which calmly devour the eggs just laid. And some gulls, which kill the intrusive young of other parents, will sometimes kill their own, especially if a youngster is too greedy and hurts the other offspring.

But everywhere the maternal instinct of sacrifice dominates. After the animal has played, it is willing to sacrifice time, energy, food, and even itself, in the production of its kind. Parenthood is a normal instinct, and this instinct is immutable, like a law of nature; no animal can escape it. Man alone would shirk the burden, and therein he differs from his fellow-creatures. So far has reason carried him beyond the rest of creatures that he falls below their level. The cannibalistic animal will kill its offspring; man will not even allow his to come to life.

Did St. Augustine Say It?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Dr. O'Malley affirmed that St. Augustine "certainly does teach that the earth is flat." One is not properly said to teach what one sets down incidentally. But not even incidentally does the Saint make the statement attributed to him in the words quoted above. Dr. O'Malley's citation from the "Commentary on the Psalms" is no more to the purpose than the one from "The City of God." He says "the word orbis is a wheel in Latin and nothing else." This is simply not so. The first meaning of the word is "that which turns round a fixed point, a circle, orb, round, ring." In this sense we have orbis laneus, or "woolen orb," to signify a chaplet or fillet for the head. A secondary sense is "a circular surface, disk, whether real or only apparent." The use of orbis in the sense of wheel is poetical.

Commenting upon verse nineteen of Psalm 76, "Vox tonitrui tui in rota," "Orbis terrarum est rota," St. Augustine does say, "the orb of the earth is the wheel." But, of course, he does not mean that the earth is a wheel in the literal sense, any more than the author of the Psalm means that the voice of the thunder is literally in the "chariot-wheel." He uses the word in a metaphorical sense to signify that the earth is like a wheel. Now when you say the earth is like a wheel, you suggest by rota rotundity rather than flatness. And as the normal function of a wheel is to revolve upon its axle, St. Augustine's metaphorical expression might be taken to suggest the revolution of the earth upon its axis. I do not pretend that the Saint meant to suggest anything of the kind. But I do say that flatness is about the last attribute that would occur to one's mind in connection with a wheel, and that one might infer from the Saint's use of the word rota, his belief in the revolution of the earth upon its axis with greater reason than the belief Dr. O'Malley credits him with when he says, "he makes the earth as flat as a cart-wheel." Say, rather, as round as a cart-wheel.

St. Augustine knew of only three divisions of the earth, Europe, Asia, and Africa. He believed that the sea surrounded the whole earth, which was therefore "one great island, as it were," for he says, "in universo orbe terrarum, quae tamquam omnium quodammodo maxima est insula." (Ep. 199, n. 47.) It does not seem possible that he could have conceived of the earth as "a flat circular plain with the ocean for its rim." He says expressly that the sun rises on the opposite side of the earth when it sets in Africa, where he lived ("The City of God," xvi, 9), and his difficulty about admitting the existence of men on that side is, that he believes it to be entirely covered by the waters of the sea (ibid). The rim of a thing is but the outer edge of it. According to St. Augustine's way of thinking the ocean went right round the whole earth, and he fancied the antipodes to be nothing but ocean.

Those who judged by what appeared to their senses believed that the earth was flat. This was the popular notion. But long before St. Augustine's day, thinking men held the earth to be round. Lactantius, who himself accepts the popular view, tells us that belief in the rotundity of the world was the reason why some maintained that there were people living on the other side of it. St. Augustine, while neither affirming nor denying the popular view, refused to believe that there are men on the opposite side of the earth, because he thought it was covered with water, or, if dry land was there, that men could never have reached it, so vast was the expanse of ocean to be sailed over. He and the men of his time knew of many seas, but only of one ocean which they conceived to be impossible of transit.

The difficult passage in which the Saint incidentally speaks of the shape of the earth is thus rendered in the article of the Catholic Encyclopedia referred to by Dr. O'Malley:

> Those who affirm it do not claim to possess any actual information; they merely conjecture that, since the earth is suspended within the concavity of the heavens, and there is as much room on the one side of it as on the other, therefore the part which is beneath cannot be void of human inhabitants. They fail to notice that, even should it be believed or demonstrated that the world is round or spherical in form, it does not follow that the part of the earth opposite to us is not completely covered with water, or that any conjectured dry land there should be inhabited by men.

In the Latin original, the same passage runs:

> Neque hoc ulla historica cognitione didicisse se affirmant, sed quasi ratiocinando conjectant, eo quod intra convexa coeli terra suspensa sit, eundemque locum mundus habeat, et infimum, et medium: et ex hoc opinantur alteram terrae partem quae infra est, habitatione hominum carere non posse. Nec attendunt, etiamsi figura conglobata et rotunda mundus esse credatur, sive aliqua ratione monstretur; non tamen esse consequens ut etiam ex illa parte ab aquarum congerie nuda sit terra; deinde, etiamsi nuda sit, neque hoc statim necesse esse ut homines habeat.

The Oxford translators render the passage as follows:

> And, indeed, it is not affirmed that this has been learned by historical knowledge, but by scientific conjecture, on the > ground that the earth is suspended within the concavity of the sky, and that it has as much room on the one side of it as on the other: hence they say that the part which is beneath must also be inhabited. But they do not remark that, although it be supposed or scientifically demonstrated that the world is of a round and spherical form, yet it does not follow that the other side of the earth is bare of water; nor even, though it be bare, does it immediately follow that it is peopled.

The writer in the Catholic Encyclopedia appears to have borrowed from the Oxford men the translation of what really constitutes the crux of the passage, namely, the words, "eundemque locum mundus habeat, et infimum, et medium," "and there is as much room on the one side of it as on the other." But anyone who knows Latin will see at a glance that we have here not a translation, but the veriest guess at the meaning of St. Augustine. When writing my former letter, I did not myself venture to translate the words. Now I believe I have caught their meaning. The Saint understands by "mundus" that part of the world which is inhabited, or may be inhabited, by men; what we should call today the "habitable globe." The word often bears this sense in the Gospels; as when Our Lord sends out His disciples "in universum mundum." And what the Saint says is not that there is as much room on the one side of the earth as on the other, but that, according to the opinion of those whom he is citing, the habitable portion of the earth is coextensive with the globe, "eundemque locum mundus habeat," or rather, that the earth is habitable on all sides of it, and so, as it has a habitable part on top, so also it has a habitable part midway down (medium), and a habitable part underneath (infimum).

From all of this we gather that the notion of the earth as a sphere was present to the mind of Augustine, as it was to the minds of men long before his time; but, that in his day, while there was some reason for holding the earth to be round, aliqua ratione monstretur, there was no demonstrative evidence of the fact.

Boy Scouts and Catholic Publications

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There are two communications in AMERICA, under date of March 31, which I believe call for a word or so of supplement. The first pertains to the Boy Scouts. I think "R. E. P." is perfectly right in pointing out as fundamentally wrong the religious views inculcated by that organization, namely, the subordinating of religion and morals to merely natural ends. It is only one more phase of the materialistic ideal. However, Catholic boys clamor, and I think with justice, for the open-air, manly training of the Boy Scouts. The only answer I can see for this is: let Catholics, whether through their sodalities or through the splendid organization of the Knights of Columbus or similar societies, offer Catholic boys a Catholic Boy Scout movement, country-wide, if not in its beginning, at least in its ultimate scope. This has already been done in Argentina, where the "Exploradores de Don Bosco," organized only a few years ago by the Salesian Fathers, have spread all through the country and in the capital alone include in their thoroughly live membership 3,500 and more of the manliest and best boys. The same has been done in Italy, with the God-speed of his Holiness, Benedict XV.

The second word of comment is on "Good Catholic Monthlies." I am very glad that at last we have the courage and the common sense to talk about the Catholic press in specific terms, as Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock and "E. de la C." have done. Perhaps a great deal of the talk about the inefficiency and slovenliness of the Catholic press would dissolve into thin air by the simple challenge, "Specify!" Critics should be made to state which particular monthly or weekly they mean? Is it the excellent little Messenger of the Sacred Heart, palpitating with human interest from cover to cover, or the scholarly Catholic World, or the finely militant and progressive Extension, or the gracefully pious and wholesomely domestic Ave Maria? And just here I want to add still another unit to the white list of reputable monthlies, the Queen's Work, the Sodality's official organ, which for some three years has been at the task of awakening Catholics, and especially sodalists, to a knowledge of the power that lies ready to their hands.

A Form of Catholic Apostolate

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It would be well if all your readers took to heart the words written by Father LaFarge in AMERICA for April 7. His article on the rural apostolate of Catholic literature deserves careful attention. By all means let us send Catholic literature to our brethren in country districts. The introduction of the rural delivery has made such an apostolate extremely easy and very practical. Time for reading was never wanting to our farmers, especially in winter, nor the inclination, for they have not the silly entertainments of city life to distract them; and now the means of bringing them in touch with Catholic thought has been immensely facilitated by the rural delivery. Personal experience has taught me that Catholic literature is received by them, and by many non-Catholics, with avidity.

Would it not be feasible to start a society with the purpose of distributing Catholic books, pamphlets, papers, reviews and magazines? With a little organization our boys and girls could be made zealous workers in this fruitful apostolate. An inexpensive badge might be the sign of membership and a reminder of obligations, and a prize might be offered for the stimulation of effort. We Catholics should not be guilty of destroying Catholic literature, but should send it on its mission of good to the starving sheep within and without the Fold.

Denton, Md. RAYMOND VERIMONT.

Surprising Lethargy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Under the head of Education, in AMERICA for April 7, was related the sad experience of a missionary who met seventeen students on their way from Central America to Protestant colleges in the United States. On reading it I could not help asking myself the question: What are the priests of Central Amerıco doing? Is it possible for seventeen young men, of prominent Catholic families, to slip away from their various parishes, without the knowledge of their parish priests? The possibility of such an occurrence seems all the more strange to me for I remember vividly how different a state of things obtained some time ago, and probably still obtains, in Ireland. There the parish priest knew how many children there were in the poorest family in his parish, and how many needed shoes; and when the "hard times" forced the boy or girl from the meanest sheeling in the center of a bog, the sagart was there, the evening before they set out for the far-off land, to warn them of pitfalls and to tell the colleen to "beware of the 'gentleman' with the big gold chain, that 'owned a hotel out West.'" Surely the "Catholic" parents of those Catholic young men would consult their priest, or their priest would anticipate such consultation by urgently supplying all needed information relative to Catholic colleges or universities in the United States: all which information might be had for a few cents.

I would suggest that the first step to be taken to remedy this sad state of affairs, is to arouse the Central Americans from their lethargy, and to adopt your practical suggestions.

Censoring the Press

THE old question of censorship of the press is again to the fore. The underlying principle presents no great difficulty to any right-thinking citizen. The press is a powerful influence for good or evil. That a "free press," as generally accepted in this country, has accomplished much good, is beyond question. It has fitted in well with our political institutions. Its freedom may be reckoned, on the whole, as necessary as a strong opposition party in politics.

Unfortunately, like the theater, "free speech," and other factors which today shape the opinions of society, the grant of a free press has been often misused. Dickens' opinion of our ante-bellum newspapers might still be passed, with substantial justice, upon certain shamelessly partisan sheets, whose honesty of purpose is as small as their circulation is large. Apart, then, from the consideration of constitutional guarantee or legal restriction, common-sense obviously dictates at all times some degree of governmental press censorship.

It should not be forgotten that this censorship has always been exercised not only in Europe but in the United States. Legal enactment long since forbade the publication of writings inimical to public decency and order, although in this country leniency rather than strictness has characterized both statute and procedure. The problems which arise in war times may make it necessary to revise our practice. Confessedly, it is not easy to draw the line between what may be printed for the proper information of the public, and what should be forbidden as likely to give aid to the enemy. It is, of course, certain that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." It is equally certain, however, that to censor or even suppress public prints which may reasonably be deemed hostile to the general good, is fully within the province of the Federal Government. The difficulty lies in framing a law at once effective and in keeping with the spirit, as well as with the letter, of the Constitution.

Duty First, Pleasure Last

TODAY the country is facing a crisis serious beyond the power of men to realize. Tomorrow and the next day and for many days thereafter the situation will be graver, and no man can foretell the end. In such a contingency there is need for calm, stern resolve founded on patriotism untainted by selfishness. No other attitude of soul is worthy of the cause at stake. The cause is great; the souls that would sustain it with honor must be greater. For this reason the poster which appeals to our young men to enlist in the navy for "an opportunity to see the world," free of charge, does scant justice to the nation. Such a motive may make the eye dance and the ear ring, but the response in the heart will eventuate in pure self-interest, the worst of all possible qualities in a man supposed to be ready to sacrifice his life for his country. In the hour of trial men do not rise to heroism through the selfishness which such inducements as "opportunity to see the world" and free "foreign travel" engender; they rise to higher things on stepping stones of their dead selves. If they would glorify the flag, they must die, not only to an opportunity to see the world, but to themselves, their dearest personal wishes, their most cherished personal ambitions. They must give themselves to the country, because the country is worthy of the sacrifice of their lives.

Happily this latter motive is the only one that appeals to men in a crisis like the present. By an all-wise provision of God the normal soul responds generously to a call for sacrifice in the cause of truth and justice. So it will happen that despite the circular which seeks to stimulate enlistment by

An Opportunity to See the World.
Foreign Travel—Good Pay—Expenses Paid,

our navy will be fully manned by heroes to whom duty is first and pleasure last.

Let Them Get Acquainted

IN an excellent paper entitled "A Layman's Thoughts on the Mixed-Marriage Problem," recently contributed to the Ave Maria by Frank H. Spearman, the novelist, he remarks: "I have become convinced that mixed marriages for our young people are, for the greater part, wholly unnecessary, and that many of them now take place solely because of the lack of a little reasonable effort on the part of those directly and indirectly concerned." He suggests that short altar-talks on the perils of mixed marriages be given more frequently. Then if such a union is nevertheless contemplated, that the Catholic concerned should show more courage and firmness in insisting that the non-Catholic party should examine the Church's claims. What Mr. Spearman urges most strongly, however, is that our Catholic young people should become so well acquainted and so well satisfied with one another that the mixed-marriage danger will be reduced to a minimum. With this object in view he urges that the youths and maidens who attend our colleges and academies should be given while there more frequent opportunities for social meetings.

Mr. Spearman's suggestions, particularly the last, are no less praiseworthy than practical. To the staunch Catholic one of the saddest spectacles of our times is the increasing frequency of mixed marriages. Almost every week we learn of convent-bred girls becoming the brides of Protestants, and we hear almost as often that a graduate of a Catholic college has chosen as his life partner one not of his faith. Yet if that Catholic youth and that Catholic maiden had only enjoyed frequent opportunities while at school of meeting each other we should be reading perhaps in due season of a thoroughly Catholic wedding, celebrated "with a nuptial Mass yesterday morning at 9 o'clock, at which the newly plighted couple received Holy Communion." How much pleasanter to Catholic ears that description sounds than does a column giving a florid account of how "Miss Agnes Sullivan, a graduate of St. Mary's Academy, was married last evening at her home to Mr. Luther C. Smith, Harvard, 1912, the Rev. Father James O'Brien performing the ceremony at an altar beautifully decorated with Easter lilies, which was erected in the parlor."

Help for the Ukrainians

IT is safe to say that no nation has suffered more terribly during the present war than the Slavic people, known as Ruthenians or Ukrainians. Their country in Bukowina, Galicia and Volhynia has been a battleground visited by unceasing and unparalleled devastation. Almost from the very outbreak of hostilities the horrors of mortal conflict have swept over it, advancing and receding with the ebb and flow of resistless warfare. Its rivers have literally run red, and its valleys have been deluged with streams of blood. Not once only, as has been the case with other regions, but again and again, have the Austrian and Russian armies passed over it, and each time as the battle's lines swayed to and fro, destruction and carnage have followed in their wake. Death, desolation and despair are stalking through the land; the people, rich in historic traditions, in racial characteristics and in exalted devotion to the Catholic Church and the Holy See, are facing dispersion and extinction; and in Europe, in spite of strenuous efforts, there is no one to give them adequate help.

So great is the menace to this ancient and honorable member of the human family which through its immigrants has contributed in no small measure to our own national prosperity, that the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled resolved recently to petition the President to call on all our people to join hands with the belligerents of Europe in arresting the mortal peril that is now threatening a noble race. If gold ever deserved to be designated "sacred" it is for its possibilities of good in such crises as this. The highest Executive of the land has thought it a cause worthy of receiving an official recommendation.

America has always been generous. Active in getting, it has also been prodigal in giving. Its sympathy has ever been ready and practical. Mere money can give food to the starving, crutches to the crippled, shelter to the homeless, refuge to the aged, life to widows and orphans. Even a little gift will swell the general fund. Readers of AMERICA can surely be counted on to do their share. Contributions sent to the "Ukrainian Relief Fund," Federal Trust Co., Jersey City, N. J., will be hurried abroad on their mission of charity. All who can would do well to help this new Niobe among the nations.

The Thief of Time

TO the careful observer, one who finds books in the running brooks and sermons in stones, the perusal of a modern trade paper will be equivalent to a brief course in psychology and the doctrine of universal preparedness. Take, for instance, the following quotation from what the editors call a "house journal," issued by a St. Louis manufacturer.

> I'm going to start something—Tomorrow.
> I've made up my mind to turn over a new leaf and get busy—Tomorrow.
> I'm going to learn all about this business, and then I'll make things hum—Tomorrow.
> I know I ought to have a better window-display, and I'm going to work to begin to learn—Tomorrow.
> I admit I've gotten into a rut; but you just watch me begin to get ready, to start, to commence, to prepare, to undertake, to study, to learn, and to get a real move on—Tomorrow.
> Great Scott, no, not today.

Here is a whole world of wisdom. Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow creeps in a petty pace from day to day; we have Shakespeare's word for it. But the man who has acquired the habit of deferring burdensome duties creeps in a pace that is still more petty, and he will be found far from the goal, when the last syllable of recorded time has been spoken. It is said that a city on the plains became a metropolis by inculcating upon its citizens the maxim, "Do it now." The man who has attained success by "banking" on the morrow while neglecting the present, is as rare as a perfect vacuum. Tomorrow is a child most like its parent, today. Certainly there was never a saint who was a procrastinator. "Not today," said St. Augustine, "tomorrow." But he was not a saint when he said that. He became a saint by transforming the terms of his earlier resolve, and seizing today—for God.

To Whom shall We Give?

THE increased cost of living has occasioned much distress during the past winter. With the country at war, a further increase in the price of commodities seems inevitable. No doubt the various commissions appointed by the Federal Government to take stock of the country's resources, to forecast its probable needs in the immediate future, and to study how these needs may be best met, will adopt summary and effective means, should the occasion warrant, to prevent excessive prices. Furthermore, what the Federal Government cannot do, will be supplied by the action of State and municipal bodies. On the other hand, it should not be thought that these commissions can do everything. Frugality, foresight, and the avoidance by all of anything like waste, are imperatively demanded; in fact, without this cooperation, the most wisely planned programs will be worthless. What has taken place in other times of national conflict cannot be wholly averted in the present war. Commodities will rise in price, and the burden will press most heavily on the poor, many of whom, even under the present comparatively favorable régime, are barely able to make ends meet.

Perhaps the majority of those who will soon stand in need of help, are our brethren in the Faith. The calls upon the generosity of wealthy Catholics are already numerous, nor are they likely to become fewer within the next twelve months. Obviously, not all these calls can be answered. Is it presumptuous, therefore, to suggest that when a choice must be made, preference be given Catholic charities? God forbid that we should even seem to belittle any charity done in His Name. Yet our Catholic charities are very needy. They have few wealthy friends, while those who are willing to help the charities outside the Church are many, and their resources are great. There is scarcely a parish in the United States where the St. Vincent de Paul Conference has adequate funds. And every penny received by this great organization is applied, it must be remembered, to charity. There are no "overhead expenses." Our countless institutions for dependent children and dependents of all kinds, could not exist a day were it not for the generous sacrifice of our Sisters and Brothers. They are content to live on the bread of the poor; "salary" has no influence in their work. Every father knows the difficulties of providing today for a family of children. But what are his difficulties, who must care for four or five, compared with the difficulties of a small religious community which must care for four or five hundred?

The poor are our brethren. God will abundantly bless whatever we do for them, no matter who they are, or where they may be found. But, unfortunately, we cannot help all. Well ordered charity, then, would suggest that we select those of the household of the Faith to represent the Lord Christ whom we would serve in our benefactions.

LYLY AND THE EUPHUISTS

THERE were euphuists, of course, long before the days of John Lyly. The first euphuism was no doubt uttered that memorable hour when work on the tower of Babel was permanently suspended. For some fastidious trope-loving son of Sem probably added to the confusion of tongues by calling out to a mason who was laying bricks with more speed than care: "The bavin though it burn bright is but a blaze!" or "Though the stone cylindrus at every thunderclap roll from the hill, yet the pure sleek-stone mounteth at the noise." For we may assume that from the earliest ages there have been men and women who affected a sort of estilo culto, a manner of writing or speaking that was meant to mark the user of it off from common spirits and the barbarous multitude. The language of kings and courts was thought to possess a certain distinction that mere untitled folk could never hope to acquire, and our "best society" is believed to have a drawing-room vocabulary that the hapless "unarrived" toil in vain to master.

A few centuries ago, for instance, the wide diffusion of handbooks professing to teach the art of polite conversation and skill in practising the courtly graces was one of the Renaissance's developments. About the year 1558 Archbishop Della Casa expounded the laws of etiquette for the young gallants of Italy. Bishop Antonio de Guevara's "Dial of Frinces," written in Spanish, during the early part of the sixteenth century had a somewhat similar object, and in France a hundred years later the salon of the Marquise de Rambouillet gave currency to an elaborate, artificial kind of colloquial and literary expression, the bourgeois imitators of which are held up to derision in Molière's "Les Précieuses Ridicules."

In England, however, the earliest exponent of this preciosity was an Elizabethan author named John Lyly, an Oxford scholar and an indigent courtier. The book which made him famous was "hatched in the hard winter of 1578" and bore the comprehensive title: "Euphues: the Anatomy of Wit. Very pleasant for all Gentlemen to read, and most necessary to remember: wherein are contained the delights that Wit followeth in his youth by the pleasantness of love, and the happiness he reapeth in age by the perfection of wisdom." This volume was followed a year later by "Euphues and His England, Containing his voyage and adventures, mixed with sundry pretty discourses of honest Love, the description of the country, the Court and the manners of that Isle. Delightful to be read, and nothing hurtful to be regarded; wherein there is small offense by lightness given to the wise, and less occasion of looseness proffered to the wanton."

The books became "best-sellers" at once. From the year 1578 to 1581 "The Anatomy of Wit" went through five editions, and "Euphues and His England" saw seven editions between 1580 and 1586, and for some fifty years both volumes enjoyed an amazing popularity. The reason is plain, for in "Euphues" Lyly made a direct appeal to feminine readers, a thing which had not been done before. The author himself wrote that his book "had rather lye shut in a ladye's casket than open in a scholler's studio," and Edward Blount attests that "All our Ladies were then his [Lyly's] Schollers: and that Beautie in Court which could not Parley Euphuisme was so little regarded as shee which now there speaks not French." The ladies conned Lyly's writings tirelessly, committed to memory vast quantities of his expressions, and led by Golden Eliza, who was "the most affected and detestible of euphuists" herself, became so artificial and pedantic in their conversation that their folly gave a new word to the language, i.e., euphuism.

Elizabeth found pleasure, no doubt, in reading from the pages of this consciousless courtier such veracious tributes to her purity, loveliness and zeal as these:

> As this noble Prince is endued with mercy, patience, and moderation, so is she adorned with singular beauty and chastity, excelling in the one Venus, in the other Vesta. Who knoweth not how rare a thing it is, ladies, to match virginity with beauty, a chaste mind with an amiable face, divine cogitations with a comely countenance? But such is the grace bestowed upon this earthly goddess that, having the beauty that might allure all Princes she hath the chastity also to refuse all, accounting it no less praise to be called a virgin than to be esteemed a Venus, thinking it as great honor to be found chaste as thought amiable. Where is now Electra, the chaste daughter of Agamemnon? Where is Lala, that renowned virgin? Where is Aemilia, that through her chastity wrought wonders in maintaining continual fire at the altar of Vesta? . . .
> Her care for the flourishing of the Gospel hath well appeared, whenas neither the curses of the Pope (which are blessings to good people) nor the threatenings of Kings (which are perilous to a Prince) nor the persuasions of Papists (which are honey to the mouth) could either fear her or allure her to violate the holy league contracted with Christ, or to maculate the blood of the ancient Lamb which is Christ. But always constant in the true faith, she hath, to the exceeding joy of her subjects, to the unspeakable comfort of her soul, to the great glory of God, established that religion the maintenance whereof she rather seeketh to confirm by fortitude than leave off for fear.

Elizabeth's canny ministers of state must have been as highly entertained by passages like the foregoing as her ladies-in-waiting were gratified to read such praises of their sex as these:

> What could Adam have done in his Paradise before his fall without a woman, or how would he have risen again after his fall without a woman? Artificers are wont in their last works to excel themselves. Yea, God, when He had made all things, at the last made man as most perfect, thinking nothing could be framed more excellent; yet after him He created a woman, the express image of Eternity, the lively picture of Nature, the only steel glass for man to behold his infirmities by comparing them with women's perfections. Are they not more gentle, more witty, more beautiful than men?

Where then is John Lyly's niche in the temple of literature? From a perusal of the scholarly introduction and the wealth of notes with which the latest edition of "Euphues" has been furnished, it is clear that he was not a genius, only a clever borrower and phrase-maker. For in the "Lyly's Euphues" which E. P. Dutton & Co. recently brought out and Morris W. Croll and Harry Clemons, two Princeton scholars, admirably edited, every scrap of learning that the author displays is mercilessly traced down to its source, and all his tricks of style are subjected to a ruthless analysis. The passage, for example, that gave Lyly the first inspiration for his book is found in Roger Ascham's "Schoolmaster," in which "Euphues" (a man well endowed by nature) is described as one "That is apt by goodness of wit and appliable by readiness of will, to learning, having all other qualities of the mind and parts of the body that must another day serve learning." So Lyly makes his "Euphues" a young Athenian gentleman who holds interminable conversations with his Neapolitan friend Philautus on shoes and ships and sealing-wax. Of action there is very little. The book's most striking characteristic is its affected and artificial prose style. The author is constantly laboring at antitheses and epigrams, and building up long series of parallel sentences with practically the same syntactical forms, and abounding in fantastic similes and comparisons drawn from Roman and medieval natural history and from classical mythology. Lyly's style is probably modeled on that of Padre Góngora, a Spanish poet of the period.

The chief source of our author's inspirations, as Mr. Croll shows, were the voluminous writings of Erasmus. In that great book-lover Lyly found "scientific phenomena" culled from Pliny, moral reflections from Plutarch and quaint comparisons taken from medieval bestiaries and herbals. Here are two highly characteristic passages, for example, from Lyly's book which illustrate admirably the form and matter of his paragraphs:

> The foul toad hath a fair stone in his head, the fine gold is found in the filthy earth, the sweet kernel lieth in the hard shell. Virtue is harbored in the heart of him that most men esteem misshapen. Contrariwise if we respect more the outward shape than the inward habit—good God, into how many mischiefs do we fall! Into what blindness are we led! Do we not commonly see that in painted pots is hidden the deadliest poison, that in the greenest grass is the greatest serpent, in the clearest water the ugliest toad? Doth not experience teach us that in the most curious sepulcher are enclosed rotten bones? That the cypress tree beareth a fair leaf but no fruit? . . .
> One drop of poison infecteth the whole tun of wine, one leaf of Coloquintida marreth and spoileth the whole pot of porridge, one iron-mole defaceth the whole piece of lawn. Descend into thine own conscience and consider with thyself the great difference between staring and stark-blind, wit and wisdom, love and lust. Be merry but with modesty, be sober but not too sullen, be valiant but not too venturous. Let thy attire be comely but not costly, thy diet wholesome but not excessive, use pastime as the word importeth—to pass the time in honest recreation. Mistrust no man without cause, neither be thou credulous without proof, be not light to follow every man's opinion, nor obstinate to stand in thine own conceit. Serve God, love God, fear God, and God will so bless thee as either thy heart can wish or thy friends desire. And so I end my counsel, beseeching thee to begin to follow it.

Some critics think that second passage the source of Polonius's advice to Laertes. Perhaps. But it is easy to distinguish the poet's use of his material from the pedant's. In the dialogues between Moth and Armado, that "man of fire-new words, fashion's own knight, that hath a mint of phrases in his brain," Shakespeare seems to be parodying Lyly, and Falstaff is obviously taking off Euphues when he remarks in the first part of "Henry IV": "Though the camomile, the more it is trodden on, the faster it grows, yet youth, the more it is wasted, the sooner it wears."

Most moderns, it is safe to say will find "Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit" and "Euphues and His England" pretty tedious reading. The work will hardly be listed among the best-sellers again. But if the perusal of Lyly's quaint volume will make present-day readers realize how silly and ridiculous an affected, artificial style of speaking or writing is, "Euphues" can still be studied with profit, and may change some of its readers from euphuists into euphemists.

History of the Sinn Fein Movement and the Irish Rebellion of 1916. By FRANCIS P. JONES. With an Introduction by HON. JOHN W. GOFF. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $2.00.

During the year that has elapsed since the fateful Easter of 1916 many things have happened and many truths have been revealed that had heretofore been concealed or not generally understood. "To write intelligently and convincingly of Irish affairs," says Judge Goff in his introduction to this book, "requires familiarity with a tangled subject and a keenness of vision that will perceive the genuine from the counterfeit." Mr. Jones, therefore, during the period that has gone by since the Dublin "rising," has carefully collected these details and woven them comprehensively and consecutively into a story that presents the tragic culmination of what Judge Goff calls the "patriotic political economy movement" of the Sinn Feiners. The manner in which the author does this, and the deft selection of his material from a morass of generalization will enable the average reader to grasp a much clearer and truer understanding of a "tangled subject." The story Mr. Jones tells is the radical Nationalist view of the latest chapter of Ireland's sorrowful record, and so he is not sparing of his criticism of Mr. John Redmond's leadership or the parliamentary activities of his followers. "The whole course of the Irish rebellion of 1916," he says, "is set with one romance after another. This is due to the extraordinary circumstances that surround almost every phase of what is one of the most impressive chapters in the history of Ireland," and what he relates of Pearse, Casement, Plunkett, Clarke, Macdonagh, The O'Rahilly, and their associates in the short-lived Irish Republic loses nothing of interest in his sympathetic telling of the realities that are as romantic and gripping as the old cycles of Fionn, Conn and the Red Branch. One notable incident mentioned is the fact "that so far as is known there has not figured in the rebellion that tool of England and shame of Ireland—the informer." A "roll of honor," giving the names of those killed during the rising and of those arrested after its suppression, with the sentences imposed on them by the courtsmartial, is given in the appendix. A fairly full index adds to the value of the volume for reference uses. T. F. M.

A Popular Life of Martin Luther. By ELSIE SINGMASTER. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.00.

Luthers Leben und Lehre. Nach älteren und neueren Lutherstudien zusammengestellt. New York: Kolping-Haus. $0.12.

It is disheartening to take up a book like the short life of Luther which Elsie Singmaster offers as her contribution to the Luther quadricentennial. All the ancient misconceptions concerning Catholic doctrine and practice which have served for centuries to beget and foster prejudice and breed discord among men, are here soberly rehearsed as if they had not been answered and explained a thousand times. The writer is not to be accused of insincerity. She is apparently convinced that her travesty of the great Catholic Church, which today, as through all the preceding centuries, can claim for her own many of the world's most learned as well as most saintly men, is a faithful picture. Like many a Protestant, she has taken for granted the truth of all that the Church's professed enemies have fabricated against her, yet a reference to Catholic sources or to intelligent Catholic friends could readily have corrected these perverse views. Against an imaginary background of Catholic ignorance, idolatry and superstition, where sins past and future are freely forgiven for money, stands out a saintly Luther. Who could imagine him ever to have written such works as the "Shem-Hamphoras"?

As a corrective, we would heartily recommend to the author and her friends a perusal of the courteous little volume, "Luthers Leben und Lehre." There is no attempt to cast ignominy upon those who differ in religion from the author. The facts of Luther's life as based upon the best authorities and upon Luther's own words are simply and accurately stated, and his doctrine is honestly discussed and effectively refuted. The book lays no claim to originality, but is the more valuable in so far as it condenses within less than a hundred pages the vital historic facts regarding the life and teaching of the so-called Reformer. The author, "a friend of truth," has composed his compact booklet with a sincere desire of telling the exact truth and of giving a correct estimate of Luther. J. H.

Anthony Gray,-Gardener. By LESLIE MOORE. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

Gold Must Be Tried by Fire. By RICHARD AUMERLE MAHER. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

These two novels maintain the high standard reached by their authors in their previous excellent work. Both are by Catholics and each is typical of a class. "Anthony Gray,-Gardener," is an example of the careful, artistic workmanship so characteristic of much of the English writing; and "Gold Must Be Tried by Fire" is in the strong, vigorous style in favor among the best American novelists. The former book is placid, chiseled, beautiful. Its author is keenly alive to the appeal of nature, and has a clever way of creating atmosphere and suggesting moods by means of description; the latter is direct and forceful, and has little interest except in persons. Charm is the salient character of the first, power the striking quality of the second. Culture and refinement are the background of the English story, and more primitive conditions the setting of the American; but both are true to type, are restrained in manner and move steadily towards the climax.

In "Anthony Gray,-Gardener" the love motive is the principal interest; the promise of happiness is clouded by a misunderstanding, but in the end everything comes right. The characters are rather conventional, but the situation and the entanglement are very original. In "Gold Must Be Tried by Fire," the author's concern is the development of a sterlingly true character through many trials into full maturity; much of the volume is devoted to a study of labor conditions, which give it a permanent value quite apart from the tale itself. Both books have a Catholic tone, which however is not obtrusive, both are thoroughly wholesome, and both are well worth reading. J. H. F.

The Celtic Dawn. By LLOYD R. MORRIS. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50; The Contemporary Drama of Ireland. By ERNEST A. BOYD. $1.25; Dunsany the Dramatist. By EDWARD HALE BIERSTADT. $1.50; Mogu the Wanderer or The Desert: A Fantastic Comedy in Three Acts. By PADRAIC COLUM. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $1.00.

The friends of the Irish Renaissance can hardly complain that its light is being hid under a bushel. These volumes prove that both in its more general movement and tendencies and in the works of its representative writers, it is gaining a wider and more significant recognition every day. While there are elements in the revival we would gladly wish away, all must recognize that the movement is growing and that those who guide its tendencies are men of unusual if at times of peculiar power. It is evident that for weal or for woe it is fraught with the greatest possibilities and consequences for Ireland.

In "The Celtic Dawn" Mr. Lloyd does not confine himself to the mere literary aspects of the movement. For him the "Celtic Dawn" is a synthesis of many correlated tendencies. He naturally gives great importance and relief to the literary revival in the drama, the novel, in criticism and poetry, and pays special attention to Russell, Yeats and Synge. But this was accompanied by another revival, more important and more significant in some respects in the social, agricultural, political and economic life of the country, and this he thoroughly analyzes. Recent events in Ireland will lend an added interest to the last chapter of the book: "Economic and Social Reform." It is difficult, however, to understand the admiration of the writer for George Moore's "Apostle."

Ernest A. Boyd writes with the same intimate knowledge, the same faculty of arousing and keeping up the interest of the reader, which he has already shown in his previous volume, "Ireland's Literary Renaissance." He goes over some of the ground traversed in the former book, but views his subject from a slightly different angle and manages to point out in this larger study of the drama certain aspects which he had been obliged to omit. In the "Celtic Dawn" Mr. Morris emphasizes the position of John Eglington in the general revival of Irish letters. In the development of the modern Irish drama Mr. Boyd lays a similar stress on the work and influence of Edward Martyn. It is easy to agree with the author with regard to the undoubted power of Yeats, Synge, their imitators, and disciples. But the impression prevails in reading them that there is something in Irish character and life which they have been unable to interpret and that a great deal of what they ascribe to Irish men and women in their strange and puzzling plays belongs to types with which the majority of those who know Ireland are not acquainted.

The study of that gifted dramatist, Lord Dunsany, brings before us the man, his work and his philosophy. The methods of the young writer are keenly scrutinized and an effort, quite sincere no doubt, is made to lead us to believe that the work of the Irish playwright is one of the great achievements of the day. That in Dunsany's plays there are remarkable economy of detail, strange and startling situations, and unexpected solutions, it is impossible to deny. But with all their power and skill, something unsubstantial and unreal pervades these plays. They carry the puzzled reader into the regions of the fantastical and whimsical, and leave him unsatisfied. The same might be said of "Mogu the Wanderer." Leaving aside such Celtic themes as he had treated in "Thomas Muskerry," Padraic Colum has gone in "Mogu" to the East, already pressed into dramatic service by Dunsany. "Mogu" is what it pretends to be, thoroughly fantastic. The Wanderer's rise from beggary to power and his sudden fall is not a very original theme. But the skill of the author has endowed it with interest. Padraic Colum, like nearly all the writers of the neo-Celtic school, knows what dialogue should be. But, in spite of its startling climaxes and kaleidoscopic changes, "Mogu" does not satisfy.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Mr. Henry Newbolt has added to his war-books for boys a very modern one, entitled "Tales of the Great War" (Longmans, $1.75), which Norman Wilkinson and Christopher Clark have suitably illustrated with pictures in color and in line. The author explains in the introduction that he means to give his readers "the truth, the actual facts, well-evidenced and clearly arranged," and he believes his book "to be as accurate as anything yet written," "for two great admirals, one great general, and several junior officers have read my manuscript, and made corrections and additions of the utmost importance." The battle of Ypres, the battle of the Falklands, the story of the Emden, the battle of Mons and of the Marne, a description of airships' work in the war, and an account of the battle of Jutland, form the subject-matter of his narrative; and he praises deeds of heroism even when performed by the enemy.

The latest volume of the excellent "Notre Dame Series of Lives of the Saints" is "St. Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux, A.D., 1090-1153" (Herder, $1.25), by an anonymous author who has made good use of the Saint's writings and of other available material. The Cistercians' manner of life is well described, the turbulence of the times vividly pictured, and St. Bernard's varied activities as religious superior, defender of the Holy See, vanquisher of heretics, preacher of a crusade, and as one of the Church's great mystics are all reviewed in a way that will interest the general reader.———Going for her matter to the London Oratorians' biography of the "hospital Saint," a New Hampshire Sister of Mercy has written a short life of "Camillus de Lellis" (Benziger, $1.00), that will appeal to the numberless religious in this country whose work is the care of the sick. The Blessed Sacrament, the Crucifix, and the Precious Blood were the "three loves" of this devoted man, and from them he learned how to find Our Lord in the poor and suffering.

F. J. Foakes's "Social Life in England, 1750-1850" (Macmillan, $1.50) is a reprint of the Lowell Lectures delivered in Boston last March. Not all our readers know what these lectures are; but they must be very pleasant for the lecturer who comes to the United States, performs his part, receives his honorarium and then puts his lectures in a book for further profit. When we know that such things are we fall into the frame of mind of Fred Bayham professing himself ready for adoption by Colonel Newcome or any other nabob. The lectures are pleasantly readable, but it is not easy to understand how gossip about John Wesley, Cambridge University, "Oliver Twist," "Vanity Fair" and "The Newcomes," Crabbe, Margaret Catchpole and Mr. Sponge, entertaining as it is for the moment, can be justly called "Social Life in England." Certainly when we took up the book we formed expectations that were not fulfilled. Whether they were disappointed or not, is another question. Anyhow the book will be welcome to many as an agreeable companion for a leisure hour.

Mary G. Segar, whose excellent "Medieval Anthology" was reviewed in our issue of March 11, 1916, has now edited "Some Minor Poems of the Middle Ages" (Longmans, $1.00), a collection of twenty-three poems that will interest readers of Middle English and will also make a good text-book for those beginning that study, as Emmeline Paxton has furnished the little volume with an adequate glossary. "Confidence, love and joy," the editor well observes, were the dominant notes in the medieval lyric. In those days "men and women had the faith and courage to make their religion their supreme interest, and showed a heroic spirit of sacrifice in foregoing comfort, pleasure and worldly prudence for its sake." These two stanzas from the first lyric in the book indicate the character of the anthology:

The sheperdis hyed them to Bedlem,
To se that blessyd son beme,
And ther they fond that glorius leme
Terly terlow (tirly terlow).

Now pray we to that meke chyld,
And to hys moder that ys so myld,
The whych was never defyled,
Terly terlow (tirly terlow).

Though Charles Sarolea is "Belgian Consul in Edinburg," that fact is far from making him a competent author. His loving friends should have persuaded him not to gather together the two-score commonplace and superficial papers he has published under the title "The French Renascence" (James Pott & Co., New York, $2.00). In the author's opinion that "new birth" is still going on, for Maeterlinck—who is not a Frenchman by the way—Bergson and Poincaré are its latest lights. Mr. Sarolea is as much prejudiced against the Church as he is ignorant of her true character.———"The Mexican War Diary of George B. McClellan" (Princeton University Press, $1.00), which Dr. William Starr Myers has edited, contains what a bright young lieutenant of engineers, who had just left West Point, thought worthy of record during our first invasion of Mexico. He has a "regular's" fine scorn of volunteers and certainly the author's description of their behavior, both on the march and under fire, reflects little credit on them.

"The Vintage" (Duffield, $0.75), by Sylvia Chatfield Bates, "Journal of Small Things" (Duffield, $1.35), by Helen Mackay, and "Grapes of Wrath" (Dutton, $1.50), by Boyd Cable, are recent war-books that are well worth reading. The first tells how a young man of today who is wanting in patriotism happens to read the moving letters written by his grandfather from Civil War battlefields and then realizes that "The older a country grows, the more precious it becomes because of the costly sacrifice that has lifted it up." The second book is made up of a series of impressionistic pen-pictures describing what the Catholic author observed in France during the first two years of the war. The call to arms, the courage of the bereaved, the piety of the people, the little joys of domestic life, the patience of the wounded, the beauty of the landscape are briefly and vividly sketched. Here, for example, is a pastel in prose about Francine, whose son was home on leave:

> She was scrubbing the kitchen's grey stone flags when her son came. He came swinging up the path between the wheat and poppies and corn flowers. He came up the terrace steps, in his leggings and his béret, a fine young diable bleu. Francine came, running, wiping her red hands in her apron, suddenly beautiful and very proud.

Mr. Cable's new book describes at first hand the adventures in trench warfare had by four young volunteers: Billy Simson, Larry Arundel, Ben Sneath, Englishmen all, and Jefferson Lee who hailed from old Kentucky. Before going into action Billy would instruct his comrades to say to each of his flames, in case he should be killed, "The last word he spoke was 'Rose' or 'Gladys' or 'Mary,'" etc., according to the sentimental requirements of the situation.

"The Story of Eleusis" (Macmillan, $1.25), Louis V. Ledoux's classical drama on the Demeter and Persephone theme, will hardly make the ancient poets look to their laurels. The chorus entitled "We Who Were Lovers of Life," that begins with the following stanzas, is the most musical in the book:

We who were lovers of life, who were fond of the hearth and the homeland.
Gone like a drowner's cry borne on the perilous wind,
Gone from the glow of the sunlight, now are in exile eternal;
Strangers sit in the place dear to us once as our own.

Happy are they; and they know not we were as strangers before them;
Nay, nor that others shall come: Knowledge belongs to the dead.
Life is so rich that the living look not away from the present;
Eyes that the sun made blind learn in the dusk to see.

Once we had friends, we had kindred; all of us now are forgotten,
All but the hero-kings, lords of the glory of war;
These with the founders of cities, live for a little in stories
Told of the deeds they did, not of the men that they were.

In the first volume of S. M. Dubnow's "History of the Jews in Russia and Poland" (Jewish Publication Society) is told their sad story up to the death of Alexander I. in 1825. The trials, persecutions and frequent barbarous massacres of this once chosen people make somber reading. The frequent accusations against the Catholic clergy as inciters of anti-Semitic tendencies should be supported by documentary evidence, or left unsaid. For instance, one looks in vain for a shred of historical proof of the statement that in the Jesuit schools "one of the chief subjects of instruction would be a systematic course in Jew-baiting."—"Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Serbian Claims" ($0.25) is the title of a historical pamphlet which the Rev. M. D. Krmpotich of Kansas City writes. The author maintains that "statistics and ethnography are in favor of the right of Croatia and its people to Bosnia and Herzegovina," and offers the reader a good map and a bibliography.

The following sonnet, "To My Daughter Betty, the Gift of God (Elizabeth Dorothy)," is the finest lyric in the "Poems and Parodies" (Stokes, $1.00) of Thomas Kettle, the gifted Irish leader who was killed in battle last year:

In wiser days, my darling rosebud, blown
To beauty proud as was your mother's prime,
In that desired, delayed, incredible time,
You'll ask why I abandoned you, my own,
And the dear heart that was your baby throne,
To dice with death. And oh! They'll give you rhyme
And reason: some will call the thing sublime,
And some decry it in a knowing tone.

So here, while the mad guns curse overhead,
And tired men sigh with mud for couch and floor,
Know that we fools, now with the foolish dead,
Died not for the flag, nor King, nor Emperor,
But for a dream, born in a herdsman's shed,
And for the secret Scripture of the poor.

"Going Up with the Class"

UNDER the title "Advancement of the Teacher with the Class," Mr. James Mahoney, Head of the English Department of the South Boston High School, and special collaborator of the Bureau of Education, has arranged a most interesting and instructive study. The booklet was published in 1915 as Bulletin No. 42 of the Bureau of Education, but it has far more than an ephemeral value. Very little has been done, it would seem, to solve the questions then broached.

In his letter of transmissal the Commissioner of Education, Dr. P. P. Claxton, thus states the problem to be discussed: "Teachers and pupils should remain together longer especially in the first years of school life." Unfortunately for the pupil, the somewhat rigid plans, apparently inseparable from public systems of education, have hitherto made this desirable arrangement impracticable. As Dr. Claxton further remarks, "In most city schools, a teacher in any of the first six or eight grades, remains in the same grade from year to year, while the stream of children flows by her." The result is inevitable. "The teacher may become painfully familiar with the minute details of the course of studies, as made out for that particular grade, but she never becomes acquainted with the individual children of any group she teaches." After a few years of this unyielding arrangement, the teacher is all too likely to become a mere machine. She has "only vague ideas of what they have been taught in the grade below, and of what they are expected to learn in the grade above, for which her work is supposed to prepare them." Dr. Claxton then suggests the remedy: "In all city schools teachers in the first four or five grades should be promoted from year to year with their classes."

American Answers

IN his study, Mr. Mahoney aptly touches the fundamental reason why too many school administrators are not greatly interested in this question: "The scientific study of school problems of any sort is but in its infancy." Moreover, as it seems to him, "an unfortunate application of the doctrine of efficiency has led to mechanical, unprogressive assignment of teachers." Specialization, valuable no doubt, in its place, has been grievously misinterpreted, because of a "false analogy between the retention of teachers in the grades of the public schools and the subdivisions of labor in factories, with its restriction of process and uniform repetition of limited movement." The analogy promises well, but breaks down when critically examined. Children are not raw material. They are human beings.

To create an interest in this important question, early in 1913 the Bureau of Education sent a questionnaire to superintendents of public instruction in all cities of a population greater than 4,000. Answers were received from 813 superintendents, but a summary indicated plainly that very little practical interest was entertained even by those who had taken the trouble to reply. In November, 1914, a second questionnaire was prepared, and sent to the 152 superintendents who had displayed the most promising grasp of the question. Seventy-eight answers from thirty-five States were received. There was a general agreement that the plan of advancement was advisable, but its practical difficulties were not overlooked. The next step taken by the Bureau was to submit a series of questions to a number of teachers who had had the experience of "going up with the class." Ninety-seven replied. Their answers represented forty-three schools in eighteen States, and were on the whole favorable. Information was then sought from British North America, South America, Austria, Germany, and other European countries.

Foreign Opinion

OF these foreign countries Belgium gave the most definite answer. "Generally," it was reported, "the young teacher, after two years of teaching with the same pupils, begins with the first year again, and advances with the same pupils to the end of the fourth year. Then he starts back again, and goes with the same pupils to the end of the sixth year, if he is deemed sufficiently qualified." Italy reported, in an answer from Rome, that the plan "had for a long time been the ideal sought in scholastic regulation in Italy." In concluding his brochure, Mr. Mahoney gives an excellent summing up of the whole question, assigning the principal arguments both in favor of, and against, the plan. While objections are strongly urged by some, the majority opinion endorses the plan both as better in itself, and as practicable.

"It need hardly be said," writes Mr. Mahoney, "that the advocates of this plan regard it not as a panacea, but as a principle whose application tends towards proficiency. . . . It must be clearly noted that the objections urged against the plan do not even touch many of the strongest points of advantage claimed for it, particularly the advantages which accrue from deeper knowledge of the pupil, with the correlative knowledge of the home, the community, industries and civic life." Although not clearly stated it would seem that the chief ground of objection, is that "the plan won't work," or that it would require a rearrangement hardly within the power of the smaller systems. Furthermore, if one would face the facts squarely, another hindrance to the plan becomes apparent. That hindrance is the inefficient teacher. He should not be allowed to exist. Nevertheless he does exist and is, unfortunately, a factor of ill that cannot be safely overlooked.

Not a New Principle

IT is noteworthy that the plan is called "a principle whose application works towards efficiency," and still more noteworthy is the inference that it is a new discovery in pedagogy. Nevertheless it has been in actual operation in many schools, particularly the schools of the Catholic Church, time out of mind. The Ratio Studiorum, for instance, of the Society of Jesus, highly recommends the advancement of the teacher with his class. R. H. Quick in his "Educational Reformers" is good enough to mention this fact, although it did not prevent him from making the absurd statement, one of many, that the whole system proposed in the Ratio Studiorum contains hardly a single principle. Quick's admission is the undoing of this last statement. It must not be thought, however, that the advancement of the teacher with the class, was a practice exclusively confined to the Jesuits. It was and is well known in all Catholic schools, notably in those of the Christian Brothers, and is carried out whenever possible. In fact much of the information gathered with so much care by the Bureau of Education, and so ably arranged by Mr. Mahoney, is not particularly new to the directors of Catholic schools. One obstacle which seems to be of moment, the question of salary, is however, happily irrelevant in the Catholic system where the teacher serves without remuneration.

It is regrettable that none of the questionnaires seems to have been sent to the directors of Catholic schools, or in fact, to the directors of any private schools. Valuable information, no doubt, could have been given by these schools, since to them the system of advancing the teacher with the class is an accepted thing, new neither in theory or practice. "The Roman Church," writes Quick, "has shown a genius for such societies [teaching societies] as witness the Jesuits and the Christian Brothers. The experience of centuries must have taught them much that we can learn of them."

SOCIOLOGY

Without God

TO the best of my knowledge, and I have searched my small store, Mr. Irvin S. Cobb has never been called a mystic. We have had such among us, mostly from foreign shores, but not so many since the war began. Robed persons were they, with a fondness for frankincense, and an averred love of the light that never was on sea or land, which mingled strangely, at times, with their very modern and unmystic love for lucre. Mr. Cobb is not of this tribe. One can hardly picture him, swathed in a robe, declaiming his "message," or snuffing at a censer, or inscribing esoteric vers libre on a scroll. For the robe Mr. Cobb substitutes motley, and as jester to the public wears it, I think, with grace and distinction. Like some of Shakespeare's fools, he is a very wise man. He sees that the good in man outweighs the evil, but he does not doubt that man left to his own devices comes to grief. "In the scheme of everlasting mercy and Divine pity," writes this illuminated jester, "we are all before the eyes of our common Creator as little children whose feet stumble in the dark."

To Whom Shall We Turn?

THE sentiment seems almost out of place in modern fiction. It is surely inadequate, since it strives to picture in human language what one may not fully utter, that most touching of all God's attributes, His love for sinful man. But it strikes a clear note of truth, not often heard today, in affirming the existence of a personal God, and our most deep need of Him. "God's mercy," wrote a medieval mystic, "must needs be infinite since the world's misery is so great." Our most clear-visioned artists in word and form and color more than glimpsed this truth, but today the vision fades in a cloud of material preoccupations, and is replaced by man's garish substitutes. The older concept of a God whose love for all His children was tenderer and more sacrificing than that of a mother for the babe at her breast, is only a myth, to be ascribed to vile beginnings, when belief in His very existence has grown cold. "Lord, to whom shall we turn?" cried out the Apostle, realizing the unique sufficiency of God to satisfy the soul. "Unless I see," says the world today, "I shall not believe." And, determined not to see, it premises that God is a myth, the soul a vain term, and immortality a dream.

Man's Aspirations

LIFE without God generally ends in a tangle. It is difficult to conceive any other result. Fancifully, yet in colors that for the most part are true, Dr. Van Dyke has pictured the strange world of a man from whose mind the very concept of God had been removed. Granting the possibility, the world of bewilderment which followed, was but a natural consequence. The very Being that held the social framework together, gave it purpose and consistency, had disappeared. It was as if, by some backward turn of nature, five had suddenly become the sum of two plus two. Conceivably, a new scheme of man and nature might be formed, but not a scheme in conformity with the soul of man. That it was new might have been made tolerable by time, but nothing could remove its essential unfitness for a finite, yet immortal, creature. In this unfitness lies the truth of Dr. Van Dyke's parable. Unless God exists, what we call "good," "evil," "right," "duty," "law," "happiness," correspond to no known reality. They are terms only, as meaningless as the broken syllables of delirium. Our very existence, with all that it connotes, seems to find no justification in reason, unless in the end the darkness gives way, as we believe it will, to Eternal Light, and the tangled threads of all existences are brought into harmony by the hand of an Infinite Being. Man's desire to know all truth, to be completely happy, in the union with the absolutely Good, must somewhere be satisfied, or his presence here, with his knowledge ever incomplete and his longings never satiated, is a tragedy deeper than any ever dreamed by sage or poet.

His Natural End

BUT man does continually aspire towards some end; action is his life. He moves towards its attainment, but that end may be only a wandering fire, luring him to destruction. He need not so wander, for his true objective and ultimate end can be determined by reason. Truth, as he knows, is the immediate and formal object of his understanding; goodness, that of his will. But the Infinite Goodness and Truth, whose existence is made known to him by the natural process of reasoning, is the only object that can fully satisfy these faculties. In presence of the Infinite, the finite must always fall short. The Infinite, God, therefore, is our ultimate end. For "nothing," writes St. Thomas, "can satisfy the will of man but the universal good, and that is not found in any being, but in God alone."

A Rejected Standard

WE have strayed far from this philosophy today. What man should know through the accumulated experience of ages has not taught him wisdom. He has tried, by turns, the varied phases of hedonism, pure and restricted; today, he is turning to utilitarianism, refined by an infusion of altruism, as a new guide. To speak in public of God as man's last end, to which all things, howsoever pleasant or promising, must be subordinated, seems to smack of sermonizing, fit enough, perhaps, for youthful novices in a cloistered shade, but of no particular value to hard-headed men and women, engaged in making history. A poisonous philosophy, old as original sin in its essential revolt, which took new heart of grace in the religious rebellion of the sixteenth century, and was given, unwittingly perhaps, a new and appealing restatement in the speculations of Kant, has culminated in the elimination of God from serious philosophic principles. The elimination has worked disastrous results in the world of thought. In no other department have these sad results been found more radical than in the field of sociology. The boundaries of that field are at best but ill-defined; today, sociology engages itself with human life and its problems, with an intimacy which grows deeper, as the gospel of social service gains in favor over the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Man is an image of God, and is made for God. A force which would direct his activities in denial of, or indifference to, these fundamental facts must lead to disaster.

Duty and Creed

FOR moral duty, as the ethicists observe, is wholly dependent upon God. It cannot, strictly speaking, exist without Him. For duty, that unpleasant word and often harder reality, depends upon two necessities, both intimately connected with man's last end. The first is the necessity which urges the will absolutely to this last end; the second is the necessity of certain means to that end. But that last end is God. If He be removed, nothing remains but the weak and beggarly motives of expediency or external fitness. Men like to flatter themselves by holding self-respect to be the sufficient sanction of duty. Self-respect, in conjunction with an external competent law-giver, is a valuable aid to ethical conduct; taken by itself, it is at best but a temporary sanction. There is no reason to believe that it outlasts the passion which has its own philosophy and can argue. It is purely a subjective norm set up by the individual, subject to his revision, without reference to a legitimate superior. Therefore does it tend to strengthen man's ambition to regard himself as all-sufficient. The world's code of morality, as opposed to the Divine code, is a natural sequence. The unvarying acceptance of what the individual conceives to be moral, is the highest morality, even though at variance with laws, human and Divine, or contrary to the lowest standards of convention.

It should not be thought, however, that this essential spirit of revolt, whether in literature or in the more open field of practical sociology, always avows itself in its extremest terms. As a matter of fact, it usually assumes an attitude of tolerance and open-mindedness, more dangerous perhaps than direct opposition. "Whether or not there is a God," say some apostles of social reform, "we do not know. But this we know: that there is a world of misery to be relieved, of ignorance to be enlightened, together with practical means at hand to accomplish our work. If God does exist, He does not seem to enter deeply into the problem. Certainly, we have not found that we greatly need Him. As far as we see, man can be happy and good without Him."

Children in the Dark

IT all depends upon what one means by goodness and happiness. If goodness is conformity to a purely subjective norm of action, happiness the relief from the more grinding burdens of poverty, and if God does not exist, perhaps our social faith is vain, and these modern apostles speak the truth. Yet we feel that there is no field of human activity, however small, from which God can be safely excluded. "We have not found that we greatly need Him." If one is content to remain continually within the circle beginning with man and ending with him, and to make of himself dull clay, unlit by any aspiration after higher things, one may by degrees suppress the soul's yearnings for the Absolute Truth and Good. But we who believe that we are as children whose feet stumble in the dark, will at all times reach out trustingly for our Father's hand.

Paul L. Blakely, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Death of Archbishop Blenk

ON April 20 the city of New Orleans suffered a severe loss through the death of Archbishop Blenk. The dead prelate had a long and distinguished career, noted for service to Church and country alike. Born in 1857, he became a Marist some years after his conversion to the Faith, and later spent many years pursuing studies in colleges and universities in Europe. After his ordination to the priesthood he taught in Jefferson College and then became President of that institution. On the conclusion of the Spanish-American war he accompanied Archbishop Chapelle to Cuba and Porto Rico, as auditor of the Papal legation. In 1899 he was consecrated bishop of the latter place, and on the death of Archbishop Chapelle, was transferred to New Orleans, where he labored with gentleness and zeal to spread the Kingdom of God on earth.

Supreme Court Sustains Two Labor Laws

TWO of the most important and far-reaching decisions passed within recent times by the Supreme Court were the rulings declaring the women's minimum wage and the men's hours of service laws of the State of Oregon constitutional. These laws were the first of their kind to come before the Court and represent two fundamental industrial questions. The Oregon law establishing a minimum wage for women in any occupation was upheld as constitutional by a vote of four to four, Justice Brandeis not participating. The second law, establishing a ten-hour day for workingmen in manufacturing establishments, was sustained as constitutional by a vote of five to three, Chief Justice White and Justices Van Devanter and McReynolds dissenting. In both instances Justice Brandeis did not participate in the voting as he had been counsel in favor of the laws when they were first heard by the Court. Although practically every State limits the hours of labor in certain industries and callings, because of danger involved or excessive fatigue, yet the Oregon men's hours of service law includes all industries and provides that overtime shall be paid in excess of ten hours. The Court quotes with approval the decision of the Oregon Supreme Court: "In view of the well-known fact that the custom in our industries does not sanction a longer service than ten hours per day, it cannot be held as a matter of law that the legislative requirement is unreasonable or arbitrary as to the hours of labor." The States immediately affected by the minimum wage law for women are Colorado, Arkansas, Washington, Wisconsin, Minnesota, California, Utah, Massachusetts and Nebraska.

Maryknoll

"'TIS a new idea in America, this sindin' of our sons and daughters to convert the haythen," said Mrs. Cassidy, but it is fortunately a growing idea. The Field Afar, from which the little remark is quoted, looks out with rosy hopes into the future. Besides the publication of the mission journal, whose subscriptions are rapidly increasing, there are now other activities elbowing each other at Maryknoll (Ossining, New York), as for instance, the Seminary, the Auxiliary-Brotherhood of St. Michael and the Teresian Community. Best of all the accommodations in the several houses are even now overtaxed, showing that the Spirit of God is breathing on the souls of the young. Nor are others forgetting this cause, for the gross receipts of Maryknoll during the past year were $89,529.07. "To the ordinary observer the amounts will look large," says the editor of the Field Afar. "In fact they appear so to ourselves, and when we realize that our weekly receipts have been averaging $1,800, we ask ourselves the how and whence of it in the past and the future." The answer, as it always comes to him, is simply: "God evidently wills that this work shall succeed."

Two New Schools

IT is announced that Georgetown Preparatory School, which for 129 years has been located on the grounds of Georgetown University, is now to be separated from the latter and transferred to the villa district of Montgomery County, Md. A tract of ninety acres has been purchased and the first buildings will be ready for occupancy in October, 1917. The school requires no word of introduction or recommendation, since about 8,000 pupils have been educated in its classes during the past years. It will continue in its new surroundings the traditions of more than a century and a quarter of efficient Catholic scholarship. Students will be received for the first year class and the eighth grammar grade. Together with this information comes the announcement of the opening of the Altamont School, in the Helderberg Mountains at Altamont, New York. The property consists of seventy acres of land and an additional athletic field of nine acres at an altitude of 1,000 feet above tide level. Professor Charles H. Schultz, the founder of the school, was the founder likewise of the successful Carlton Academy, which is now to receive a new headmaster. A faculty experienced in preparing boys for college entrance examinations has been secured for the Altamont School. During the summer months Professor Schultz will direct the Helderberg Golf Club, which had previously occupied these grounds. His idea is to conduct a family club where parents can bring their children for tutoring during the vacation time, in the mountain air inland from the coast. There are nine hole golf courses on the grounds. The school building itself is the Helderberg Golf Clubhouse, which will furnish accommodations for seventy-five boys and seven masters.

High Finance and the Civil War

TO illustrate the principles of morality and patriotism which, according to Professor Reed, of the University of Idaho, were dominant in the world of high finance during the civil war the following passages from "The Book of Daniel Drew," edited by B. W. White, will prove exceedingly interesting. Mr. Drew thus describes the situation:

> I saw very quickly that the War of the Rebellion was a money-maker for me. Along with ordinary happenings, we fellows in Wall Street now had in addition the fortunes of war to speculate about, and that always makes great doings on a stock exchange. . . . As I look back now, I see that I never made more money, or had four years that were in all respects more genuinely prosperous. . . . We financial men organized a way of getting early news from the war. A silver key will open any lock. We had on our pay roll, sutlers, reporters, private soldiers, and officers even up to generals. . . . Big officials who wouldn't accept money could usually be reached by giving them some shares in the stock we were manipulating. (We didn't dare make offers of this kind to Abe himself. Lincoln was an impractical (sic) man, so far as money-making went. All he thought about was to save the Union. . . .) During these days of the War we who were on the inside could call the turn of a stock long before the general public. This makes very profitable business. In fact, I got to taking a great deal of interest in the Boys in Blue. . . . When Richmond was finally taken, I for one was sorry to have the War come to an end. (Pp. 160-162.)

The writer is evidently perfectly satisfied with his principles and conduct, and regards them as beyond reproach. The moral code of Wall Street, as he understood it, had nothing to do with the Decalogue. The latter was simply "impractical," like poor Abe Lincoln, "so far as money-making went."

The Metropolis of the Southern Hemisphere

A LEADING article in the Bulletin of the Pan American Union introduces us to the largest Spanish-speaking city, the second largest Latin city, the tenth city in rank among the cities of the entire world, Buenos Aires, the capital of Argentina. It was founded in 1535, and after its destruction was reestablished in 1580 by Don Juan de Garay, whose loyalty to the Faith may be judged from the name La Trinidad which he gave to it, while its port was called Santa Maria. Although its growth was slow during the first centuries it has increased rapidly within the last sixty years. Its population in 1913 was 1,484,010. To heighten the great architectural beauty of the city a prize is offered each year to the architect of the most attractively designed structure, while the owner of the building is relieved from the payment of taxes for a specified time. Sky-scrapers are strictly prohibited. There are ninety-seven parks, promenades and plazas with a total area of about 10,727,000 square meters. The sanitation of the city is looked after by two organizations and it is said that perhaps no city of the world has better service in respect to the water supply and sewage system. The educational facilities are fully developed; there are moreover 500 regular publications established in the city and special libraries of every kind are open to the public. To be a qualified voter the citizen, besides being of lawful age, must know how to read and write, and must have paid no less than 100 pesos ($42.50) in taxes or license fees, or be a practitioner of one of the learned professions, and must have resided at least one year in the city. A foreigner must have resided there no less than two years and must have paid no less than 200 pesos in taxes or licenses, or be a practitioner of one of the learned professions. Between 1904 and 1914 the number of factories increased from 8,877 to 11,132; the capital invested from $42,064,723 to $227,873,376; the value of annual products from $77,967,374 to $320,970,524. Hence it may be seen that the great Argentine capital is not merely a port for enormous food exportations, but also "a very beehive of industries that as yet are but at the starting point."

A Revival of Irish Music

THERE is evidence, these days, among serious musicians of renewed interest in Irish folk songs. This may be due in part to the propaganda for the study of Gaelic literature with which of necessity Irish folk songs are connected. Or it may be due to the interest in Irish music, aroused by the concerts of John McCormack or by the novel settings of some Irish tunes by Percy Grainger. Whatever the reason it is pleasant to note the growing enthusiasm, which should be encouraged by all who are interested in Gaelic culture. The formation of Irish singing societies would help this movement materially, as singers of a Celtic temperament best understand, and consequently best interpret, the various moods of old Gaelic music. An organization of such a type is the glee club of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick of New York City, a body of fifty trained singers who, with rare success, have been giving concerts of Irish music under the competent direction of their leader. They have made excellent progress in New York, and if all their concerts reach the high level of refined interest attained by their last one in aid of St. Gabriel's church their permanent success is assured. The Glee Club and its worthy object should be cherished by everyone interested in the Gael, and it is to be hoped that the Irish throughout the country, especially in Chicago, Philadelphia and Boston, will take a kindly interest in this work which redounds to the credit of their race.

A Laboratory for the Study of Worship

HARVARD professors, according to the Boston Herald, have established a modern scientific Sunday school, or "laboratory for the study of worship," to train their own hopeful scions, thirty in number, who range from three to fourteen years of age. About fifty other children have likewise been admitted to the new laboratory process. Professor Holmes, the most eager promoter of the school, believes with sufficient probability that these children will perhaps never attend any church. It is therefore proposed "to put motive and impulse for good" into their minds and hearts which shall never have to be contradicted by the public schools or by such learned institutions as Harvard University. The Bible is to be studied geographically, historically and from a literary point of view. All religious doctrines are strictly excluded. The youthful Aristotles, still in their early knickerbockers, are presented with a comprehensive exposition of the various opinions, atheistic and otherwise, that are current on the subject of religion, and are then left to make their own choice without any bias derived from the instructor. His duty is simply to direct the trend of the argument, while the pros and cons for the fact of creation or the existence of God are seriously discussed and weighed by the young philosophers. Their conclusions are sacred to the teacher, who is scrupulously conscientious never to influence their judgment, but carefully sees to it that nothing in "science" is passed over or blinked at. As a delightful instance of the precocity thus developed, the writer in the Boston Herald recounts with evident satisfaction the conclusion arrived at by one of the children at the end of such a discussion. "Fellers," exclaimed the budding Ingersoll to the attentive class after all the evidence had been thoroughly sifted by them, "there isn't any God, any more than there's a Santa Claus. He's one of those things they tell to children." Excellent! And there are still Catholic parents who send their sons to receive the same enlightenment from the same Harvard professors.

The Catholic Mind

Issue for May 8, 1917

Frequent complaint is made of the lack of fair play in the treatment of Catholic questions by secular publications. A striking instance of this is shown in the correspondence with the editor of the Independent, which is given in the current issue of the CATHOLIC MIND. The explanation of the status of the Greek Schism, which completes the number, is both interesting and instructive.

You cannot afford to be without these useful little pamphlets.

The War.—During the week there has been extremely violent fighting on the Arras front, with the result that the British have made further advances and maintained their gains in spite of repeated German attacks of great intensity. The British began their operations by seizing Gavrelle, north of the Scarpe River; later they captured Arleux-en-Gobelle. They have also taken positions north and south of Oppy, but all their efforts to storm Roeux have failed. The German resistance is very strong. South of the Scarpe River there have been severe engagements east of Monchy, which have not modified the general situation. Still further south the British have advanced in the direction of Marcoign, having occupied Hermies, Trescault, Beaucamp and Villers-Plouich. Northwest of Le Catelet they have captured almost all of the Havrincourt Wood, Le Sart Farm and Vendhuile. The French have not made any considerable gains north of the Aisne. Craonne is still held by the Germans.

Bulletin, April 23, p.m.-April 30, a.m.

In Macedonia the British engaged the Bulgars east of the Vardar and west of Lake Doiran and advanced about 500 yards on a mile front. In Palestine the British have crossed the Wadi Ghuzzeh, and, assisted by the fire of warships in the Mediterranean, have driven the Turks back in the vicinity of Gaza. In Mesopotamia the British, after crossing the Shatt-el-Adhem, drove the Turks in a northerly direction along the west bank of the river a distance of about seventeen miles from its juncture with the Tigris. They defeated the Turks at Istabult on the Tigris, and advancing up the river about twelve miles, captured Sanara. They are now driving the Turks back into the mountains northeast of the city.

The Army bill passed both houses of Congress on April 28 in practically the form given it by the Administration. The vote in the Senate was 81 to 8 and in the House 397 to 24. At the last moment the Senate substituted its own bill for that of the House; and, as between the two bills there are some differences to be settled in conferences, it will probably be several days before the bill is ready for the President's signature. The principal features about which there is disagreement are as follows: The maximum age-limit, fixed by the Senate at twenty-seven and by the House at forty years; enforced prohibition in the army, authorized by the Senate but not by the House; the amendment, popularly known as the Roosevelt amendment, providing for the raising of four divisions of volunteers, of a total strength of about 100,000 men, for immediate service abroad, passed by the Senate but rejected by the House; and the organization of the army as far as possible by territorial designations, passed by the House not, however, by the Senate.

By the bill the President is empowered to use the volunteer system to bring the strength of the regular army up to 287,000, that is, to raise about 150,000 regulars, and bring the strength of the National Guard up to 625,000, that is, to raise about 350,000 men for the National Guard. He is also authorized to select out of the entire citizen body, liable to conscription, two armies, each of 500,000 men, one at once and the other when he shall deem it expedient.

The bill exempts legislative, executive and judicial officers of the United States and of the several States; members of religious organizations with creeds opposed to warfare; and regular ministers of any denomination. It is also left to the discretion of the President to exempt other persons, engaged in Government work, in important industries including agriculture, and those "who have persons dependent upon them for support."

The first step towards carrying out the selective conscription will be the registration, to be carried out according to the general lines of registration for voting, of all those who are liable for military service. The registration will probably begin within ten days of the signing of the bill by the President and be finished by June 1. The Secretary of War is said to be in favor of the jury-wheel method of selection.

One of the important disclosures of the week has been the magnitude of the German submarine operations. The German report states that during the months of February and March a total tonnage of 1,600,000 was sunk. The latest British report admits the destruction of 55 British merchantmen during a single week. The exact tonnage of the 55 ships has been withheld; but undoubtedly the actual loss is very large, and this is only a fraction of the total loss, for the British report does not include ships in the service of the British admiralty, nor the loss of neutrals and the other Allies. France, Great Britain and Italy have all pleaded with the United States for speedy and vigorous cooperation in meeting the submarine menace.

It was thought in the beginning that ships could be built faster than they could be sunk. This hope seems to have failed of fulfilment. Mr. Lloyd George has said that this year the number of ships turned out by British shipyards would be more than three times the number completed last year; but against this it is stated, and not without probability, that the output of German submarines is very much on the increase. There is a growing conviction that the outcome of the war will depend, as the British Premier declared some time ago, on stopping or neutralizing the operations of the submarines. With a view to receiving effective assistance from the United States, the British and French have put at the disposal of our Government a full statement of the measures taken to defeat the submarines, and it is known that representatives of the Allies are now conferring with our Navy Department on measures to be taken in the future. Every facility of the United States is being employed to hurry the construction of merchant ships and to put the Austrian and German ships, recently seized, into commission; at the same time boats, especially designed to fight the submarines, are being built.

Lloyd George has stated that the enormous tracts of land now under cultivation in Great Britain would enable that country, without aid from other nations, to feed its 45,000,000 citizens in 1918; in the meantime, although it is said that there is no fear of starvation, there is every prospect of the people feeling the pinch of hunger. He declared that the food difficulty would be partially met by excluding 11,000,000 tons of unnecessary imports; but both he and Lord Beresford admitted that success in the war depended on devising more effective means for dealing with submarines than have as yet been found.

The Embargo Bill

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee reported to the House on April 27 a bill which empowers the President to regulate the exportation of foodstuffs and other articles during the war. The most important clause is as follows:

> Whenever in time of war the President of the United States shall find that the public safety or welfare shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States except at such time or times or from such place or places and under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

The bill has the approval of the President, the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Justice, and lays down severe penalties for all persons who shall seek to evade or violate its provisions.

Proposed Food Law

The possibility of famine menacing not only the nations in Europe but other nations as well, which led the President to declare some time ago that America was facing the problem of feeding the world, has also led Mr. David Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, to address a letter to the Senate, asking that the Department of Agriculture be authorized by law to take complete control of the food situation, should a crisis arise. The legislation contemplated would empower the Government to direct, supervise and regulate all supplies; and also, should the necessity arise, to take over and operate whatever business and industries it wished. Mr. Houston suggested that the exercise of this power might be vested in the Council of National Defense, and be used at the discretion of the President. He also asked that an appropriation of $25,000,000 be made to enable the Department to carry on its present duties. The main difficulty about food production is not, in Mr. Houston's opinion, concerned with land shortage but with lack of agricultural workers. To supply this deficit he made a tentative proposal that young men between the ages of fifteen and nineteen should be set to work in the fields. No action has been taken on the Secretary's suggestions, but it is reported that they have the full approval of the President and his Cabinet.

The Espionage Bill

The espionage bill which caused such a storm of opposition in the public press and in the Senate was reported to the House by the House Judiciary Committee on April 25. The provision relating to censorship has been materially modified as a result of the recommendations of the Department of Justice and the Department of State, which were based, according to the Chairman of the Committee, on the experiences of both departments in the administration of law in connection with the relations of this country and Mexico and the problems arising out of the Civil War. The censorship section reads as follows:

> Section 4.—During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party, or from threat of such a war, the President may by proclamation declare the existence of such emergency and, by proclamation, prohibit the publishing or communicating of or the attempting to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense which in his judgment is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy. Whoever violates any such prohibition shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than ten years, or both; provided, that nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment or criticism of the acts or policies of the government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

The Chairman of the Judiciary Committee admitted that even in its present form the bill gives the President very broad powers, but he argued that it has been carefully considered by the committee, and that in a crisis like the present these powers are necessary.

The American Commission to Russia

Serious anxiety is felt with regard to affairs in Russia. There is no doubt about the loyalty to the Entente of the present leaders, but the attitude of the great masses of the people is involved in almost complete obscurity. The progress of German propaganda in the direction of a separate peace has added another element of uncertainty. To offset this danger, to arrive at an understanding with the new Government, and to secure coordination of American and Russian efforts in the prosecution of the war, Mr. Elihu Root has been appointed by the President to head the American Commission which is now being formed and is soon to set out for Russia. The commission, according to reports, is to have full authority to confer with the Russian Government as to the best means of remedying the shortage of munitions and supplies which has seriously hampered the effectiveness of the Russian army of 14,000,000 men. It is understood that Mr. Root is authorized to pledge the fullest support of the United States to any measures that the representatives of the two nations shall adopt. The importance of Mr. Root's diplomatic mission can scarcely be exaggerated.

The International War Council

The arrival of Marshal Joffre and the other commissioners of the international war council was attended in Washington by extraordinary demonstrations which approximated a triumphal procession. The day was made the occasion for several important announcements. Mr. Balfour declared that it was not the intention of the Allies to ask the United States to enter into any treaty that would bind the United States to a formal agreement not to make a separate peace with Germany. Even without such assurance the Allies had unbounded confidence that America would give unreserved cooperation.

> Our confidence in this assistance which we are going to get from the community is not based upon such shallow considerations as those which arrive out of formal treaties. No treaty could increase the undoubted confidence with which we look to the United States which, having come into the war, is going to see the war through. If there is any certainty in human affairs, that is certain.

The same day the President assured M. E. de Cartier, appointed Belgian Minister to the United States, that when the war comes to an end, Belgium will resume her place among "the prosperous and peace-loving nations of the world." Both statements were understood to be an authoritative echo of the conference between the President and Mr. Balfour.

The international war council has been in active session, the deliberations of the commissioners being carried on by sub-committees. Only the most general character of the matters discussed by the commissioners has been given out, and it is said that publicity with regard to the results reached by them will rest entirely with the United States. This much, however, has transpired, that both Mr. Balfour and M. Viviani have informed their Governments that the greatest harmony exists between the Entente and the United States as to the "basic principles" of how the war is to be carried on, and the unflinching resolution to wage it without compromise until the German military menace has been removed.

Ireland.—The New York World recently published expressions of opinion on the problem of Home Rule, in response to an appeal made through its columns by Lord Northcliffe. Among a number of statements, those of his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, Colonel Roosevelt and ex-President Taft are especially noteworthy.

America and Home Rule

Cardinal Gibbons confined himself to one aspect of the question, that of county option. On this point, he said:

> Apparently the whole Irish question arises from the fear of the minority in Ulster that they will be coerced into a union with the rest of Ireland, which will be their ruin. This feeling in Ulster is so strong that it has hitherto prevented any just settlement of the Irish claim to self-government. All men are agreed that the present state of affairs is impossible. Nine-tenths of Ireland cannot be sacrificed to one-tenth. That seems certain. Nor should one part be sacrified to the other nine. Therefore some third way must be found between the two extremes. Supposing that each county were given its choice as to whether it would come under the Home Rule Parliament in Dublin or not, the counties which voted themselves out would be in a fearfully anomalous position. They would not belong to England. They would not belong to Ireland. They would not be large enough to set up a Home Rule Parliament of their own, and if they did they could only construct an artificial State, and such an artificial State cannot endure. Ulster has gained a great deal of her commercial prosperity from the fact that it is the business center of the whole country. Belfast would very soon feel the effect of a separation from Ireland. A great deal of the Irish trade which Ulster now controls, and which it controls extremely well, would be diverted through other ports to England and the commerce of Ulster would wither if not entirely decay.

After recalling the lesson of the Civil War in America, his Eminence added:

> Since I have been asked, then, the only way I see out of the difficulty is the way of guarantees. The present position is impossible. Ireland cannot be sacrificed to a few counties in Ulster. These few counties cannot be sacrificed to the rest of Ireland. On the part of Ulster, then, as far as I can see, their only way of safety lies in accepting a Home Rule Parliament in Dublin, and of demanding, as they are in an extraordinarily good position to demand, whatever guarantees seem necessary to them for their protection, and these guarantees must be loyally accepted by the rest of Ireland and Ulster, welcomed not only as an integral part of the country, but as that part which, since to a large extent it controls the financial destinies of the country, must be allowed a voice commensurate with the legitimate influence which its commercial supremacy confers upon it.

Speaking as a friend of England and of the Allies, Colonel Roosevelt declared:

> I most earnestly hope that full Home Rule will be given Ireland; home rule relatively to the Empire such as Texas or Maine or Oregon now enjoys relatively to the national Government at Washington. Of course, Ireland should remain part of the Empire. I have no more sympathy with the irreconcilable extremists on one side of the question than on the other. I am sure that the Canadians and Australians feel in this matter exactly as Americans do, that, both permanently and as regards this particular war, it would be an immense advantage to the Empire to give Ireland Home Rule.

Ex-President Taft's views are as follows:

We in the United States are hoping earnestly for a speedy settlement of the Irish Home Rule question. It would much help to solidify and hearten American public sentiment in the great cause for which the democracies of Great Britain, France, Russia, Italy and the United States are fighting shoulder to shoulder and which they must and will win.

Three days after these statements were made, nearly 200 members of the House of Representatives dispatched a cablegram from Washington to David Lloyd George, asking that England "shall now settle the Irish problem."

Mexico.—Just at present Mexico is agitated by a series of protests against the new Constitution. Though made some time since these protests have only recently been put in general circulation. The first which is entitled "Protests of the Mexican Society against the Violation of the Liberty of Teaching" is signed by so many presidents of Mexico City, Puebla, Morelia and Toluca that their names cover sixty-eight large, closely-printed pages. The second, addressed to the Mexican people, is the "Protest of the women of Mexico against the New Constitution." It reads as follows:

Protest of Mexicans

The echo has reached us of the discussion of the Constitutional Assembly which met in Queretaro in order to formulate, and give to the country, a new Constitution, and we have learned that many of the laws which will be promulgated are harassing, and oppressive to religion. This has caused us profound grief which cannot be suppressed, nor will our conscience and our sense of duty permit us to bear silently such outrages against that which we love most in this world, our God and our Faith. We protest against these obnoxious laws, certain that our protest is not only the expression of those who have signed this declaration, but of all the women of Mexico, who, without exception, hold the same opinion with regard to these tyrannical enactments.

Among these projected laws, the one which has in a particular manner attracted our attention, as it most directly appertains to us, is that which refers to instruction. We comprehend without any doubt that this law treats of one of the most important problems to be considered by a congress—namely, education. Instruction and education are so intimately united that there is no means of separating them. We understand also that the laic or radical instruction, or whatever one may wish to call it, is an education atheistic and impious, however the hypocrisy of the irreligious may desire to conceal the fact. We understand, finally, that an education of this kind is a death-blow aimed at our dearest affections on earth, the interests of religion and the immortal souls of those who belong to us.

We do not wish to philosophize, nor do we know how, but the intuition of our hearts, no less than the light of our intelligence, is so clear on these questions that we do not understand why any one attempts to make us believe the contrary. They wish to de-Christianize Mexico. They wish to extirpate from the hearts and from the minds of our children the Faith which we have transmitted to them, a gift greater and more precious than the life which we have given them. What sorrow for us to see our life-work destroyed by those who should aid us in sustaining it, the teachers! What distress for us to contemplate this destruction, and to see ourselves forced—those among us who can do so—to send our sons and even our daughters to a strange land in order to procure for them a Christian education, which our country forbids to them!

And this they wish to do in the name of Liberty, about which they cry so much. Let it be an even contest, we will not withdraw from the struggle. No, for we combat in a noble, worthy cause. Let instruction be met by instruction, the press by the press, and let strength encounter strength; let schools rise in front of schools, and then we shall believe in the liberty which they offer us. But how shall we give the name of liberty to the impious despotism that takes from us the possibility of fulfilling the most sacred of our duties, and our most elevated mission, the Christian education of our children?

See then the motive of our protest, full of sorrow and indignation; of sorrow because we see our Faith insulted and danger threatened to the souls of those we love; of indignation, because they deceive us with feigned promises of liberty, while they are subjecting us to the heaviest of oppressions, with danger even to national autonomy. Still, the hope remains to us that, hearing our complaints, they will moderate in some manner the odious laws projected. Our voice must sadden the heart of every man in Mexico, for it is the voice of mother, wife, sister or daughter. But if our protest does not produce any result, it will at least be an alleviation of our sorrow; and will speak for us before the Republic of Mexico, before America, and before the world. But, above all, it will cry out before the supreme Judge of men whom we implore to bless us and all Mexico. To our protest we unite an urgent and energetic petition that Congress will reconsider Article III of the Constitution, and make it conform with the strictest liberal requirements, as General Carranza proposed, and make it exclude the covetous interests of radical sectaries, who do not form, and who never will form, the majority of the Mexican people.

As was expected by those who know the temper of the Carranzistas, both protests failed of their chief purpose, justice.

Russia.—Instead of waiting for the coming Constituent Assembly to settle their agrarian troubles, the peasants are taking up the matter themselves. In the Saratov Government they have passed resolutions of confiscation, seized the rich land-holders' acres and driven the owners away. Peasants' conferences which are attended by delegates from even the smallest communes, are said to be organized in every Russian province. These assemblies insist upon a proper distribution of land, that farms which their private owners cannot sow must be temporarily handed over to the people, that soldiers' wives are to receive free shares and that a more moderate rent, to be fixed by the local community, is to prevail. Some Bessarabian peasants sacked a rich man's estate, and certain Tambov peasants compelled landowners to sign away their farms. Alarmed by these agrarian disturbances the Government has addressed an appeal to peasant land-proprietors urging the necessity of frequent spring sowings in order to provision the armies. But seed is said to be lacking and a serious shortage of crops is feared.

Agrarian Disorders

Luther's "Divine Mission"

HERBERT THURSTON, S.J.

WHEN Matthew Arnold, much to the indignation of James Anthony Froude, described Luther as "a Philistine, but a Philistine of genius," he pronounced a judgment which for its truth as well as for its epigrammatic conciseness can hardly be improved upon. By Froude and by many Protestants of that generation Luther was still regarded as a man invested by God with a supernatural mission. There were even enthusiasts who identified him with the Angel of the Apocalypse (xiv, 6) "having the eternal gospel to preach unto them that sit upon the earth, and over every nation and tribe and tongue and people," while a sort of inspiration from on high was believed to attach to all his teachings. This is a point of view which has been almost completely surrendered by the theologians of modern Germany. Among the Harnacks and the Kaweraus, the Köhlers, the Hausraths and the Böhmers, the idea of Luther's saintliness is dead. The last nail has been driven into its coffin by Father H. Grisar in his exhaustive but studiously temperate monograph, a work which tones down, while corroborating in all essentials, the more exuberant polemics of Janssen and Denifle. If well-informed Protestants are eager to do honor to the memory of the great Reformer, it is hardly now because they regard him as a holy man of God. They look upon him rather as the champion of free-thought, the man who by his purely natural gifts and stupendous energy overthrew the tyranny of Rome. Once the plea of heavenly inspiration is withdrawn, we Catholics can find something to admire in Luther, just as we can admire the forcefulness of Mahomet, or Oliver Cromwell, or Frederick the Great. We can even go further and own that Luther was the human means through whose agency God brought about the purification of His Church. He was, if anyone will have it so, the instrument of God, but only in the sense in which Attila was the instrument of God. No doubt Luther is more worthy of respect than either the historic Attila or the Etzel of old German romance. We need not be ashamed of acknowledging that contemporary Catholics judged him too harshly. The ex-Augustinian monk in spite of his unhallowed nuptials was not the drunken and lustful blasphemer depicted by his early assailants. But at best, he was theologically, morally and esthetically a Philistine. He was also a man whose whole career was warped by human infirmity, if that indeed is not too benignant a name to describe many of his aberrations. The clay of which he was kneaded was of the coarsest. His passions were elemental and in many directions quite unchastened. Yet these things were strangely associated both with a certain mystical spirit which seemed to cling to him almost in spite of himself and with an incomparable vigor of mind which made him perhaps the strongest individual force of the century in which he lived.

Curiously enough the whole strength of Luther's character and the only logical justification for that violence which no one of his partisans now attempts to defend, are to be found in his belief that he was supernaturally commissioned by God to preach a new Evangel. The evidence that this was his own conviction; a conviction shared by many of his disciples, is abundant. To take a single example, to which Harnack has given prominence, Luther in 1522, speaking in the tone of a second St. Paul, assured the Elector Frederick that he derived his Evangel "not from men but only from Heaven, through our Lord Jesus Christ," in such wise, he adds, "that I might very well have glorified in being, and have written myself down, a servant and evangelist, which I mean hereafter to do." There is, as Grisar has shown (Chap. XVI), a good deal of other evidence to the same effect. Harnack freely owns that such self-reliance "might almost awaken misgivings" had it not been united in Luther's case with the deepest humility before God. And he adds "I can very well understand how Catholic critics should find in the letters an 'insane arrogance.' There really remains only the alternative that we pass this judgment upon Luther or that we acknowledge that in the history of Christianity he occupies a place apart." (Harnack, "History of Dogma," Eng. Tr., Vol. VII, p. 172. This passage is retained in the latest German edition of the "Dogmengeschichte.") Yet, though Harnack elsewhere in the same context seems to suggest that such confidence in the Divine guidance is without a parallel in the annals of the Church, this ready appeal to personal illumination is in reality one of the commonest of phenomena among all religious innovators. Witness, for example, in quite modern times the utterances of the egregious Mrs. Eddy, the foundress of Christian Science. Mrs. Eddy goes even beyond Luther in her claims to be the mouthpiece of the Most High. If the Reformer could boast "It pleased God well to reveal His Son through me," Mrs. Eddy assures her disciples that "no human pen or tongue taught me the science contained in this book," and again: "I should blush to write of 'Science and Health' as I have, were it of human origin, and I, apart from God, its author. But I was only a scribe echoing the harmonies of heaven in divine metaphysics."

It is precisely this tendency among all heresiarchs to claim a personal and supernatural illumination which calls for the employment of some criterion to distinguish the false prophet from the true. If Luther were indeed commissioned to reveal Christ anew to a degenerate world, then should his own life be Christlike. Though his Catholic assailants often went beyond their data and slandered him with a virulence as passionate as his own, still they were justified at least in their contention that the safest test of his pretended mission lay in his conduct as a man, in the works he did, rather than in the professions he made or the arguments he used. But Luther's life was assuredly not Christlike. By the admission of his own devoted admirers never was there a man more a prey to human weaknesses. "Full of faults he was," writes Professor McGiffert, "faults of temper, faults of taste—prejudiced, violent, vituperative and coarse, but he was a man through and through." (McGiffert, "Martin Luther," p. 387.) "If Luther's life was pure," says another American panegyrist, "his words certainly were not so at all times. It strikes the modern reader with no less than astonishment, almost with horror, to find the great moralist's private talk with his guests and children, his lectures to students, even his sermons, thickly interlarded with words, expressions and stories, such as today are confined to the frequenters of the lowest bar-rooms." (Preserved Smith, "Luther," p. 321.) So the same writer admits that his "conviviality bordered on the extreme" and deplores "the disgusting things he sometimes said about his private relations with Katie (his wife)."

Dr. Smith urges in excuse that this coarseness was the universal practice of the day and that "shocking stories are told of the conversation of England's virgin Queen." But Elizabeth was a bigoted Protestant, and, as her stanchest admirers admit, her mind was in no sense virginal. By sincere Catholics cleanness of heart and tongue were always held in honor. In all the voluminous controversial writings of Blessed Sir Thomas More, Luther's contemporary, hardly one broad passage will be found. At the same time the Chancellor was a man who in the exuberance of his jesting humor was as jovial as Luther himself. But More could be merry and yet altogether clean.

To those who have thrown over the teaching of the Beatitudes, as the majority of Luther's followers have done, and who repudiate any similar ideal of the Christian life, this insistence upon the Reformer's coarseness and violence will probably appear as a paltry attempt to belittle a hero who deserves to be judged by other standards. But we Catholics believe the Beatitudes to be an integral part of Christ's message to the world. To us it is inconceivable that one whose life showed so little either of meekness or peacemaking, of mercy or cleanness of heart, can have been chosen by God to be the vehicle of a new Christian Evangel. But if Luther were deluded in his conviction of supernatural enlightenment, he may equally have been deluded in other matters. Not all his strength of purpose, not all his rather commonplace domestic virtues can prevent us from regarding him as a pseudo-Christus, a false prophet in fact, whose assurance of justification, whose gruesome demonology, whose horror of the Papal Antichrist and his treasury of indulgences, were all equally the fantastic hallucinations of a thoroughly unbalanced mind.

My Interview with a Minister

JAPHETH S. JOLLAIN, S.J

WHEN I first telephoned to the Rev. D. M. Hazlett, D.D., I was answered by a voice so melodiously liquid that with all my willingness to credit Dr. Hazlett with many accomplishments I could hardly think it was the minister's voice. In fact, Dr. Hazlett was not at home; but Dr. Hazlett, continued the voice, would be delighted to meet me.

I called on him a few days later together with one of my friends, a Frenchman, who was curious to meet the minister. Not even this time was he at home. The uncertain glory of an April day had ended in a rainy, wintry afternoon. The elderly pastor of the Richmond Presbyterian Church, of St. Louis, Mo., was out, challenging the weather in order to attend to some needy parishioner. And in an endeavor to make us forget our waiting, the same young voice that first answered me, overlooked the cold and the storm, and sang of "Spring's Awakening" ever so liquidly.

> Come along, come along! Life is so sweet,
> Gather the flowers that bloom at your feet.
> Blossoms will fade away ere the year's gone,
> Winter's before us, so dreary and long.

After a while the minister came in. A kindly, oldish face peeping out of a heavy overcoat was all I could discern in the dusk, for it was towards evening. I protested in vain that we should not keep Dr. Hazlett from his supper. Sit down we must, and let supper wait. Supper can be taken any day of the week and any hour of the evening. But callers must be attended to immediately. In a St. Louis daily paper I had read this notice: "Rev. D. M. Hazlett will address the Women's Foreign Mission Society of the Third Baptist Church this afternoon at 2 o'clock, on 'Missionary Work in Latin America.' Dr. Hazlett passed several of the best years of his life in South America, and has made many trips to the Isthmus of Panama."

"I understand, Dr. Hazlett, that you have been many years in Latin America," I began. "What are the specific evils which, in your opinion, should be remedied there? I am rather interested in the peoples south of Panama myself. And my French friend here, who is also a Catholic, has a personal interest in the question, for he intends to be a missionary in Brazil."

"You are going to Brazil?" Dr. Hazlett asked with animation. "Why, Brazil is my first love. I spent there the first five years of my missionary life. That was thirty-five years ago. I got to love that gentle, yet manly people. You have splendid opportunities there. Priests of your Church have better chances of success than the ministers of any other denomination. In Brazil the Roman Catholic Church is tenderly loved by the common people."

The Frenchman looked at me, and I could but give him a quick, puzzled glance. Did ever Presbyterian minister speak thus? "However," I objected quietly, "ever since February of last year we have been told that Latin Americans are a rascally set of infidels, wantons, drunkards and liars."

"That charge of drunkenness is a lie," protested the minister. "A drunken Latin American is a rare and exotic bird. When once in a great while a Brazilian is seen tottering on his feet, people will say: 'El está muito bem inglés,' which being translated freely from the Portuguese, means: 'The fellow is very English today.' No, drunkenness is not a native vice. As to lying, in so far as it is a specific Latin-American habit, I must say that the white people in Brazil and the Argentines, whom I know best, are as manly as my own countrymen. People of other Latin-American countries are great liars in their own way; that is, it is hard to know when they are simply talking and when they are really telling what they mean. But if they say, or if you coax them to say, 'verdad pura,' 'it is the pure truth,' you can take their word for it and trust them."

"But your lecture at the Third Baptist Church," I interposed timidly.

"Did you hear it?" queried the minister; and when I averred that I had not, Dr. Hazlett gave me a searching look and continued: "I fancy you think I gave the 'Women's Foreign Mission Society' the usual one-sided view of South American problems. The fact is that I have devoted the best years of my life to Latin America, and as a result, have conceived love and admiration for the Brazilians and the Argentines; and I can say the same, though in a lesser degree, of the people of other Spanish-American countries. No, I am not one-sided. I told the ladies at the Baptist Church that many a book and lecture on Latin America is a disgraceful suppressio veri. They present a picture full of shadows and with no lights. The exquisite politeness, the warm hospitality, the gentility, the tenderness of those people are passed over; the fact that we Protestants have not been persecuted, that we have been given an open field and fair play is not mentioned. Some of my best friends in Latin America are priests of the Roman Church. Of course, they did not like their people to come to my church, just as I should not like to see my people desert my parish for Roman Catholic churches. But there was no bitterness in them. They were friends to me and gentlemen."

"But," I interrupted Dr. Hazlett, "Latin Americans are immoral, are they not?"

"Yes, they are immoral," conceded Dr. Hazlett. "Prostitution is shamefully open. And still, when I pause to think of it, I wonder who is to blame. The Church should fight prostitution. But if the State does not cooperate, one may doubt whether the blame should be laid at the door of the Church or of the Legislature. The charge of illegitimacy has perhaps been exaggerated. But there is a considerable amount of it, especially in the smaller countries. Yet even here, to understand everything is to pardon a great many things. You may find an empty school here and there in South America, but you never find an empty cradle. A sin of human frailty is not crowned with the crime of child-murder, otherwise called race-suicide. Children swarm in the streets, in the parks, and everywhere. Then a wedlock not sanctioned by the State and not sanctified by the Church, is not necessarily a marriage against the natural law. If the wife is faithful to her husband and the husband to his wife, and this is very often the case, you will have what we call a common-law marriage and what I believe you Catholics call a clandestine marriage, but not necessarily an immoral marriage from the standpoint of the natural law. What I say does not mean that I approve in the least of this regrettable state of affairs. There are faults in the legislative assemblies and faults in the sanctuary. And worst of all, priests allow the people to worship the Virgin and the Saints,—ugly, old saints, of wood many of them, with hands, feet and heads of clay or cardboard, decked in tawdry clothes. While I confess that I detest image-worship, it is not proselytizing among practical Catholics that I would work for, but I would willingly give my life to regain to Christianity a growing class of demi-savants, of so called free-thinkers, who have drifted very far away from your Church."

Here I submitted a short explanation of what Catholics mean by the veneration of holy images and a remark or two in regard to the harm wrought in Latin America by anti-clerical laws and godless schools. Then I continued: "You understand, Dr. Hazlett, that I did not come here to argue, but only to get your viewpoint. What do you think of the campaign of calumny which has been going on ever since February of last year? The Panama Congress made its own the assertion of Miss Florence E. Smith, a missionary in Chile, that 'Sixty out of every hundred women in the whole continent have lost honor, self-respect and hope.' A prominent member of your denomination, Dr. R. E. Speer, has been as bold as any in his charges. A Minneapolis minister, the Rev. J. L. Morrill, went so far as to assert that the southern countries are a 'Land of dirt, despots, disease, deviltry and degeneracy; where ninety per cent of the women are immoral; ninety-five per cent of the men are thieves, and one hundred per cent are liars.' Would you endorse these statements?"

"Of course I wouldn't," protested Dr. Hazlett. "My own observation and experience among those peoples causes me to affirm that no home is too poor, no board too narrow, no family too numerous, to refuse shelter to the wayfarer, hospitality to the guest, or refuge to the orphaned or abandoned. There are no words in which I can express my appreciation of the sweetness of Latin-American womanhood, too often wronged and exploited, but always patient, gentle, affectionate and womanly. Had I been at the Panama Congress, such assertions as you have quoted would not have gone unchallenged. Had I not protested as a Christian and a gentleman, I should have been a coward, I should have dishonored my calling. I will tell you what the trouble is with some people. I used this illustration at the Third Baptist Church the other day, and will use it again, for it sums up what I have to say. Suppose that an Englishman or a Frenchman should come to St. Louis and should be shown only that part of our beautiful city which lies east of Fourth Street down to the Mississippi River. Suppose, further, that the Englishman or the Frenchman, upon his return to his native land, should take a fancy to write a book on St. Louis judging only from what he has seen east of Fourth Street: just imagine what sort of story he would tell about St. Louis."

"It would make awful reading," I answered meekly.

"Well," continued Dr. Hazlett, "that's the sort of stuff that some writers and lecturers serve to our people. They have either never known better, or have chosen not to know better. Why, I find myself a missionary in my own land now. That ugly story about South America has stained the imagination of our people. I have a great time convincing businessmen that Latin Americans are not thieves, that they are not stupid, that if I were a businessman myself I should prefer to deal with them rather than with any other people, that I found more business honesty in South America than I find in my own country."

The rattling of cups and dishes in a neighboring room told us that supper was over for the Hazlett family. The Frenchman and myself rose nervously and apologized profusely. "Dr. Hazlett," said I on parting, "would you allow me to publish this interview?"

"You certainly may; I haven't the least objection," assented Dr. Hazlett.

"But it may displease some people," I murmured.

"They ought to know by this time that I am neither prejudiced nor bigoted," laughed Dr. Hazlett. "Publish my words, if you wish. I shall be once more a missionary in my own land."

Irish Preparedness in the Revolution

GEORGE F. O'DWYER

HISTORY furnishes no more striking phenomenon in the last two centuries than the great exodus of Irish weavers and farmers, the cream of the island, to the shores of this country during the period between 1771 and 1774, as a result of the maddening extortion and corrupt influences of English landlordism fostered by a weak-minded king. It was the greatest exodus up to that time, the first of which was started by Cromwell a century previous, in the years 1653, 1654 and 1655. In the century intervening, thousands of young Irishmen and women were deported regularly from their native shores to the Virginia and New England colonies and even to the Barbadoes and Nova Scotia. The hate which the Irish race has had for Cromwell and English rapacity dates from 1655, when the former deliberately tore 2,000 Irish boys and girls from their parents and deported them on vessels to the colonies on the Atlantic coast. There is no crime on the pages of history to equal that peculiarly Cromwellian crime. While he was in power, from 60,000 to 100,000 Irish were deported.

This influx of the Irish into the colonies and its immediate effect on the Revolutionary War later, furnish most interesting material for the pages of American history. For, in all sincerity and fairness, it must be said that they contributed materially to the birth of the nation. At the beginning of the eighteenth century, in 1718, five ships arrived at Boston with 200 emigrants from Ireland. From that year until 1720 so great was the immigration that in the last-named year the General Court of the Massachusetts Bay colony, passed an ordinance directing "that certain families arriving from Ireland be ordered to move off." Despite this prohibition, records show that Irish came to the port of Boston every year up to the great influx of 1771-74. John Fiske, in his "War of Independence," declares that "One in every hundred of the men who were in their prime in the four New England colonies in 1750, could say that his family came from Scotland or Ireland. . . . Pennsylvania had many Irish."

From Belfast, between 1771 and 1774, 20,000 Irish families, numbering many weavers and farmers, left Ireland for the American colonies. Sixty-two vessels carried the human cargo and each adult was required to pay three pounds before he could take passage. A contemporary document in England says of this exodus: "It is computed that the North of Ireland has been drained of one fourth of its trading class and a like proportion of its manufacturing people."

At that time the American colonies were sadly in need of experienced farmers and weavers and the coming of these people met with general approbation from all except a few distempered religious fanatics. These immigrants were distributed among the colonies along the Atlantic seaboard. A large number settled in Pennsylvania and

New England and, on account of their superior training as artisans and farmers, soon found employment. When the dissatisfaction with English penal exactions manifested itself here in 1774 and 1775, thankful for the haven they found in the colonies, they rose in their might with the result that from the little settlement of Irishmen in Belfast, Maine, down to the sturdy settlement of Celts in Charleston, S. C., swept a mighty wave of enthusiasm for their adopted country and, even as a wireless message flashes, this enthusiasm spread from settlement to settlement. When the shots of Lexington and Concord rang out on April 19, 1775, those Irish patriots, Protestant and Catholic, were found true to the new cause.

The revolutionary roles of the thirteen colonies show an unusually large percentage of Irish names. Bancroft in his "History of the United States" says: "On July 21, 1775, Benjamin Franklin reported a plan of union of all the colonies in North America, and even Ireland, which was then classed with the thirteen colonies, was invited to accede to the union." So it would appear that the Irish were considered a source of strength, and Benjamin Franklin knew the feelings of the American colonists at that critical time better than anyone else. In this same month of July, 1775, Congress sent to Ireland a pledge "of their unalterable sympathy and their joy that their own trials had extorted some mitigation of its wrongs." Evidently the Irish immigration of the three previous years had its effect.

During the first years of the war the report of the large number of Irishmen fighting on the side of the Americans and news of the persistent defeats of his troops reached the ears of George III. He at once ordered Joseph Galloway, his ambassador in Philadelphia, to give him an exact account of the number of English, Scotch and Irish fighting "with the enemy." Galloway replied that "As he had the record of every soldier's nativity taken down, he could give an exact estimate" and affirmed that "One quarter of the entire forces of the enemy were English and Scotch, scarcely one quarter native Americans, and the other half, Irish." This report was sent to George III in June, 1779, from Philadelphia. Major General Robertson of the British army, delegated as an observer, testified before a committee that "He heard General Charles Lee of the American forces say that half of the rebel army were from Ireland."

If we are to credit the testimony of General Lee and of Galloway, who was a colonial registrar for the Continental army before he went over to the British in 1779, the men of Irish birth and parentage in the Continental army up to 1779 included at least 34,000 soldiers, and these were men actively engaged in battles. John Fiske, in his "War of Independence," says: "The Continental army in 1777 was larger than any other year and totaled 34,820 men. The militia coming in during the year added 34,000 more to the above." So, adding the two totals we have an active army of 68,820 men. It should be remembered, however, that the colonies furnished many thousand more men, from time to time, during the war, but these levies only served three months at a time and then went back to their farms. If these farmers were reckoned the above totals would be swelled abnormally.

Of course the statement that one half of the army was Irish will be howled down immediately by certain clans of the S. A. R. and other patriotic societies, whose members are never tired of discoursing on the great deeds done by their otherwise humble ancestors who fought side by side with Irish soldiers for the common cause. In these stirring times, when Irishmen and their sons and daughters are literally perpetuating the very States where these patriots are fond of talking, it is only right to recall the deeds of the Irish "Yankees" of the Revolution.

There is a movement just now to send soldiers to France as a sort of recompense for the aid furnished us by that country in 1778. Now among the French troops sent over were many Irish soldiers who already had fought under the fleur de lis on the battlefields of Europe. For instance a contemporary author declares: "Between the Treaty of Limerick in 1691 and the battle of Fontenoy in 1745, no less than 450,000 men from Ireland fell in the French service." This information can be found in Gwynne's "Famous Cities of Ireland."

In 1780, when our Continental army was in sore straits a fund of $2,000,000 was raised by subscription from ninety of the most prominent patriots of the Pennsylvania colony. Twenty-nine of these patriots were either Irish by birth or parentage, and their contribution to the fund was $440,000, nearly one-quarter the amount raised.

Further, naval preparedness was first exemplified in the early months of the Revolution by the brave Captain Jeremiah O'Brien of Machiasport, Maine. On the morning of June 12, 1775, with forty sturdy Irishmen, he chased and gave battle to the Margaretta, a British man-of-war, in the bay off Machias. After a hard struggle of an hour, he captured the vessel and its crew. This was the first sea exploit of the war and the first time also that the British flag was struck to the Americans on the ocean.

The greatest artillery exploit of the war was accomplished by General Henry Knox, the son of an Irishman who immigrated to the colony of New York. Knox, under orders from Washington on Dorchester Heights, was directed to go overland and get the big siege guns from Fort Ticonderoga on Lake Champlain. Knox accomplished this superhuman task in February and March, 1776, using oxen as a motive power. Fifty cannon of various sizes were dragged over the 200 miles, and Knox had to journey through a trackless wilderness most of the time. As a result of his work, the British evacuated Boston on March 17, 1776.

General John Stark, the hero of Bennington, was an Irishman. He formed the first disciplined battalion of troops after the battle of Concord at Medford, Mass., on April 22, 1775. General Anthony Wayne of Pennsylvania who commanded the "Line of Ireland," so-called, was a sturdy, self-reliant Irishman. General Richard Montgomery, the most gallant officer of the Revolution, who fell at Quebec on the last day of December, 1775, while leading a detail of New England troops, was a native of Donegal, and General Stephen Moylan, another Celt, was an efficient aid on Washington's staff. Richard Butler, Daniel Morgan, Edward Hand, George Clinton of New York, and Governor John Sullivan of New Hampshire, all prominent names in the Revolution, Matthew Thornton and William Whipple, who signed the Declaration of Independence for New Hampshire, were of the Irish race, so was Charles Carroll of Carrollton, another signer. But why go on? The Revolutionary rolls of the period tell the story of Irish preparedness in the days of '76 and the rolls of 1861-5 and 1898 repeat the record.

Today, the descendants and the relatives of those sturdy Irishmen of 1775-81 are rallying to the same call that roused the spirit of freedom in their forefathers. Through the length and the breadth of the country the enthusiasm of their ancestors is stirring in their blood. As long as there are Celtic pulses beating, the American Union will never lack brave defenders ready to give their lives for the cause.

Fact and Fancy about Yucatan

EBER COLE BYAM

IN a recent issue of a popular American magazine Mr. George Miner, one of those guileless writers who go to Mexico in the care of the Carranza Government and later return home to misinform their compatriots about that unhappy country, has written at length on religious conditions beyond the Rio Grande.

This particular pilgrim modestly admits that he was in Mexico "last August, to be exact." He makes this convincing statement to clinch his refutation of the report that "there is no religious freedom in Mexico, and that there are no Catholic churches open for worship in many sections, especially in the State of Yucatan." "This is not true," he declares, "I know personally to the contrary. Not only have I seen Catholic churches open but I have been in them when services were being held." To support further his declaration, Mr. Miner presents several photographic reproductions purporting to be views of churches in Merida that are "open" to worshipers. According to him, "these photographs were taken on Sunday, November 12, 1916, during the hours that Mass was being celebrated."

That these pictures were taken some time after Mr. Miner left Yucatan is evident from his narrative and would partially account for his neglect to observe the tell-tale fact that in the picture showing the interior of the Church of Santa Ana the congregation is gathered before a vacant altar. The "faker" who posed the picture did not even take the trouble to set up some candles, and there is not a priest in sight. I am not a Catholic, but at the same time I cannot imagine "services being held," "Mass celebrated," without a priest. Quite in keeping with the fraud picture and "Mass" without a celebrant is Mr. Miner's declaration that: "It is the announced policy of the Constitutionalist Government that there shall be religious freedom in Mexico but not religious intolerance." In proof of the sincerity of this assertion, we are told that "To this end more churches will be opened to devotional purposes as soon as it appears that there is any demand or need of them."

This is in conformity with the new Constitution, which says: "The Federal authorities are empowered to exercise such intervention as the laws may indicate in the matter of religious cult and external discipline." Some of us had thought, until enlightened to the contrary, that "religious freedom" meant non-interference by government in religious affairs, and that any attempt by government to interfere in religious affairs was most decidedly religious intolerance.

Mr. Miner reminds us that twelve of the sixteen churches of Merida were closed because "sixteen churches, all of one denomination, are certainly out of all proportion for a city of that size." The city of Merida has a population, according to the article under review, of 80,000 people. Despite this the magazine writer naïvely remarks: "So most of them were closed up; four seem to answer the demands of the inhabitants very well indeed, for none of them are ever crowded at any of the services." In view of savage restrictive conditions, familiar to all well-informed persons, the reason that none of the churches of Merida is ever crowded becomes apparent.

As a matter of fact, at last accounts, not four churches, but only two were "open," and their interiors were divested of every evidence of the purpose for which they had been constructed. But this is neither here nor there with apologists for brutal tyranny. Facts do not count with them, hence Mr. Miner feels free to declare that the "non-church-goers far outnumber the attendants," a statement which holds true only because the Carranza-Alvarado terror throttles Yucatan. Merida is Catholic, Yucatan is Catholic, Mexico is Catholic, and those who are not Catholic form so small a proportion as to be of no consequence. Sixteen churches to 80,000 people mean one church to each group of 5,000 inhabitants. In the United States it is estimated that nearly one-half the population is "non-church-going," yet those who do go to church are permitted to use some 225,000 churches, or, a ratio to the total population (100,000,000) of one church to every 444 people. This ratio would permit the presence in Merida of no fewer than 180 churches, in place of the sixteen reduced to four. Mr. Miner considers six churches all told, four Catholic and two non-Catholic, sufficient for Merida, or, a ratio of one church for each 13,333 inhabitants. This ratio would allow 7,500 churches in the United States for 100,000,000. Does Mr. Miner think that 217,500 churches in the United States should be closed as superfluous?

In explaining the "religious freedom" which shut up twelve churches in Merida, Mr. Miner tells us that "one is used as a sort of uplift club and library for young men." He should have been more frank. In reality the church is the headquarters of the I. W. W., an organization that teaches the gentle art of murder according to the Alvarado plan. Readers are also informed that "another is used as a warehouse to store food-supplies to be distributed to the needy in case of emergency, and whose bodily needs are believed to take precedence over the spiritual." Mr. Miner might have gone a bit further and told us that this particular "warehouse" is the Cathedral, whose interior has been wrecked. The pretext as given is somewhat misleading. The materials stored in the Cathedral are there by the personal enterprise of Mr. Alvarado, who was once a store-clerk in Sonora, and the goods are sold at a good profit.

Indeed, Mr. Miner might have gone still further and told us that six churches, besides the Cathedral, are used as warehouses by Alvarado. And if he had been really exact and given us the names of the six churches so used, we would have discovered that three of them are churches that Mr. Miner claims are "open."

Mr. Miner sings the praises of this Alvarado, who, as Carranzista Governor, curses Yucatan. It was Alvarado who harangued the crowds in Merida in an attempt to induce them to sack the churches. After much effort he found a few criminals who did his bidding under military protection. They sacked the churches, destroyed images and decorations, burned confessionals and desecrated altars.

Yet in speaking of this monster, Alvarado, Mr. Miner says: "Unless I am greatly mistaken, he is a Roman Catholic." The retort is by way of suggesting that to be a Catholic, or even a Protestant, one must subscribe to a certain set of laws known as the Ten Commandments. In the violation of all these Commandments the Mexican revolutionaries, from the top down, are peculiarly active, and there appear to be some American newspaper-writers who would like to imitate them, but have not the courage to do more than violate the one which says: "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

Zuloaga and Spain

THOMAS WALSH, LITT. D.

THE question has arisen among the admirers and critics of Ignacio Zuloaga, as to how far we shall go in accepting his painted statements of the case of Spain, racially and religiously considered; and it seems a matter of very general interest, now that his pictures are making their way in triumph throughout the country, to formulate a few propositions that may run counter to the easy prejudices and catch-phrases of American criticism.

In the first place Señor Zuloaga represents an element that may be said to be Spanish by courtesy only. He is a descendant of the hardy Basque or Vascongado race, hardly assimilated with the body of the Spanish-Castilian-Andalusian people, and without profound sympathies for Castilian civilization, or enthusiasm for the southern character and typical manner of the Peninsula. Again, in spite of the statements of his American propagandists, Señor Zuloaga, until quite recently, has been practically unknown to his fellow-countrymen. His pictures, many of them at least, painted at Eibar and Segovia have not been on exhibition in Spain, but have been shipped directly to Paris and other Continental capitals with an insouciance of the native critics, that has not gained many friends at home for the artist. Hence we must see in Señor Zuloaga's interpretations of the soul of Spain the matter he has prepared for foreign appreciation.

Señor Zuloaga is, moreover, not an artist of any of the typical Spanish schools; he stands rather in the company of the great individualists as a combination of El Greco, Velazquez and Goya for whom there was no rule or preoccupation beside the objective fact reacting upon their own logic and temperament. Like the first and last of these great predecessors, Zuloaga's work is liable to gross misrepresentation and misapplication by the followers of mere realism and mere impressionism of our day. From El Greco he has inherited the logic of an art that studies and apperceives its subject as well as studies its audience in every touch of the brush, that speaks to intelligence and higher convention of mind as well as of eye. From Goya, we learn of his more personal code as a student and sharer of the life around him. He is a sincere truth teller lost in the mazes of his own fantasy which reveals his critical bias in questions of social significance, a fantasy heavy and rational without being careful of the misinterpretations to which it lends itself too easily.

There were some of us that attended the Zuloaga exhibition in the beautiful retired galleries of the Brooklyn Institute, who, at sight of the pictures entitled "The Victim of the Feast," "The Idols of the People," "The Cardinal," and "The Brotherhood of Christ Crucified" could not restrain certain qualms and misgivings at the impression they at first sight produced. Here was the Zuloaga of the earlier exhibition with all the modern and traditional splendor of his technique and vision; but something had happened, something decidedly new appeared clearly in his French pictures, something unusually sensational in his Spanish subjects; something unusually carnal in his nudes, brought back Gautier's time-worn phrase about "Africa beginning below the Pyrenees."

It struck us as strange that an old-time bull-fighter like Zuloaga should depict a blood-stained horse making his way over the mountains so far from the bull-ring, as in "The Victim of the Feast"; that the young toreros in "The Idols of the People" should be presented so rustic and ineffectual, so different from a group of young prize-fighters among us in America. Why, too, should the peasants and the priest in "The Brotherhood of Christ" be made so bony-headed and debased except, we make bold to hazard, for the purpose of a dramatic contrast or to show that the Kingdom of Christ is for the lowly on earth? Why represent the clergy of Spain as in "The Cardinal"? If we are to believe American criticism Señor Zuloaga should take a broken and disordered-looking subject, array him in all the ritual splendors of the Church and place behind his chair a dreamy, ineffectual young scholastic to represent the hardy, handsome body of Spanish churchmen. Why all these things should be considered as presenting the modern problems of Spain to foreign observers, seems quite beyond our horizon.

It remained for us to reason that the Spaniard is usually known by the low presentation he gives of his own country and civilization; that he is obsessed with a sense for the real that drives him to the macabre and hostile for effects of character; that his painters underestimate rather than, like the French, over-appreciate the native beauties of a subject; that telling the bald truth with an accent on the scandalous is the successful and all too native forte.

Yet nowhere do we find in Señor Zuloaga's pictures any direct attack upon conditions in the Spanish Church or State, so definite as the assertions of some less intelligent critics would seem willing to make it. The artist is too intelligent himself, too Spanish, to confuse the questions of economical depression which the loss of its political power and colonies brought upon his country, with any of the features of the ecclesiastical problem in Spain. This anxiety to discuss the two questions together has many followers among those who are equally ready to make of the grotesques of Goya a preachment against Church and State to which he remained all his life faithful, even if highly critical. There is little doubt that Señor Zuloaga would be greatly surprised at these more or less malignant criticisms of his race and religion based upon the peculiar style of his paintings and delivered to a public already too prone to the scandal and too little open to kindly interpretations of his Spanish fatherland. The dangers of taking an art, whether it be painting or poetry, as a sure indication to the facts of history might be pointed out in a timely word to the student of Spain who visits the Zuloaga exhibition.

The Origin of Human Life

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the issue of AMERICA for April 21, Dr. O'Malley takes me to task for a "differentiation" theory of the infusion of the human soul. My thesis was: If it can be shown that the human zygote is potentially greater than one, hence multiplex, then the time of infusion of the soul is placed in doubt. My "basic biologic postulate" was that the potentialities of an individual exceeded its actualities, for which I adduced various evidence, grouped to show: (1) That polyembryony may be artificially induced in animals of various complexity (starfish to frog tadpoles). Call this regeneration or otherwise, the fact remains that histologically there is a return to an embryonic condition, wherefore experimental polyembryony. (2) Polyembryony occurs normally in the armadillo; and I might have mentioned certain parasitic chalcid hymenoptera with extensive polyembryony. (3) Certain evidence indicates that polyembryony occurs accidentally in man.

Dr. O'Malley now declares the invertebrate evidence inadmissible. Very well. But Dr. O'Malley categorically denies the uniovial twinning in man. The argument then centers primarily around these identical, or uniovial or monozygotic, twins, the origin of which is the point at issue. The theories, given in part by Dr. O'Malley, to explain identical twins are (1) Two separate ova fertilized: (2) A two-yolked egg fertilized: (3) Blastotomy, falling apart at 2-cell stage: (4) Gemination, an accidental splitting of the primitive streak: (5) Separate primitive streaks as in the armadillo.

The evidence in brief: (1) A single amnion for the two twins, and, less pertinent, often a single chorion: (2) Sameness of sex: (3) Remarkable identity in physical and mental characteristics: (4) Frequent mirror-imaging of certain parts, e.g., palms of hands and feet.

Assuming twenty-two chromosomes in the human sperm, the chance of repetition in one family of identical chromosomal complexes in fertilization is about as one to 460,000. Given this ratio and the above anomalies the scientist, "physical" or otherwise, it matters not, provided he is objective, offers explanation. It certainly is no fault of his that the anomalies exist; but it would be anomalous if he did not offer some hypothesis. Now hypotheses may be conjectures, but when a series of conjectures based on various evidence all point in one direction. then they acquire at least the merit of plausibility, and deserve consideration. And when it is found that what is conjecturable in one creature occurs normally in another, then plausibility attains probability, but not positivity. Yet at the very point at which Dr. O'Malley sweeps aside all evidence in one magic denial, he leaves his position of objectivity to ascribe to me a three-paragraph progression from conjecture to positivity. After studying my letter over and over, I still fail to discover the basis of this imputation. There are other such points. I am taunted with the sponsorship of a "human morula," which is indeed "bad biology," when I specifically cautioned against such an interpretation of my analogy. Similarly, the misreading of my text of "half a frog" from half an embryo into a "half-sized frog." Why the change from objectivity?

The evidence of monstrosities is pertinent. Monsters with duplicate parts, such as duplicate limbs, wings, tails, and even heads, are of fairly frequent occurrence among vertebrates, including man; in fish and amphibia they may be induced experimentally. It is often a question, in intra-uterine monsters, whether such a monster represents a fusion of two individuals or gemination of one individual. Now, in experimental gemination duplicate parts are mirror-images of each other, like a hand reflected in a mirror. Human monsters, and those of other mammals, show various degrees from incipient to complete duplication, and with mirror-imaging sufficiently pronounced to show that they are due to gemination. This means nothing more nor less than the fact that a forming embryo, in its various anlagen, contains its homologue, and is therefore a living paradox, in that it is greater than itself; since one anlage is capable of producing its proper self and its mirror-image. Thus one head may produce two, as witnessed in tadpoles; there may be twin or quadruplet limbs where one should originate normally. Two-headed monsters show all stages from incipient gemination to nearly complete separation.

Now for the differentiation theory. The single armadillo zygote is one armadillo embryo from the time of pronuclear union; but later from this one embryo there are formed four, or three, or five individuals through a normal process. Is this embryo therefore an "unclassified animal" preceding true individuation? In the Chalcid parasite the single zygote deposited in the host goes through an elaborate series of developmental cycles, the outcome of which is a number of one-celled individuals varying from 10 to 400, which then proceed to develop one larva each. Are these formative stages the stages of some "unclassified animal" because they precede individuation? The biology of these polyembryonic animals is assuredly "bad" because it follows proscribed lines. It is therefore "bad biology" for me to suggest the armadillo type of accidental twinning (note suggest, and maintain) in man and accordingly to postulate an individuation at a later date than pronuclear union. It must not be, because the intervening stage must otherwise be called an "unclassified animal," and not "human."

If so, what will you call the activity of a beheaded corpse, which is surely devoid of soul, but which may go through muscular contortions for hours after the soul has left? Obviously, the tissues still have life, but the central coordinating principle, the soul, is fled. Some life persists in a rotting cadaver for days and weeks. What of the significance of this as regards the inception of life? If tissues be active, therefore "alive," after the soul is gone, they may be equally alive before the soul has entered. What else but specialized tissues are the reproductive cells? Most certainly they are alive, as stated in the quotation from Dr. Conklin. But are life and the soul identical? I just suggested life after the soul has fled, and analogously, before it has arrived. But Dr. O'Malley tells me that a human zygote, unless the soul is present, is an "unclassified animal." I tried to show that the situation is like the Gordian knot; but Dr. O'Malley's magic sword is denial. The argument on the "Origin of Human Death" offers evidence on the "Origin of Human Life," but I cannot go into it at present.

Let me summarize. The evidence for uniovial twins is fragmentary and inconclusive, but too significant, in my belief, to be denied in toto. Since polyembryony occurs normally in the armadillo, it certainly may occur accidentally in animals higher in the scale. Normal polyembryony and evidence of gemination, aside from experimental evidence, prove my "basic biologic postulate" that the individual is multiplex (armadillos, chalcids, monsters). Now gemination of limbs does occur in man; so-called identical twins have one amnion; so-called identical twins have certain mirror-structures; therefore the hypothesis is valid that the multipex potentialities are present also in man and may accidentally be translated into actualities.

The conclusive test would be to ascertain whether one or two corpora lutea are present after parturition, a difficulty which is wellnigh insurmountable. What the moralist holds, cannot affect the evidence. God made the world and its creatures, not Dr. O'Malley and the moralists, and all "therefores" and all negos do not derogate the evidence. It behooves science to formulate the evidence no matter what its bearing. And in the question of identical twins, embryologists, anthropologists, and obstetricians have regarded the uniovial hypothesis as plausible and deserving consideration. It is therefore "bad theology" to deny the evidence simply because it does not fit nicely with one explanation of a disputed point.

A final word, although I have already far exceeded the space limitation set me by the Editor: I appreciate the attention Dr. O'Malley gave my letter and thank him sincerely. If I forsook my objectivity to grow acrid, an apology should be understood. But I do not like sweeping assertions or denials in science, no matter how eloquent the authority, for Dr. O'Malley knows as well as I do how short-lived biological hypotheses are and how radical their overturn.

Columbia, Mo. R. A. MUTTKOWSKI.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

After reading Dr. O'Malley's reply to my criticism of his "Origin of Human Life," I feel it my duty to answer his objections to my "attack" on his article. Dr. O'Malley objects to my "raising my voice in protest" because he was "teaching biology in the Georgetown University Medical School three years before I was born." This is a very good "side issue" for him to proclaim to the readers of AMERICA, for biological sciences have advanced considerably in the last twenty-five years. Furthermore, Dr. O'Malley did not explain that the biology he was teaching at Georgetown from 1893 to 1895 was bacteriology and not embryology. Bacteriology has nothing to do with the embryological question of the origin of human life. It only applies to the "irrelevant side issue" of skin-grafting, which question I shall soon take up. I do not wish to detract from Dr. O'Malley's versatility, however, for he left the field of bacteriology in 1895 to spend the years from 1895 to 1903 as Professor of English Literature at the University of Notre Dame.

The venerable doctor has a perfect right to believe that the primitive embryonic human cell has a set of correlated organs, but embryologists certainly have difficulty in making out even the primordia of such organs at a much later stage than that of the one-celled embryo. My statement was to the effect that these correlated organs have never been seen for the simple reason that no mammalian one-celled embryos have thus far been observed. As to Dr. O'Malley's statement that the human soul is infused after the corruption or death of the life of the germ nuclei, with all due respect for the opinions of Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas, and Dr. O'Malley, I still believe in the "continuity of life" as expressed by Wilder. The "identical twins" question I shall treat but briefly as Dr. O'Malley says he will take that up in his discussion of Dr. Muttkowski's article. I will merely state that while the "two-cells-falling-apart" hypothesis as an explanation of the origin of identical twins is merely a theory, yet there is biological evidence for it and modern biologists generally accept it. At any rate, Dr. Muttkowski's clear and interesting article casts a rather heavy haze over Dr. O'Malley's sweeping statement that "there is now no doubt whatever that these two cells are the right and left half of the body."

Dr. O'Malley accuses me of saying that grafting of "cold storage" skin cannot be done. "I am surprised" that he should misconstrue my meaning and distort my words in such a manner. I am fully aware that such grafting has been done, but the question at issue is as to whether or not "dead" skin can be grafted and made to grow. There is a vast difference between the vitality of skin kept for a reasonable time in "cold storage" and the vitality of skin fixed in formaldehyde. I still maintain that "dead" cells will not grow.

Dr. O'Malley also says: "Histologists do not 'kill' cells in tissue they are working on. They fix or harden them for convenience." This is an illuminating statement for, "Two things are implied by the word 'fixing': first, the rapid killing of the element, so that it may not have time to change the form it had during life, but may be fixed in death in the attitude it normally had during life; and second, the hardening of it to such a degree as may enable it to resist without further change of form the action of the reagents with which it may subsequently be treated." (See Lee's "Vade-Mecum," Chapter 1.)

In conclusion I wish to add that I appreciate the fact that Dr. O'Malley is a much older man than myself, and I mean no offense in my criticism, but he seems to forget that abuse and ridicule prove nothing. To arrive at the truth involved in a scientific controversy we must depend upon established facts and the opinions of modern scientists of recognized ability. While I may be "too young" to have my biological opinions considered of much importance, being ranked by Dr. O'Malley as a "critic without any knowledge of the subject," yet, in spite of Dr. O'Malley's article on "The Origin of Human Life," I still have a wholesome respect for the opinions of such modern and recognized biologists as Wilder, Wilson, Stöhr, and Prentiss, extracts from whose works I quoted in my original criticism of Dr. O'Malley's article.

Washington, D. C. G. J. BRILMYER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Dr. O'Malley in his article, "The Origin of Human Life," says, ". . . .in the human embryo, in the primordial cell, life is from life instantly after the corruption or death of the germ nuclei." In AMERICA for April 7 he declared, ". . . it is St. Thomas' opinion and the opinion of all the glorious company of Scholastics from the day of Aristotle, that the human soul is infused after the corruption or death of the pre-existing nuclear life." And he cites, presumably in proof of this statement, an excerpt from the "Summa" (I. 118, 2), wherein St. Thomas, among other things, says: "The intellectual soul is created by God at the end of human generation."

Now, it is a fact so notorious as to make denial childish, and proof uncalled for, that Aristotle, St. Thomas, and the Scholastics maintain a theory which demands that quite a considerable time shall lapse between the moment of conception and the advent of the soul. St. Thomas says: "In the reproduction of animals a great many intermediate generations ensue, from the first principle of generation, which is in the semen, to the final form of the full-fledged animal." (In I. 1 de generat, et corrupt, lect. 8), and again ". . . the excellency of a prospective form over an elemental one is a measure of the number of intermediate forms, and consequently intermediate generations to be effectuated, whereby the final form is gradually attained to . . . hence it is that in the generation of an animal, or a man, in which is the most perfect of forms, there are a vast many intermediary forms and generations." (C. G. I. 2, C. 89.) See also, De Spirit. Creat. A. 3, ad 13.; De Pot., a. 9, ad 9., etc., etc. In all this St. Thomas is simply expounding Aristotle "De Generat. Anim.," and "De Hist. Anim." And Scholastics follow this lead. The Scholastics, then, postulate a certain process of evolution effected by a series of inchoative generations between fertilization and the infusion of the soul. Indeed, so positive are they on this point, that they even specify the time required; and it is at least long enough to outlast the nuclear life. This is what St. Thomas means by the forecited words—"at the end of human generation." The theory may be very absurd, but it undeniably is the Aristotlelic-Thomistic-Scholastic doctrine. One wonders then what a writer so well read in scholastic philosophy means by ascribing to these authorities the opinion that conception and infusion synchronize, that the soul is created in the fertilized ovum.

Another point. It is quite gratuitous, as being groundless, to represent the Scholastics as teaching that generation takes place only after the corruption of something else. The idea of corruption of any kind does not at all antecede or enter into their concept of generation. They assign three requisite principles or constituents of generation, viz., privation, form, and the subject of these two. And they are always at pains to explain that the privation in question is that of the oncoming form alone, and not of any other form whatsoever, that it is the proximate, immediate absence of a definite prospective form in a subject on all sides fitted and fashioned for the reception of the same. From first to last there is not a word about corruption. It would not be a whit more illogical to say that the advent of a new-begotten creature preceded generation than it is to say that "there is always an instant of time in which death, or the corruption of the primitive form, intervenes between the corruption of one and the generation of the other." It surely is plain that life must reproduce itself before dying, if it is to do so at all.

Dr. O'Malley says: "Life is from life instantly after the corruption of death of the germ nuclei which are replaced by the newly-created substantial form of the new man." Therefore, this newly-created substantial form vivifies, constitutes and elaborates the zygote. And by the same inexorable logic this zygote consists of the dead bodies of the two gametes. This may be scientifically correct, and a true account of ontogenesis. I am not competent to pronounce upon it as a question of biology. I only know that the scholastic opinion of the matter cannot be interpreted to suit it. The Scholastics call for a gradual development through many partial forms, or inchoative procreations; while this theory proclaims instantaneous generation. As they now stand they are hopelessly irreconcilable on this point.

I would observe, however, that this instantaneous theory strikes me as not an unapt illustration of the Scholastics' fundamental doctrine that materia prima (in this instance the dead gametes) and forma substantalis (the newly-created substantial form) constitute the essence of things.

The Pan-American Union

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Allow me to thank the Rev. J. F. O'Hara, C. S. C., for his interest in "Our Brethren Under the Southern Cross." I would also take this occasion to declare that I am in hearty sympathy with the "Pan-American Union" and with the interesting aspiration called Pan-Americanism—at least if it means what I take it to mean. It is also my privilege to agree with Father O'Hara that it would be a very bad thing indeed for the Pan-American Union to be inoculated with the odium theologicum. That Mr. John Barrett and his courteous staff, whose courtesy, by the way, the writer himself has had occasion to appreciate, may continue to steer clear of religious controversy is a consummation piously to be wished.

It is a pity, then, that the official report of the Pan-Protestant Congress should misrepresent the Pan-American Union as being interested in missionary work in Catholic countries. Under the heading "Missions and Other Agencies," ("Panama Congress," vol. iii, p. 60), we read:

> Chief among the Pan-American agencies with which there are large possibilities of cooperation, is the Pan-American Union in Washington, D. C. The officers of this Union are in sympathy with any well organized effort to improve moral and religious conditions in Latin America [Italics inserted].

It is also regrettable that the Protestant missioners should claim to have received from the Union more than information: "The Bulletin of the Pan-American Union, an illustrated monthly magazine, has repeatedly made favorable mention of certain phases of missionary work." (Ibid.) And it is very bold of the reverend gentlemen to outline a plan whereby the Pan-American Union could be made a tool of Pan-Protestantism:

> Missionary agencies should avail themselves of the help to be gained through the Pan-American Union, and also through the Pan-American Society of New York City, especially with reference to proposed conferences and conventions, and the reception of distinguished persons and commissions from Latin America. It will be discovered that an increasing number of visitors will come to Europe and to North America who are interested in the application of Christianity to the problems of society. By cooperative effort their study of colleges, schools, hospitals, playgrounds, charitable institutions and Christian associations can be facilitated. Through these Pan-American societies specially prepared booklets of information concerning the social betterment institutions of the United States, Canada and Europe might be distributed. (Panama Congress, vol. iii, pp. 60-61.)

Lastly, one wonders whether the Pan-American Union would really step out of its proper sphere of action by raising a voice of protest against the cowardly campaign of calumny set on foot by the Pan-Protestant Congress. Latin Americans have felt the insult with all the exquisite sensitiveness of their character. The honor of countless mothers has been trodden under foot, children have been branded with the mark of infamy, the badge of drunkenness, profligacy, and infidelity has been pinned on our Southern brethren. They have looked to fair-minded America, they have looked to us for a vindication. A word from the Pan-American Union would have reassured them that chivalry has not fled to brutish beasts. The silent lesson taught by the "Hall of the Americas" would have been brought home to them. Is not the Pan-American Union a "responsible agency"? I believe Mr. Barrett designates it as such in his interesting book, "The Pan-American Union: Peace, Friendship, Commerce." Is not one of its primary aims to correct false statements concerning Latin America?

I disown any intention of leading the Union into religious controversy. I should be very sorry if any one should interpret my words as implying an unsympathetic criticism. I will even respect the silence of the Union at a critical moment. But personally I may be allowed to express my preference for Secretary McAdoo's attitude. It seems to me more chivalrous, even more worldly-wise. As a correspondent who signed himself Jules St. Julien pointed out in the pages of AMERICA last autumn, the Secretary of the Treasury did censure the conduct of at least one minister. When the Rev. Mr. J. L. Morrill described the Southern countries with this foul sentence, a "land of dirt, despots, disease, deviltry, and degeneracy"; where "ninety per cent of the women are immoral; ninety-five per cent of the men are thieves; one hundred per cent of the population are liars," the "New Orleans Association of Commerce," with a dash of Southern chivalry, protested vigorously, and United States Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo was gentleman and statesman enough to endorse its action with these words: "Such unwarranted and unjustified statements do irretrievable harm, and I am glad you made a reply."

Somewhere in Mexico

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Not many months ago, in the city of Merida, Yucatan, Mexico, under the rule of the Carranza Military Commander Salvador Alvarado, a charge of conspiracy was "framed up" and a young Yucatecan was executed together with five or six other victims of the vandal above mentioned. Pursuant to the methods used at present by those men who are pervaded "by a fierce passion for reconstruction" exemplified by the persecution of religion, confiscatory proceedings, etc., only the official point of view was given to the peaceful people of Yucatan by the already famous daily La Voz de la Revolucion, but in spite of all their threats and outrages, truth will find its way out and cowards will be brought to the lime-light of public opinion.

Before the young Yucatecan was executed, he was submitted to the most up-to-date fourth-degree methods, in true revolutionary style, in order to force him "to own up to having done what he had not done." Three times in succession he was hung up and three times he was ordered to sign papers admitting that he had conspired to start a rebellion against the Carranza Government in Yucatan. Then came the execution with all the usual show of force. But now we come to our narrative.

The day that the young Yucatecan was buried, one of Alvarado's bravi called on the mother of the deceased, Lola Marrufo is her name, and asked her what she was planning to do, whether she expected to stay in Yucatan. Upon her answering that she did not intend to move, she was told that she must go away. She refused to do so and, thereupon, was arrested and taken to the General Hospital, often used as a place of imprisonment for women. Once there, another emissary came to see her in the name of Alvarado and, placing $1,500 in her hands, told her once more that she must leave the country, her country (not Alvarado's) and that if she agreed to do it, she would be set free immediately. Her reply was to tear up the tainted bank notes and throw them on the floor. It is easy to surmise what followed. She was taken by force to the train, carried to the seaport Progreso and there "shipped," yes, shipped like an animal, to Vera Cruz. There she has been staying under the most close observation of two police officers paid by Alvarado out of the money that he has been robbing from the Yucatan sisal growers, and that money is good American money, not Carranza scrip. There you have him, a brave "soldier" of the Constitutional army, cowed down by a poor, desolate, old woman of Yucatan.

He is the same Alvarado that shot his colleague General Garcilazo in most merciless fashion, when Garcilazo only had a few hours of life left, when he was in such condition that they had to tie him up to a chair so that the firing squad might take good aim. Yes, he belongs to the party that shot old man Garcia Granados in the city of Mexico in like fashion. He despises the Sacred Book, but he fears it:—"An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth." . . . El que á hierro mata, a hierro muere.

"Parturiunt Montes"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

T. C. M. has been studying the Augustinian cosmogony, and he comes to the conclusion, in AMERICA for April 21, that when the Saint, in his commentary on Psalm 76, "likens the earth to a wheel, a rota, and rotella, may we not say that therein by a flight of genius the Saint forestalled the Copernican theory as to the rotatory movement of the globe around the sun?" Of course he did. Rota, rotella, rotatory, merry-go-round. How subtle!

The other letter, from Toronto, in AMERICA for April 28, assures us that although St. Augustine, unexpectedly and shockingly, did say the earth is a wheel, he meant literally not a wheel with wooden spokes, but merely a wheel with an axle. Therefore St. Augustine adumbrated, when he mentioned wheels, that the earth turns on its axis, although he did not have any notion whatever that the earth has an axis or that it turns. This is what T. C. M. would call "a flight of genius." Now a wheel is round; atqui a sphere, globe, orb, orbis terrarum (see the Oxford version) is round; argal a wheel is a sphere. Tant' olio per un cavolo! Master Janotus de Bragmardo, his harangue hath it: "By my soul, I have seen the time when I could play the devil in arguing, but now I am much failed."

These two letters remind me of an old cobbler who came from Mayo to Pennsylvania years ago, and shortly after his arrival took home to his wife a watermelon as long as either of the erudite epistles. She boiled it; and when she uncovered the pot she found only a little green water. "Ah, then, Tom, you amadan," said she, "why did you bring me home a great big nothing?"

Help for the Ruthenians

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have perused with much gratification your editorial soliciting aid for the Ruthenians; you have certainly set out their case admirably and well. The editorial impresses me for the reason that I have for a long time had a deep personal interest in these people and considered that they had been somewhat neglected through ignorance on the part of their Latin-Catholic brethren. Your forceful, sympathetic and appealing statement of their case will, no doubt, evoke generous response; but through some inadvertence, you have described the official repository as the Federal Trust Company of Jersey City, N. J. We are located in Newark, N. J., as you will observe and I presume mail matter misdirected may ultimately reach us. If the opportunity presents itself, will you kindly remember to make this correction?

Dissemination of Catholic Literature

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the hope that others may be led to adopt a practice that I have found helpful in the work of disseminating Catholic literature, I am emboldened to say that I send to a poor mission in Alabama the following periodicals after I have finished reading them: AMERICA, the Catholic News, the Brooklyn Tablet, the Catholic Extension Magazine, the Columbian, the Magazine for Colored Missions, the Marquette League Monthly. The cost is negligible and the good done very great.

Legislative Hysteria

IN these first days of the war it is important that all men, but especially legislators, should keep cool. There is no reason for alarm, but even if there were, the difficulty would not be solved by hysteria enacted into law. Unfortunately some members of State legislatures think otherwise, and, as a consequence, they are standing sponsor for bills that are utterly detrimental to the very object in view. Such, for instance, is the bill of Senator Brown of New York, a measure which would remove all restrictions, fixed by statute, on the working hours of men, women and children, "during the period that the war continues and for not more than two months thereafter."

This were bad enough, but the very abomination of pernicious legislation is reached in the clause which provides for the suspension of compulsory attendance at school in order that children twelve years old and over may work on farms. Thus the rights of labor and the sanctity of childhood are violated in a manner unworthy of a democracy. Much might be said about the ethics of this measure, but perhaps it will be more to the point to declare that all such bills do a grave injustice to the cause for which the country is at war. They are bound to set thousands of good, patriotic citizens in opposition to the Government. The present measure will antagonize every laboring man and woman and will disgust parents with conditions that occasion such madcap legislation. The former class will not tolerate industrial exploitation nor will the latter permit their little girls of twelve to be shipped to distant farms for the sake of a half-dozen cabbages and a hill of beans. If an increase in farm laborers is imperative, it can be had by impressing into service the hangers-on in hotels and dance-halls, the "husky" idlers that make street-corners offensive and the thousand and one "converted" sinners that are coddled by solemn spinsters in expensive settlement-houses. The police of New York City, aided by advice from the clergy, could "round up" a sufficient number of such men to till New York State and Mars to boot, thus obviating the necessity of robbing the nursery of tender, flaxen-haired girls, in order to prevent the extinction of beets, purple cabbage, onions, carrots, parsnips, and those other strange products of earth which, by a perversion of nature and grace, are set out in their naked or artful hideousness for human consumption.

Senator Brown's proposed law is an injustice to a great State, and the spirit behind it is dangerous. The bill will probably be modified or defeated before these words leave the press, but the temper which gave it birth may prove infectious or contagious, hence legitimate precautions are in order.

Property or Possessions?

"HOW much is he worth?" is a question often asked in these days of colossal fortunes about a man whom the war has rapidly enriched. "It is hard to say," the answer may be. "He is reputed to have cleared $5,000,000 on munitions." But notwithstanding the idiom's accepted signification, that sum by no means represents what the man is really worth. It indicates how much property he has, but is silent about the extent of his possessions. For many a person who is extraordinarily rich in the one, may be wretchedly poor in the other. Property, saints and sages tell us, is the wealth that passes; possessions is that which endures. The first is diminished when shared with others, but the second is increased. Property grows old, moths devour and thieves steal it; possessions defy the tooth of time and can never be reft from the owners. Under property may be classed money, houses, lands, raiment, lodging and occupations which are mine today and tomorrow another's. But by possessions are meant such priceless goods as grace, virtue, love, friendship, knowledge, culture and refinement. They profit not only their owners but others too. They grow greater, being shared.

The holy ones of God, it is clear, have had little property but many possessions. The Apostles, Martyrs, Confessors and Virgins, whom the Church honors, were poor in goods but rich in good. They renounced as much of their perishable property as they could, and in return God gave them everlasting possessions in limitless abundance. Moreover, they have even won enduring earthly renown. We now know the names of comparatively few of the rich men who lived in ages past. But the Church keeps living and fragrant the memory of numberless saints who had the wisdom to prefer possessions to property, and she is eager that their high example may lead many other men and women to make a like choice.

Why Study Anything?

A RADICAL in power frequently becomes a conservative. Brought to the test, the directors of the Flexner school announce that nothing revolutionary either in program or procedure is in immediate contemplation. When opened in September the school will present no extraordinary points of difference from the traditional type. Changes are to be introduced by degrees, and the Flexner school will blossom in all its beauty only after three or four years.

Perhaps the founders of the new system are wisely realizing that their plans lack something of the perfection at first found in them by many. After a critical examination by Dr. W. V. McDuffee, President of the Massachusetts State Teachers' Association, Dr. Flexner himself must feel that he has lost at least one argument, previously urged by him, against the study of Latin and Greek. "I have quoted figures," wrote Dr. Flexner with perfect assurance some months ago. ". . . 76.6 per cent of the candidates [College Entrance Examinations, 1915] failed to make a mark of even 60 per cent in Cicero, and 75 per cent failed to make a mark of 60 per cent in the first six books of Vergil. . . . The only discipline that most students get from their classical studies is a discipline in doing things as they should not be done."

This is impressive, but Dr. McDuffee has no difficulty in showing that Dr. Flexner's "figures" are carefully "hand-picked" to substantiate a sensational statement. The examinations cited by Dr. Flexner, of a special type since discontinued, were participated in by 128 students. The "regular" examinations were taken by 5,775 candidates, and disclosed results "two and one-half times better than the 128 papers so carefully chosen by Dr. Flexner . . . who also forgot to mention the eight or nine other examinations in Latin and Greek which showed results three times better."

A study of the work done in the colleges shows that the percentage of failures in Latin and Greek, as compared with other subjects, is consistently the lowest or among the lowest. A study of the records of the College Board shows that the examination results in Latin and Greek are consistently the highest or among the highest. In 1916, for example, the only subject which made a better showing than Vergil was the Anabasis.

Forcing the argument home, Dr. McDuffee continues:

Compare the 75.2 per cent of the candidates in Vergil who received a rating of 60 per cent or over, with the 43.2 per cent in English literature, 21 per cent in American history, 23.5 per cent in English history, 44.3 per cent in advanced French, 47.1 per cent in advanced German, 38 per cent in geometry, 26.1 per cent in solid geometry, 42.3 per cent in chemistry, 43.6 per cent in biology, 49.8 per cent in physics, 27.5 per cent in mechanical drawing. (New York Times, February 5, 1917.)

Dr. McDuffee meets Dr. Flexner's argument squarely, and throws an incidental sidelight on the misuse of statistics. Incidentally, too, Dr. McDuffee suggests a question: If the test of a subject's claim for inclusion in the curriculum, be the ability of students to pass an examination, why study physics, mathematics, biology, or, in fact, any matter which requires careful and continued thought?

The Call of Patriotism

TWO years ago, more or less, in a lonely part of a distant Alaskan province, a Jesuit priest was serving a desolate mission. He was a Frenchman, who for many a cheerless year had not set eyes on his native land. France had treated him, her son, very badly. For no other reason than that he wished to work for his country, his countrymen and his God, she had driven him out among strangers; and he had gone into exile with a heavy heart, assuaging his grief as best he could in a quest for souls that had taken him almost to the ends of the earth. Then came news of the war, belated news but harrowing in its story of the evil days on which his country had fallen. A short time afterward a summons arrived, searching him out amid the trackless snows and ordering him back to France.

He had it in his power to refuse to obey; his Government had violated his clear rights, it was hostile to many of the things he held dearest; he was thousands of miles from the scene of conflict, he was outside the range of physical compulsion; he knew in his heart that the Government which had issued the summons would not be grateful, he had no well-grounded hope that if he helped to win victory for France he would be allowed to share in its fruits. Nevertheless he locked the door of his little church, journeyed by sled to the nearest port, sold his valuable team of dogs, set sail for Vancouver and thence to San Francisco, hurried by train to New York, caught the first steamer for Bordeaux, reported at headquarters for duty, and today, if he be not already numbered among the dead, he is somewhere in France, fighting in the trenches, and creeping out between charges in the face of the murderous fire that sweeps over No Man's Land to give absolution to the dying. And when the war is over, he will again go into exile.

His case is typical. As he hurried from the North, others by thousands came from the East and the South, returning to France after the dispersion, not to fight for their own hearths or homes, for they had given up both in the days of their youth and had been driven from the shelter of their religious houses by persecution, but to lay down their lives for their country. The call of patriotism had sounded in their ears, and they responded at once.

The citizens of other belligerent nations have done the same. We have seen them in feverish haste to join the armies of their native lands, though they knew that to do so would carry them straight into the path of death-dealing bullets. Others, prevented by circumstances from going home, have been fretting out their lives, scorning their enforced ease and prosperity and longing to front the enemy guns.

The same tide is now setting in towards the shores of the United States. From every quarter of the globe, citizens who have either sworn fealty to the land of their adoption or have received it at birth as their right, are turning their faces to the land of liberty, eager to place their fortunes, their strength, and even their lives at the service of America. On religious questions they may be as far apart as the poles, on political grounds they may be irreconcilably opposed; but in the matter of loyalty they are absolutely agreed.

A mysterious thing is patriotism. It is the call of the blood that has gone into the making of the flag. It is the voice of the past, rising from the graves of dead heroes. It is the appeal of nature that knows not petty strifes or selfish divisions. It is the word of God, ringing in the ears of the nation and firing the hearts of the people to do and to die in glorious fulfilment of duty. Patriotism is everywhere abroad in the land, it speaks in no uncertain accents. Good men have heard its summons.

Good Citizenship in Florida

BY favor of an unhappy majority, Mr. Sidney J. Catts is Governor of Florida. "Poor Florida!" comments the Baltimore Manufacturers Record. In addition to his other great qualities, Mr. Catts shows powers which bid fair to rank him, as a letter writer, with the immortal Micawber. He is also unique in his estimate of what constitutes good citizenship. Note for instance, the following pathetic plea, reprinted in the Albany Knickerbocker Press, for April 20:

Attorney-Gen. of the U. S.,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: You turned me down COLD on my application to the President for parole of Blake Campbell. Why did you do it? Thousands of other men worse than he are out.

I want to tell you square from THE SHOULDER that you and Pres. Wilson are just like OTHER MEN to me, and I demand FAIR treatment.

Why can't I get Blake Campbell's case before Mr. Wilson? Tell me the reason why I cannot and I will remove it, but if you give me a raw deal I will run for Pres't, and get it, and turn YOU OUT. Now I am GOING TO GET THIS pardon for Mr. Campbell and you might as well look at it from this angle. So write me all I must do, and help me like a man to get it. Best wishes.

Yours truly
SIDNEY J. CATTS,
Gov. of Florida.

Mr. Campbell, while presumably not innocent, is good enough, in the Governor's opinion, to be a citizen of Florida. "Thousands of other men worse than he" enjoy the privilege. Mr. Catts will do justice to this down-trodden person, even if it be necessary to "run for Pres't."

Interesting as is this exhibit, it pales before a second, presented on April 15 by the Brooklyn Standard Union. From this document it appears that bigamy and wife-desertion do not cancel good citizenship in Florida:

Detective McCormack told District Attorney O'Leary he presented to Governor Catts the proof that Gordon had married in Jacksonville, Florida, on July 30, 1914, Etta Lee Clements, who divorced him on March 2, 1916; that he had been guilty of bigamy by entering upon a marriage while he had a wife living. Gordon is now charged with having abandoned his wife in Brooklyn, in 1912. . . . Detective McCormack in seeking the custody of Gordon had extradition papers issued by Governor Whitman, but Governor Catts told the detective Gordon had been a good citizen of Florida for several years, and he was not disposed to grant the request of the New York authorities on the charge of wife desertion.

No doubt the respectable citizens of Florida will protest that Mr. Catts, the doughty champion of pure morality, with lance ever raised against the unspeakable iniquities of Rome, has no warrant to speak for them. If this be true, one of two conclusions is inevitable. Either the decent citizens of Florida do not care to vote, or they were disqualified before the last election.

Easy Reform

THERE was once a District Attorney who did not believe that a saloon open on Sunday, constituted a deadly menace to the foundations of government. It was a violation of statute law, he thought, to be punished in due course according to law and precedent. Because he declined to recommend that all offenders be boiled in oil, he was subjected, now and then, to visits from clerical members of a local "patriotic" organization. After asserting in general terms that "never had the town been so 'wide open,'" these clergymen would express their intention of taking municipal corruption as their text for the following Sunday.

Finally the worm turned. "Very well, gentlemen," said the harassed official, who was a Catholic. "You say the city is 'wide open.' No doubt you can prove what you say. A new Grand Jury will be impaneled shortly, and you'll have the opportunity to tell all that you know. That's my first point. Here's my second. You have been preaching that the Sunday saloon is a menace to public morality and civic decency. But I know two menaces in this city that are far worse. One is race-suicide. The other is divorce. If any of you gentlemen will preach against either, I'll gladly donate fifty dollars to any charity you may designate. That's all."

We have had much pseudo-reform and surface revivals in American cities, especially during the last ten years. Of real reform, not so much is apparent. Many a man who declaims with hot zeal against the abuse of drink, has not a word to say against the abuse of matrimony. He need not necessarily be thereby discredited in his attack on a real evil, but while doing the one, he should not omit the other. No one wishes to defend the "wide open" saloon, but in comparison with "wide open" ideas on the sanctity of marriage, the "wide open" saloon is an angel, bearing healing in its wings for the wounds of society. It takes no courage to inveigh against disorders universally condemned. Reform proves its worth by striking at those grosser evils which the laxity of a faithless age condones, when it does not openly approve.

Literature

BROWNING THE THINKER

AS a poet Robert Browning has been and still is very much of a puzzle. Even those who have come to apprehend something of a definite "message" in his poetry are as yet far from clear in their own minds as to the real scope and meaning of that message when taken as a whole. Why this should be so, undoubtedly never occurred to Browning himself, since the real reason is one that could scarcely be recognized by any but a Catholic. The fact is, however, that of all our greater English poets since Shakespeare, Browning is the least Protestant-minded and the only one, not exclusive of Scott, who has truly recaptured the medieval and normal point of view in his outlook upon life; and this alone explains why it is that whereas Tennyson, whose mind was Protestant to the core, has approved himself the poet of modern doubt, Browning, his contemporary, outstripped him in so far at least as he attuned his muse to healthy certainties for which our modern times have been as yet but ill-prepared.

Like Socrates, whom alone of all the thinkers in the past he most resembles in point of aims and achievement, Browning awoke upon a world in which he was forced to realize that the religion in which he had been reared was a thing outworn, with scarcely any sounder claims upon his reason than the opposing claims of an overweening but popular body of irresponsible pseudo-scientific thinkers whose one and only point of agreement was that "man is the measure of all things." Like Socrates, he also set about discovering the truth for himself; and if his poetry be considered as the replica of his mind the manner of his doing this will be found on comparison to be strikingly similar to the method of thought adopted by the great confuter of sophists. While his contemporaries, like those same sophists, heedless of the truth so well expressed by Solomon, "the eyes of fools are at the ends of the earth," were busying their minds at the periphery of human knowledge in the attempt to compress the whole circle within the compass of hastily constructed theories and each wondering all the while why the others were forever flying off at tangents; and at the very time when scientists were beginning to indulge in the doubtful pastime of searching for the "missing link," Browning was rediscovering man by working his way back to the center and digging himself out from beneath the detritus of false notions concerning human nature that had drifted down from the Reformation and the days immediately preceding the French Revolution.

Just as Socrates in his day accepted the basal principle of the sophists, yet concluded that if "man is the measure of all things" the first obligation he should assume was to know himself; so Browning implies a recognition of the same obligation when in his autobiographical poem, La Saisiaz, he says, "Only for myself I speak, nowise dare to play the spokesman for my brothers." But neither were Socrates or Browning mere individualists. The former, as is well known, held that knowledge consisted, not as the sophists maintained, in sensations possessing no canons of validity outside of the individual, but in ideas universally true for all individuals; and insisted that it was within man's own moral nature that the true standard must be sought which should determine the real aims of life. And Browning in the spirit of the same convictions chose as he tells us "the artistic way" to express his mind,

> Because it is the glory and good of Art
> That Art remains the only way possible
> Of speaking truth. . . .
> Art—wherein man nowise speaks to men,
> Only to mankind—Art may tell a truth
> Obliquely, do the thing shall breed the thought,
> Not wrong the thought missing the mediate word.

It was in this manner he felt he could best bring others to a knowledge of themselves and at the same time present them with that larger ideal and universally possible self which in a materialistic age such as ours is far too easily forgotten.

Now the very first fruits of Browning's self-knowledge were that "soul and God stand sure," and these two facts he clung to on the full strength of that faculty of reason which fared so harshly at the hands of Luther, and of which, in its relation to faith, there have been, outside the Catholic Church, such sad misconceptions ever since the days of the Reformation. Secure, however, in this two-fold central conviction, Browning found himself prepared to face all further complexities of life with the sense that they were to be reverently and courageously accepted, and it is precisely in this peculiar sense of reverence for life's complexities that he has so thoroughly succeeded in recapturing that Christian medieval point of view which has been all but lost to a Protestant world since the days when Luther and Calvin taught their followers to overlook any inconvenient point in a moral or religious question. Back in the Middle Ages it gave rise to scholastic distinctions, casuistry and romanticism and to such social institutions as the jury system and constitutional kingship, while in Browning it displays itself chiefly in what some, whose days have been spent too exclusively in the rarefied atmosphere of a modern culture never meant for human lungs, have been pleased to call his Gothic style. To give a thing a name, however, does not always explain its nature, and to stop at Browning's style is to miss his thought. If this latter is sometimes apparently obscure it is simply due to the fact that in the handling of his subjects he felt, as he himself makes Karshish say, that "'Tis well to keep back nothing of a case."

It is for this reason that to quote from Browning without reference to the significance of the part quoted in its relation to the scope and dramatic point of the poem from which the quotation is taken is apt to be about as absurd a proceeding as to make excerpts from St. Thomas without taking note as to whether it be from the objections he proposes or from his own positive argument and answers to the objections. Nay, more, no poet requires more urgently that his individual poems be read in the light of his works taken as a whole than does Browning. Each presents but a single aspect of what in his own mind he viewed objectively as one vast and varied whole. "Johannes Agricola in Meditation," for instance, might, at the first glint of meaning, be interpreted as an approval of Antinomianism, while "Caliban upon Setebos" has been taken for a satire on Christianity. It is only when one recalls how from first to last Browning has insisted upon God's love for man that it becomes perfectly clear that both poems were intended to exhibit the horrible doctrines of Calvinism. Catholics, again, may naturally feel inclined to take exception to what appears on first reading to be his attitude towards Catholic ecclesiastical subjects, and yet he almost invariably makes the distinction which it were well if non-Catholics generally would make a little oftener: he rarely if ever identified the weaknesses and failings of individuals with the teachings or spirit of the Church. Whatever errors he may have thought he could detect in her he was sure, as he shows in "Christmas Eve," that he could see in her, as nowhere else, the love and the power of the Crucified One. His prejudices, as G. K. Chesterton well says, "belonged altogether to that healthy order which is characterized by a cheerful and satisfied ignorance." As his main interest was in dealing with human nature, it would appear that his real reason for the frequent choice of Catholic subjects was that the high and the low, the true and the false in human character could be brought out more strikingly in the case of men who could be represented as professing definite and in themselves elevating beliefs than in the case of those who might be held to entertain either hazy religious notions only or none at all.

Where Browning, however, is at his best as a poetically imaginative reasoner is when he is dealing with the prepossessions of the scientific mind. Nothing could be finer than the "Epistle of Karshish" and "Cleon" as a revelation of how professional pride and the assumption of intellectual superiority can blind the human reason to the plainest facts and cause it to reject its greatest opportunities for obtaining a saving knowledge of the truth that makes us free. Because of the central certainties firmly established in his mind he had no patience with the agnosticism of the day. To the last he retained his belief in certain definite truths of Christianity and in a Divine Revelation. But the only ground on which he held these was that they were found to answer the needs of our human nature; and just as Socrates identified knowledge with virtue, he, following Coleridge perhaps, would seem to have identified overclosely faith with reason. For Catholics at least the Christianity he championed will necessarily be found all too stunted. Yet as far as it goes it is healthy, and though he belonged to no sect and failed to find his way into the true Church of Christ, he did succeed in rediscovering much that was lost at the Reformation; and in summary we can say but in justice that > "His life was gentle and the elements

> So mixed in him that nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, This was a man."

REVIEWS

A History of the Irish Dominicans. From Original Sources and Unpublished Documents. By M. H. MACINERNY, O.P. Vol. I, Irish Dominican Bishops (1224-1307). Dublin: Browne & Nolan. 10s. 6d.

If Father MacInerny adds to the 600 closely-packed pages of this volume, the four subsequent parts which, according to his plan, he intends to write, the work will in some respects compare with that classic of Irish history, Dominick de Burgo's "Hibernia Dominicana" published 150 years ago. The parts which are to follow will tell the history of the great Order of the Friars Preachers in Ireland as seen in its martyrs and confessors, its provincials, its professors, preachers and writers, its priories, founders, and benefactors. The present volume contains the history of the first thirteen Dominicans who presided over Irish sees. It gives us a splendid roster. Some of the names have a medieval and Celtic ring which it does one good to hear. David MacKelly, Archbishop of Cashel; Alan O'Sullivan, Bishop of Cloyne and Lismore; John Darlington, Archbishop of Dublin; Marianus O'Donnaver, Bishop of Elphin, seem to stalk before us, strong, forcible, strenuous friars and statesmen, the spiritual and temporal guides of their flock in troublous times. And Carbry O'Scoba, had he nothing else to recommend him but his sweetly musical name, might well go down to posterity on its merit alone.

Father MacInerny believes in the methods of historical research of Denifle and Paulus. He delves into records, State-papers, documents and rolls of every description. This is the only way to dig out the history of the past. History is in great measure a process of excavation and the historian has to do for his subject what Layard did for Nineveh and Schliemann for Tiryns. The author is at home with the sources of his theme. A number of documents are here published for the first time: among them some transcribed from the Irish Record Office.

The story given us by the writer of this Dominican epic in Ireland is one of patient and heroic toil, one truly worthy of the traditions of the great Order to which he and the men whose lives and times he is describing, belong. The author has been accused of special pleading in some instances. He himself admits that he speaks bluntly of the misdeeds of the English in Ireland. Judging by the letters which appeared from him in answer to charges of partiality and misstatement made against him in the London Times, he seems fully able to defend himself. The history of the Irish Dominican Bishops will be read with interest. Not only by those who take pleasure in the recital of brave and pious deeds, but by all who are interested in the Middle Ages. Few men came into such close contact with their people in those stirring days as an Irish Dominican Bishop. Father MacInerny's modern "Hibernia Dominicana" tells not only the story of those saintly men who bore the miter and the crozier in Ardfert and Raphoe, but it also gives a fairly complete story of the Irish people during the thirteenth century.

"Blessed art Thou among Women." The Life of the Virgin Mother, Illustrated by One Hundred and Fifty Masterpieces of the World's Greatest Masters. Compiled by WILLIAM FREDERICK BUTLER. Foreword by the Most Reverend JOHN IRELAND, Archbishop of St. Paul. Chicago: Rand, McNally & Co. $3.50.

"Ideals rule the world of men. The world of men is in sore need of the higher things of the spiritual world, proximity to God in thought and affection, stainlessness of soul, holiness of purpose and of act." So writes the Archbishop of St. Paul in his foreword to this volume. If his words are true, as all must recognize they are, the compiler of the work has been well inspired in putting before us the stainless image of the Immaculate Queen of May, such as poets have sung her in their verse and painters limned her on their canvas. Devotion to the Mother of God will be fostered by a perusal of "Blessed art Thou among Women." It is a splendid tribute gathered from many lands and many sources and laid at the feet of Heaven's peerless Queen.

All the great painters are represented. One hundred and fifty masterpieces are here reproduced in sepia. In the number and the beauty of his pictures, Murillo, the painter of the Immaculate Conception holds a prominent place. He deserves it by the spirituality of his thought and his mystical warmth. Even though his figures may here and there lack some beauty and grace, the soul everywhere shines through and spreads a heavenly glow over the whole scene. Raphael, Correggio, Dolci, Guido Reni, Rubens, Van Dyck, Bouguereau, Ghirlandajo and the other dii majores of the brush are represented. Genius and talent are everywhere conspicuous in their work. They do not always, however, realize our ideal of the Virgin Mother. There is one exquisitely noble picture in the volume, that of the Mater Dolorosa of the modern German artist, Martin Feuerstein. In dignity and depth, in the tenderness of the drawn and tearful face, overcast by the ray of an immortal hope, in the poignancy of a grief deep as the sea, so plainly read in the whole bearing of that figure at the foot of the Cross, the painter has wrought a masterpiece. Scarcely inferior is the "Grieving Madonna" of the modern Italian painter, Alessandro Franchi.

The life of Our Lord and His Mother is told in the pictures and in those chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke, which tell of the Birth and Childhood. The more striking Messianic chapters of Isaias, the Sibyline Oracles, Virgil's "Pollio" in Dryden's translation, Pope's "Messiah," and Milton's "Paradise Regained," adapted and arranged, are added. Some readers may wonder at the selection, and ask if something more distinctively Catholic might not have been, here and there, substituted. But the selections at least have the merit of being thoroughly "classical." As such they are welcome. Should any one wish to make a real May offering to a friend, "Blessed art Thou among Women" would be a timely and welcome gift. J. C. R.

Misinforming a Nation. By WILLARD HUNTINGTON WRIGHT. New York: B. W. Huebsch. $1.25.

The author of this book draws up thus his indictment of the widely advertised work of reference he has examined and which its publishers modestly say contains "an exhaustive account of all human achievement":

> The distinguishing feature of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" is its petty national prejudice. This prejudice appears constantly, and in many disguises through the "Encyclopædia's" pages. It manifests itself in the most wanton carelessness in dealing with historical facts; in glaring inadequacies when discussing the accomplishments of nations other than England, in a host of inexcusable omissions of great men who do not happen to be blessed with English nationality; in venom and denunciation of viewpoints which do not happen to coincide with "English ways of thinking"; and especially in neglect of American endeavor.

To prove his indictment Mr. Wright goes through the twenty-eight volumes of the "Britannica's" eleventh edition and prepares a "compilation of omissions" made up of eminent non-English novelists, playwrights, painters, composers, scientists, and philosophers, who are either not mentioned at all or mentioned very inadequately, though British nobodies without number are given generous notices. Among the 200 men and women he finds denied a biography are "AE," Henry Bordeaux, Cammaerts, Winston Churchill, Margaret Deland, Clyde Fitch, Lady Gregory, Lionel Johnson, Douglas Hyde, Percy MacKaye, John Bannister Tabb, Katharine Tynan, Fritz Kreisler, Luther Burbank, Orville Wright, and Josiah Royce.

In nine chapters the shabby treatment non-English men and women of eminence receive is contrasted with praises heaped on Britons of little distinction or of only local renown, and then comes an excellent chapter on the violent bias of the "Britannica's" "middle-class Presbyterianism" that appears when religious questions are discussed. Mr. Wright, who is not a Catholic, calls special attention to "the trickery, the manifest ignorance, the contemptuous arrogance, the inaccuracies, the venom, and the half-truths which are encountered in the discussion of the Catholic Church and its history," and he then quotes some eighteen pages from Father Campbell's Catholic Mind article on "The Truth About the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.'" Though all the author's appraisals of those whom the "Britannica" has either excluded or mentioned meagerly can hardly be indorsed by Catholics, any of our readers who still meditate buying that encyclopedia, would be wise to look into Mr. Wright's book first. Modern Russian History. By ALEXANDER KORNILOV. Translated and Continued by ALEXANDER S. KAUN. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. Two Volumes, $5.00.

This work has been published before its time. A little later, it could have told the story of the fall of autocracy, which it predicts so clearly in its closing paragraphs. Tracing, primarily, the political and social development of the Russian people as a whole, it has, however, a timely importance. After a short outline of the formation of the Russian State, the author considers the main economic processes that were affecting the classes at the end of the eighteenth century. He then analyzes the development of these conditions, the entangled peasant question, the preponderance of the military, the censorship of the press and western thought, the throttling of education and the aspirations of the intellegentzia for constitutional reform, during the succeeding reigns. The inter-relation of the people and the Government on these questions, popular aspirations repressed by autocracy, is the unifying principle of the work. It is a sad story, this history of Russia, with its seething, discontented populace and its throne of glass. Professor Kornilov makes no attempt to lighten it. Though writing in a cold, restrained style, he is still liberal in his tendencies and shows little sympathy with the old régime. His total disregard of the first of old Russia's basic principles, "orthodoxy, autocracy and nationality," mars his work. The religious influence on the masses is too vital a point for even an intellegentzia to pass over lightly. This omission is all the more remarkable, since the author devotes much study to the investigating of the effects of French and German philosophical thought.

Professor Kornilov's work ends with the death of Alexander III. The enlightened despotism of Nicholas II has been told in a far different strain by the translator, Mr. Kaun. In this portion he frankly admits giving a subjective impression, nor does he pretend to treat the period sine ira et studio. He is nevertheless just and accurate in his statement of facts, and his prophecies are being fulfilled. F. X. T.

The Light in the Clearing, a Tale of the North Country in the Time of Silas Wright. By IRVING BACHELLER. Illustrated by ARTHUR I. KELLER. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.50.

On the jacket of this book are printed the words: "To read this novel is to be uplifted, ennobled; is to feel that honor and integrity indeed form the corner-stone of national as well as individual character; is to make one long for the sweeter and simpler life, which to older readers is something more than a tradition. And pervading it all is a pungent but kindly humor." A publisher's appraisal, more or less similar to the foregoing, can be read in the advertisement of almost any "best seller" nowadays, but in the case of Mr. Bacheller's latest story, the tribute, suspicious though it seems, is actually deserved. The author's novels ever since he wrote "Eben Holden," seventeen years ago, have been widely read, but he does not produce them too rapidly, and the present story bears many indications of painstaking craftmanship.

"The Light in the Clearing" is the supposed biography of Bart Baynes, who in 1831 was an orphan boy of seven and lived with his uncle and aunt in Northwestern New York, and grew up to become the great Senator Wright's private secretary. The story abounds in well-drawn characters: the senator himself a "man of the millions"; Mr. Hackett, the Catholic schoolmaster who said to Bart: "Well ye know, lad, I think the greatest thing that Jesus Christ did was showing to a wicked world the sanctity of motherhood"; Aunt Deel and Uncle Peabody, the humorous, cheerful Yankees, who brought up Bart so well; Benjamin Grimshaw, Roving Kate and Sally Dunkelberg, strong types all of early nineteenth-century Americans. Bart's adventures are never wanting in interest and the chivalrous trouncing he gave the profligate Latour will make the reader stop and applaud. W. D.

Creative Intelligence: Essays in the Pragmatic Attitude. By JOHN DEWEY and OTHERS. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $2.00.

Striking the "pragmatic attitude" that, in philosophical inquiry, fixed facts and self-evident principles are to be cavalierly swept aside, that truth is "ambulatory," that human consequences, "the consequences to you and me" are the only legitimate test of truth, these co-operative essays are proclaimed as the "first considered pronunciamento of the pragmatists as a school." "Creative Intelligence" denotes the pragmatic attitude as a process in operation. Intelligence, which Professor Dewey describes as the "use of the given or finished (facts of experience) to anticipate the consequences of processes going on," becomes "creative" when a living being is enabled to "increase its control of welfare and success." With an instrument thus finely tempered the book seeks to "recover" philosophy, to reform logic, and to reconsider all other fundamentals in the scientific and moral world.

As Modernism, denying the objectivity of dogma, developed into a synthesis of all the heresies, so its philosophic ally, pragmatism, with its total rejection of absolute truth, may be compendiously depicted as an intellectual pandemonium. Pragmatism is sensistic, individualistic, nominalistic, subjectivistic, idealistic, pantheistic, and in a sense, anarchistic. Logical demonstration, pragmatism, ex hypothesi, resolutely eschews; it is on the cumulative effect of rambling discussion, shrouded more or less in "cotton-woolly mist," that Professor Dewey and his collaborators chiefly rely to recommend their indefinite speculations. Glaring assumptions, self complacent non-sequiturs, confused and contradictory ideas jostle one another in a luxuriant and often diverting jumble of highly technical jargon with vivid flashes in homely phrase and arresting touches of that racy "philosophy in plain clothes" which constituted the engaging charm of some of the writings of the late William James. The apprehensions of that illustrious pragmatist that to ultra-rationalists "pragmatism would seem so much trash, philosophically—a mere mess of anarchy and confusion" are not abated even for more moderate minds by an attentive perusal of "Creative Intelligence." The Psychology of Religion. By GEORGE ALBERT COE. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. $1.50.

This book is a type of many of its kind, and like most of its fellows it will be read by Catholics, if read by them at all, with little interest and no profit. Not only does its author show practically no acquaintance with the great mass of data contained in Catholic apologetics, asceticism and hagiography, but he is not very much concerned with psychological workings even of the Christian mind. He declares, it is true, that to him the "religious enterprise" is "the most important undertaking in life," but he is committed to the theory of evolution in religion as in other things; and this bias of mind is observable throughout his work. As a consequence his analysis of religious experience deals to a very large extent with the workings of "primitive men," and he believes that from their gropings after a set of values, especially in social relations, arose the first crude notions of religion, in which anthropomorphism is fundamental. This, of course, is the opposite of the teaching of the Church, which finds, in the savage forms of worship, evidence not of evolution but of degeneration.

Of Divine Revelation, of the Divinity of Christ he has nothing to say. In fact, he constantly places Christ's contributions to religion in the same category as the work of Buddha and Mohammed. In Baptism he sees the residual remains of pagan lustrations; the refusal of Christians to pray except in the name of Jesus is, to his mind, a survival of the magical use of names. And what is most offensive to Catholics is his repeated insistence that the Holy Eucharist "reproduces in an attenuated form the totemic eating of the god." Belief in Transubstantiation he thinks is effected by sacerdotal suggestion. The supposed facts of the book are often nebulous, the conclusions frequently ill-founded, and the entire atmosphere utterly out of harmony with Catholic traditions and dogmas.

The Spiritual Ascent of Man. By W. TUDOR JONES, D.Phil. With an Introduction by A. L. SMITH, M.A., Master of Balliol College, Oxford. New York: S. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

Most readers, we fear, will find this book in many ways a hard saying. The Master of Balliol, in the introduction, tells us that the part dealing with psychology, ethics and religion "will require more effort in the reader, but the sort of effort that is both educational and inspiring"; but we must confess few readers are likely to reap the promised reward, unless indeed it is educational and inspiring to struggle through a tangle and a jungle of confused reasoning and false assumptions in the vain hope of at last reaching the open.

The author is convinced, no doubt, that he has a message to tell; but he fails to state its details clearly. The substance of his message, however, if we have interpreted it aright, is a plea for idealistic monism. Throughout the book there appear the customary arguments or rather assumptions that knowledge implies the identity of the mind and the object known; that the intellect is incapable of attaining absolute truth; that the world, in spite of its almost innumerable and apparently distinct and unrelated parts is nevertheless endowed with a kind of unity that points unmistakably to the underlying identity of all things.

It would be a profitless task to attempt any further analysis or criticism. You can never be sure you have grasped the meaning the author would have you attach to the terms he uses. And since this vagueness in the use of words is quite characteristic of the vast majority of non-Catholic philosophical writings of today, it is doubly disconcerting to find assertions supported by citations that are themselves anything but clear. Again, we had always thought an appeal to authorities was regarded by "modern" philosophers as a sign either of intellectual weakness or of a hopeless cause, and that the philosophy of the Middle Ages was held to be legitimately condemned on this very ground. It comes as a shock, then, to find in this, as in so many other books of a like nature, constant appeals to this or that renowned thinker and gifted exponent of present-day thought. The inconsistency is startling enough, the more so when we recall that in the one school the authorities quoted were at one on all points of capital importance, whereas, today a consensus of opinion among these "profound philosophers" on the very foundations of speculative thought must be sought in vain. In Canada's Wonderful Northland. A Story of Eight Months of Travel by Canoe, Motorboat, and Dog-Team on the Northern Rivers and Along the New Quebec Coast of Hudson Bay. By W. TEES CURRAN and H. A. CALKINS, B. Sc. With 60 Illustrations and Maps. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Idle Days in Patagonia. W. H. HUDSON. Illustrated by ALFRED HARTLEY and J. SMIT. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

Books like these build better than they know. In the copiously illustrated volume on Canada, the chief charm of the whole is the unpretentiousness of the narrative, in which the authors speak in so matter-of-fact a way about dire perils, and of obstacles almost insurmountable, overcome with the valor of heroes. The authors set out on their long journey for the purpose of ascertaining whether certain rumors regarding vast supplies of iron ores along the East coast of Hudson Bay were true or not, found that they were, and ended with the simple words: "Our cruise of 1,300 miles, the first of the kind ever made on Hudson Bay, was completed." But whoever reads their account, graphic for all its simplicity, of storms encountered, when all things threatened death, and carelessness spelled ruin, will realize what the journey meant.

W. H. Hudson calls his days idle, but this book shows that they were quite profitable. It had been the author's intention in going to Patagonia, to make studies of various birds which he had before seen in migration, but an accident which occurred shortly upon his arrival, kept him from doing the active work necessary for such an undertaking. But if his limbs were idle, his mind was busy, and he marveled at the myriad wonders of Southern Argentina, describing what he saw in a charming style, and discrediting many hitherto accepted facts of South American bird lore and bird music, for in these topics Mr. Hudson undoubtedly is an authority. "Idle Days in Patagonia" has the literary quality of restraint, and is pleasant, informing reading. C. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock who has an eye that is quick to catch misstatements about the Church in such publications as the Independent, the Outlook, and the New York Evening Post, recently had a correspondence with Mr. Hamilton Holt, the editor of the Independent, regarding an anti-Catholic editorial entitled "The Elimination of Religion and Education from Mexico," which appeared in the March 26 issue of that journal. The letters are published in the Catholic Mind for May 8, and conclusively show how undependable the Independent is as a "text-book" of current history when events in which the Catholic Church figures are under discussion. Yet the Independent is widely used, no doubt, in classes attended by Catholics. The second article in the latest Catholic Mind is Father George Calavassy's excellent sketch of the Greek Schism with an account of the efforts the present Pope is making to bring back its adherents to Catholic unity.

In a lecture on "Paul Claudel, Mystic and Dramatist," Miss Katherine Brégy, gave last month under the auspices of the Catholic Students' Organization Committee of Pennsylvania University, she described him as:

> A Gothic modernist, a poetic combination of the Washington Square Players and Peter the Hermit. . . . You will find him almost as difficult to pigeon-hole as Mr. George Bernard Shaw, but for a different reason. It helps to remember that he was born when France, at Victor Hugo's beckoning, was at the height of the Romantic Movement; that his youth fell under the spell of Verlaine and the symbolists; that his young manhood was passed amid the civilization of China; and that maturity brought him face to face with the unforgettable August of 1914.

The lecturer declared that Claudel, like Francis Thompson, brought Catholic mysticism fearlessly into modern life, speaking in "words accursed of comfortable men." Nearly all of his plays are a glorification of sacrifice, a dramatic turning of the deep truth that "many things are consumed in the flame of a heart that burns."

The third volume on the "Sacraments" (Herder, $1.50) of the Pohle-Preuss dogmatic series keeps up the high standard of the preceding treatises. It is everywhere marked by the solidity of its learning, its orderly methods, and clear exposition. The entire volume deals with the Sacrament of Penance and gives it that full exposition which its nature and the attacks made against it require. The first and second chapters, which prove the power of the Church to forgive sin, and the third in which, under the heading of satisfaction, indulgences are studied, will be of practical value for the controversial needs of the times. One of the most striking qualities of the series, admirably exemplified in the present treatise, is that while no essential theological fact or proof is omitted, and a wide field of dogmatic investigation is at least indicated, the exposition is everywhere clear and concise, thus enabling the author to condense the results of wide scholarship into a comparatively short space.

Those who care to read rambling reflections on votes for women, divorce, the democratic drama, cosmic consciousness, development of the ego, unionism, labor and capital, self-realization, system, androcentric culture, and class consciousness, will find in Mrs. Mary Austin's recent ultra-modern novel, "The Ford" (Houghton, Mifflin. $1.50) a surfeit of such topics. The story evidences some power of writing and will elicit a moderate interest concerning the Brents, especially Kenneth and Anne, who lived in California, and underwent several changes of fortune. But the Catholic reader will rather thank God that his Church is conservative enough to refuse divorce, and "prudish" enough to ban immoral reading.——"Bringing Out Barbara" (Scribner's, $1.25), by Ethel Train, recalls a statement common to the ascetics: that the children of this world are more willing to suffer in the cause of petty selfishness than the children of light in the great cause of God. Reserve and economy are not among Mrs. Train's artistic virtues; she lays her colors lavishly, and the result is a canvas that glares. But despite artistic shortcomings, the book well brings out the essential vanity and hollowness of the modern social world. Barbara escapes its influence, yet as by a miracle.——"The Madness of May" (Scribner's, $1.00), by Meredith Nicholson, maugre its title, is as heady as weak tea. One may safely guarantee that this mildly amusing trifle, dependent for such charm as it possesses upon its clever bits of dialogue, will stimulate to no thoughts of soaring ambition or social revolt.——"The Brown Study" (Doubleday, $1.25), is Grace S. Richmond's "uplift" story about a young love-lorn minister, who is also ready to pray over Mrs. McCarthy's sick baby.

Waldo H. Dunn contributes to the "Channels of English Literature Series" the volume on "English Biography" (Dutton, $1.50), which the publishers believe to be the first book of its kind in any language. Beginning with Adamnan's Latin "Life of St. Columba," written about the year 700, the author learnedly follows the development of the biographer's art down to our times. Boswell's "Life of Johnson," as was to be expected, is awarded the palm, with Lockhart's "Life of Scott," Froude's biography of Thomas Carlyle, and Stanley's "Life of Thomas Arnold" trailing after. Mr. Dunn believes that from the beginning, English biography has deserved to be classed as literature. "The stories of Anselm and of Becket," he writes, "reveal to us the sweet humanity of a consecrated life and the dauntless courage of a steadfast purpose." But he does not seem to appraise adequately Newman's "Apologia," and makes no mention whatever of Wilfrid Ward's excellent biographies.

AMERICA has had occasion before to call attention to Father J. S. Hickey's excellent text-books in scholastic philosophy. The first volume dealing with logic and ontology won its way to a fourth edition some time ago. It is now gratifying to see that the second volume, embracing "Cosmologia et Psychologia" (Gill, Dublin, 4s, 6d.), has more than kept pace with the first. The changes in the new edition do not, of course, affect the substance of the treatises, and consist for the most part in the addition or substitution of striking passages in English illustrative of the doctrines set forth in the text. We look forward with pleasure to the continued prosperity of Father Hickey's "Summula Philosophiae Scholasticae."——Those whose knowledge of literature is not restricted to the classics of their own tongue are doubtless aware of the general similarity of theme that characterizes all literature, and of the relations of dependence that bind together the works of the masters of all times and all nations. To such as these, but more especially perhaps to those whose reading has been less extensive, Miss Georgina Pell Curtis's "The Interdependence of Literature" (B. Herder. $0.60), will carry its appeal. A full and adequate treatment of the subject would have called for a work of far larger dimensions; but this has not been the author's purpose. Her aim has been rather to suggest, "to sketch, in outline," as she herself puts it, a subject that has not, as far as she knows, been treated as an exclusive work by the schoolmen. The book should prove stimulating to those engaged in the teaching of literature.

Few travelers are so well equipped to speak of South America, its wonders, commerce, social life. its cities, rivers, pampas and mountains as Miss Annie Peck. She knows it thoroughly, has sailed down its waterways and climbed its mountains. She has keen powers of observation, and the art of condensing a great deal of sound and interesting information in a short space. "The South American Tour" (Doran, $3.00), through which she personally conducts the reader, is in many ways a valuable addition to the increasing pile of books now written about our southern neighbors. The book is a well-written and authoritative guide, with all needed information about hotels, steamship lines, prices, etc. To one who intends to visit the great cities of the southern continent, the book is indispensable, for Miss Peck is interested in the artistic and social life of the countries she visits and knows how to weave history and biography into the thread of her narrative. Now and then the Catholic will find a jarring note in some of her criticisms.

March's six best-selling books of fiction were these: "Mr. Britling Sees It Through," Wells; "In the Wilderness," Hichens; "Wildfire," Grey; "Lydia of the Pines," Willsie; "The Thoroughbred," Webster, and "The Lifted Veil," King. All except the last have already been noticed in these columns. Basil King's latest story, which is written with his usual carefulness and skill, is a good argument for the celibacy of the clergy. The Rev. Arthur Bainbridge, a fashionable New York minister, is visited by a heavily veiled woman, who tells him of her evil life, and seeks council. He afterwards meets her in society, and without realizing that she was his penitent, becomes engaged to her. To one of his scandalized parishioners the minister then defends his action by saying: "I am nothing but a man." But the former replies:

> Oh no, Arthur, you're a good deal more than a man, as men are known to us. To a lot of us you've been—the guide going on before the climber. . . . You're one of the men—there have been a good many of them in the world at one time or another—who come to us as interpreters of a life purer than our own. The minute you marry you come down into our life; and when you do you can't help us any more. . . . You wouldn't find the largest churches of East and West making it [clerical celibacy] an essential if it didn't respond to a demand within the human heart. When you've said all you can for marriage, it remains physical, material, of the earth earthy, and only good enough for the common man. I've often thought that a large part of the flabbiness of Protestantism, and of its economic wastefulness, comes from the fact that we've so few guides going on above us, and a lot of blind leaders of the blind struggling along in the mass.

Well said; though for those called to it, Christian marriage, of course, is not "of the earth, earthy." The plot of "The Lifted Veil" is too sordid to make the novel pleasant reading.

Merely to enumerate those whom Margarette Daniels considers the "Makers of South America" (Missionary Education Movement, $0.60) is a highly diverting pastime. The list begins with Pizarro, who is followed by Father Anchieta. Bolivar is supported by James Thompson and Allen Gardener, and the book ends with sympathetic sketches of David Trumbull, Francisco Penzotti—sounding names—the diapason ending full in that of W. Barbrooke Grubb. If the average reader should wonder how the bearers of the foregoing "Anglo-Saxon" names won the title of South America's "makers," the author would doubtless answer: "Why, they gave the Latin Romanists there the open Bible!"

Charles Stuart Calverley, that clever parodist and punster, once made an earnest plea that the classics be retained at least "as the handmaids of more useful branches of study," and gives the following example of how an aspirant to botanical honors translated a bit of Latin prose. The attention of the promoters of the new Flexner school is earnestly called to the passage:

> Morum te nigram juraveris: morum vero albam fecisti. Solvi, vixdum rubum caesium, vaccinium tuum myrtillum: teste virgine berberin circumvolitante, et bacca sambuci patre tuo. Dederas et cheirographium; sed atramentum oxycoccus palustris. Equidem non pendo unius fragarii ribes taxi baccae simile: permittam tamen omnibus chiococcum, te rubum Idaeum prorsus exstitisse: vaccinium autem, senior, dic.

You may swear yourself black, Berry; but you have made a mull, Berry. I paid your bill, Berry, as soon as due, Berry; as the young woman in the bar, Berry, and your father, the elder Berry, know. I don't care a straw, Berry, for a goose, Berry, like you, Berry; but I'll let folks know, Berry, that you've made yourself a regular ass, Berry; and whort'll Berry senior say?

The Rev. P. J. Carroll, C.S.C., has written his "Songs of Creelabeg" (Devin-Adair, $1.40) chiefly for those children of Erin, as he well expresses it, "who grow lonely sometimes for quiet places back home where the grey dew lingers late, and where the blue-blossomed clover is sweet,"

> A grassy grave, an ivied wall,
> The gold of an autumn day;
> Leaves in the listless wind that fall,
> Flitting butterfly, robin call,
> A far sky streaked with gray.

is one of the scenes the author calls up, and "Johneen" is the title of some good verses in dialect. Father Carroll dedicates his little volume to his mother,

> "Who made the morn of life so sweet,
> The day is fragrant yet."

Among the noteworthy poems that have recently appeared in the Ave Maria are Father O'Donnell's "Cloister"; Father Lewis's "Oblation and Promise," and Father Earls's "The War," which here follow. Not all of the last is quoted:

"Show me your cloister," asks the Lady Poverty of the friars. And they, leading her to the summit of a hill, showed her the wide world, saying: "This is our cloister, O Lady Poverty!"

> Well, that were a cloister; for its bars
> Long strips of sunset, and its roof the stars.
> Four walls of sky, with corridors of air
> Leading to chapel, and God everywhere.
> Earth beauteous and bare to lie upon,
> Lit by the little candle of the sun.
> The winds gone daily sweeping like a broom,—
> For these vast hearts it was a narrow room.

> The Angel of Summer came on wingéd feet
> And brought the Predilect an ear of wheat;
> Emmanuel kissed the gold ear lovingly:
> And kissing said, "Thou shalt My Body be."
> The Angel of Autumn, ere its days were sped,
> Brought Him a ripened branch of grapes wine-red;
> Emmanuel kissed them, fruit of the amber vine;
> And kissing said, "Thou shalt be Blood of Mine."

> Hark, and hear the clarion call
> Bluebirds give by fence and wall!
> Look! The darts of sunlight fall,
> And red shields of the robins
> Ride boldly down the leas;
> Hail! The cherry banners shine,
> Onward comes the battle line,—
> On! White dogwoods wave the sign,
> And exile troops of blossoms
> Are sailing meadow seas.
> Winter's tyrant king retires;
> Spring leads on her legion choirs
> Where the hedges sound their lyres:
> The victor hills and valleys
> Ring merrily the tune:
> April cohorts guard the way
> For the great enthroning day,
> When the Princess of the May
> Shall wed within our northlands
> The charming Prince of June.

ECONOMICS

A New York Budget for the Unskilled Laborer

MISS LORENA DONAHUE, age sixteen, hangs perilously on the brink of pauperism. At the present moment, she is in receipt of an annual allowance of merely $2,678, from the estate of her father. In these hard times, as is apparent, so small a stipend barely rescues one from the teeth and claws of the wolf. In consequence, Miss Lorena has prayed the Surrogate's Court for relief. She cannot live properly, she says, and as a lady should, on anything less than $15,178 a year.

The maiden's prayer is properly sustained by facts presented in due legal form. Residing with her mother, the petitioner's share of the rent is $2,000 a year. For household expenses, an additional sum of $3,500 is required. Dresses, hats, shoes, ribbons (I quote from the petition), storage of furs, manicuring and hairdressing, call for $2,000 more. The care and upkeep of two automobiles and chauffeurs amount to $5,000. Education, including French and music, but not, it would seem, washing, adds $1,500 to the young lady's budget. Possibly the remainder, $1,178, will be expended on fudge and its accessories. Lest Miss Lorena be thought a spendthrift, I hasten to add that a Manhattan baby, whose name escapes me, is legally assigned $75.000 for his annual sustenance. Even at this early age is he a gilded youth.

Rising Estimates

SUCH individual budgets are of little interest to the economist. They are prepared by ascertaining, not how little, but how much one has to spend. But turning from the individual to the family, it is to be noted that the last ten years have brought out a number of excellent studies on the budget of the unskilled laborer and his family. In 1906, Dr. John A. Ryan, estimating in his "A Living Wage," that $600 was the minimum on which a family of six or seven could be maintained, held that in some localities this amount would be insufficient. Since that time, "retail prices seem to have advanced at least twenty-five and possibly, forty-five per cent," writes Dr. Ryan. The six hundred dollars of 1906 must now be replaced by a minimum of $750, with a much higher average for New York City.

In 1907, L. B. More presented an actual study of a family, in which father, mother, and two boys, eight and nine years old, maintained a fair standard of living on $622.50 per annum. In this case it was possible to secure suitable housing for a monthly rent of $11.50, while the cost of food ranged from $4.00 to $7.00 weekly. "But a fair living wage for a workingman's family of average size in New York City should be at least $728 a year," and if any provision were to be made for the future, an annual income of from $800 to $900 would be required. ("Wage Earners' Budgets," p. 163 sq.)

Other 1907 Estimates

OTHER estimates for a family of five, dating from about this year are: Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics, $724; New York Bureau of Labor, $520; Mr. John Mitchel, of the United Mine Workers, $600; Mr. Robert Hunter, author of "Poverty," $460; Dr. E. T. Devine, of the Charity Organization Society, $600. In 1908, the United States Bureau of Labor estimated that "a fair standard of living for a family of five persons, among mill workers, was $600.74 in the South, and from $690.60 to $731.64 in Fall River." Robert C. Chapin in his study of the standards of living among workers in New York, published in 1909, concluded that in Manhattan, at least, a family of five could not be decently supported on any sum less than $800. In 1915, the New York Factory Investigating Commission estimated a minimum of $772.43 for Buffalo and $876.43 for New York City. The Bureau of Standards of the City of New York, in February of the same year, put the minimum at $844.942. The following details are listed:

Housing	$168.00
Carfare	30.30
Food	383.812
Clothing	104.20
Fuel, light	42.75
Health	20.00
Insurance	22.88
Sundries	73.00
Total per year	$844.942

The item "Sundries" was divided among reading matter (a penny paper daily, and an occasional Sunday edition), $5.00; recreation, $40.00; furniture and utensils, moving, $18.00; church dues, $5.00; incidentals, such as soap, washing materials, stamps, paper, $5.00. How closely the figures were pared may be judged from the allotment to father of four handerchiefs at five cents each, three collars at ten cents each, and three pairs of shoes at $2.00.

The New York 1917 Estimate

IN a report, dated February, 1917, this budget is revised. The minimum is now placed at $980.418, an increase of approximately 16 per cent in two years As in the first study, it is assumed that the family consists of father, mother, two boys, aged thirteen and six, and a girl of ten. Dieticians were asked to fix the minimum in quantity and quality of food. This defined, food was priced in municipal and neighborhood groceries, at pushcarts, in cooperative stores, and neighborhood butcher shops, care being taken to inquire at those places where unskilled workingmen would naturally make their purchases. With all other details similarly investigated and checked, the following estimate was prepared:

Housing	$168.00
Carfare	30.30
Food	492.388
Clothing	127.10
Fuel, light	46.75
Health	20.00
Insurance	22.80
Sundries	73.00
Total per year	$980.418

In this estimate some question has been raised whether the items of housing and sundries have not been underrated. On the whole, however, it is felt that the estimate is fairly accurate.

Health, Insurance and Recreation

HEALTH, insurance and recreation are items which call for some comment. Dr. Lewis I. Dublin, statistician for the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, concludes after a detailed study, that "a workingman will average five weeks' sickness in three years, or that one in every three will be sick in each year." Professor Irving Fisher of Yale, states that the average expenditure, resulting from sickness and death among the families of workers, is $27.00 per annum. The United States Commissioner of Labor (1912) concurs in this estimate, as does Dr. Dublin; but the latter "supplements this view by stating that even at this rate, the family will to some extent be dependent on charity." ("Report," p. 15.) The New York estimate, however, is placed at $20.00, "because there are more facilities for conserving the health of a family in New York than elsewhere."

The expenditure of $22.88 for insurance is justified on the assumption that the father is insured for $500, the mother for $100, and the children for the smallest amount that can be registered. This "is merely industrial insurance," and does not provide against sickness, accident, unemployment or property loss. Weekly payments for this insurance are the general rule.

For a policy of $500 the premium is twenty-five cents, for $100, ten cents, while a minimum of three cents is required for the children's insurance. It is interesting to observe that while Americans, Germans, and Irish insure members of the family rather than property, the custom is reversed with Russians and Hungarians. In the present estimate, no provision is made for property insurance, for the obvious reason that a man working on this minimum is not likely to have any property worth insuring.

As to recreation, the Report explains: "It is unnecessary to defend the fact that a family in order to maintain a normally happy and self-respecting existence must have proper amusements. For recreation, therefore, we have allowed occasional trips to the beach, incidental carfare, moving-picture shows, Christmas and birthday presents and miscellaneous amusements." In this, the moralist will heartily concur with the economist. Proper amusement in moderation helps soul as well as body, since it does much to make the worker a more human and therefore a more law-abiding and useful member of society. There is no danger that the worker will indulge in too much recreation. The real danger is that in default of amusements of a suitable kind, he will be impelled to varieties that are personally harmful, anti-social or even criminal.

Some Private Budgets

INCLUDED in this Report of the Bureau of Standards are budgets submitted by several private societies. The estimates of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, are, for Manhattan: 1915, $651.36; 1917, $723.36. The Association notes, however, that this is by no means an ideal minimum budget, but simply the smallest amount on which a laborer's family can possibly be maintained in decency. The Social Service Bureau of Bellevue Hospital raises its estimate of $810.356, made in 1915, to $1,003.806; the United Hebrew Charities submits an advance from $783 to $907.30. For Brooklyn, two estimates are offered. The first, calculated by the St. Vincent de Paul Society, increases its estimate (excluding health, carfare and sundries), from $806 to $943; the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities, including carfare and sundries, from $785.20 to $941.20.

To what extent the wages of unskilled labor have kept pace with the rise in the cost of living, may be left for another study. It is safe to say, however, that if exception be made for certain employments of a temporary character, the wage rate of the New York unskilled laborer has not made an equal advance.

EDUCATION

Geography in the Grades

TO teach geography means to familiarize the child with its laws and principles, to lead him to apply them in determining geographical conditions, and to see how human activities are influenced by these conditions. "The practical needs of the present day require geography to depict the earth as the abode of mankind, and the different regions of the globe as the spheres of action of the various people. Geography must furnish us with an explanation of the agricultural, industrial and commercial circumstances, and the poverty and wealth of each country, deduced from its situation, its climate, the nature of its surface, its animal, vegetable and mineral conditions, and the character of the people." This definition shows that the study is no longer considered a knowledge of unrelated facts, but is regarded as a science depending upon fundamental laws.

With this subject, as in fact with all others of the curriculum, the attitude of the teacher decides the attitude of the class. This is true of normal children, at least, and it is they we have in mind. If the teacher comes to the lesson with the subject matter well in hand, knowing just what he is to teach, how he is to teach it, and what results he is to get, the lesson will be taught with life and enthusiasm. There will be no striving to gain or hold the attention of the children; they, like Coleridge's Wedding Guest, cannot choose but hear.

Correlating the Subject

ITS importance in the curriculum is apparent from the broad outlook it gives upon the world, through its connection with the other sciences. Geography cannot be taught alone; there are kindred subjects with which it must be correlated, if it is to be adequately presented. In treating of man, it depends upon ethnology for many facts regarding the races and their influence in developing the intellectual, industrial and commercial status of the world. Meteorology, geology, and economics will be of great value in dealing with this comprehensive subject. The teacher with a knowledge of meteorology can wrap even so unpromising a subject as rainfall with interest. Some instruction in the use of the rain gauge, and the method of calculating the average rainfall of a State or the United States, brings the pupil valuable practical facts. Again, a good working knowledge of this subject renders easy the teaching of such subjects as climate and climatic differences, tornado and cyclonic regions, etc. In describing the surface and structure of the earth, geography touches upon geology. Many important facts can be taught, as it were incidentally, concerning sandstone, limestone, granite, quartz, feldspar, and the other common rocks. Nearly every section of the country presents geological features of its own; here, the knobs and hills covered with coral formation telling its own story to eyes which can read, of the coral polyp and its work; there, the rock forming the bed of the running brook, filled with fossils of brachiopods and other related shell fish; again, the silent majestic mountains, rearing aloft their granite piles. All these facts speak more eloquently than words of the physical changes that have come upon the earth. "O earth, what changes hast thou seen!" It seems an injustice to the child that he should grow up wholly ignorant of nature's book, the fairyland of science, which lies all around him. In explaining the productions, industries, wealth and poverty of nations, geography prepares for economics, a subject of vital importance at the present time. Other sciences upon which geography draws are mathematics, astronomy, zoology, and agriculture.

Formal Drill

IT is a great mistake to overemphasize one part of a subject to the detriment of another, equally important, and there is a tendency in correcting the error, to swing to the other extreme. Years ago the criticism was made that too much time was spent on formal geography. It is argued that the child now acquires better general ideas of description from the wealth of supplementary material placed at his disposal; but from time to time we hear the complaint that locative geography is being ignored. "It is apparent that a grammar-school graduate who discourses freely on synclines and anticlines, without being able to show you London or New York City on the map, has somewhere jumped a cog in his preparation for life." Some time ago an article in a school journal stated that informal tests in geography were given to high-school graduates in different parts of the country. They could not locate on outline maps such places as London, France, New York City, Chicago, California, and Texas. This condition was probably the result of an effort made to eliminate the drill aspect in geography. Places were to be located as they occurred in the cultural pursuit of the study. A certain amount of formal drill must be done in all the branches, unless we wish our pedagogical house to rest on a foundation of sand.

No correct teaching requires the memorizing of the text. This is a deadening process, often descending into a repetition of empty words. Whenever possible the teaching of geography should be done concretely. The day has passed when the teacher who sits on the rostrum and says, "Begin the lesson, John; take it up, Mary," is either seen or heard. So rapid has been the advance in the teaching of this and kindred subjects, that there seems to be little excuse for not presenting them concretely. While we are told to illustrate wherever possible, wherever practical, yet this illustration must be simply a means to an end. Such, for instance, should be map drawing; a means of fastening certain facts securely. The drawing may be crude, nevertheless it serves its purpose. Maps carefully and painstakingly drawn, elegantly colored, perfect as to detail, have little educational value in the geography lesson, however valuable they may be as works of art. The sand-table can be utilized in the lower grades, in teaching the natural divisions, highlands and lowlands, a river system, its source and outlet, etc. The work, to be practical, must be the pupil's; little permanent knowledge is obtained from a table elaborately worked up by the teacher. Care must be taken that certain definite facts are secured both by map drawing and sand-table work; otherwise these become prolific sources of idleness.

In pursuing the study of a country or group of States, it is well to follow an outline; e. g., surface, soil, climate, drainage, productions, industries, people, history. Pupils should be encouraged to use maps and different texts in developing these topics. Thus they will be trained to pick out essentials. It is not necessary to learn all that a text-book contains; much of the matter is placed there for reference. By careful planning of his work, the teacher can introduce into the assignment of the lesson a problem, the solving of which will enable the pupil to learn many related facts. "Would it have been as easy to colonize North America from the western coast as from the eastern?" "Why did certain cities grow into great commercial centers?" "Are seaports always situated on good harbors?" "Why is Chicago the greatest grain market in the world?" In solving these and other problems, it will be necessary to consult reference books and geographical readers. To review a country, pupils might give an exhibit of the result of their study by means of maps, products, pictures, etc. A program consisting of numbers relating to the country would prove interesting and profitable. Songs, compositions, short talks on literary and historical personages, will help to impress the knowledge acquired.

The Present Trend

THE tendency now is toward industrial geography. There is no doubt that it is a fertile and interesting field. Here the child learns his dependence upon his fellow-beings. "The coffee he drinks is prepared from beans gathered by savages in South America or the East Indies; his tea is steeped from leaves dried by the Japanese or the Chinese. Perhaps he sweetens his South Carolina rice with Cuban sugar. He eats mackerel caught in the fiords of Norway. Saginaw salt combines with India pepper to give relish to his Kentucky sweet potato. Mediterranean sardines are served on slices of California lemons. His dime coined from silver mined in Nevada buys dates plucked from palms in Africa. Perhaps he corks his ink bottle with a bit of bark from a tree growing in Spain." The sources of information in this line are many. Helpful books are Rocheleau's "Great American Industries," Book III; "Commercial and Industrial Geography" by Kellar and Bishop; Word's "Primer of Political Economy," "Geographical Readers" by Carpenter.

The teacher of geography coming to his work prepared to lead his pupils in this study which forms the basis not only of many grammar grade studies but also of nearly every high school subject, will be able to bring joy to the minds of his pupils. From him they will learn to read sermons in stones, find books in the running brooks, and good in everything.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Fostering Autocracy

DR. PARK L. MYERS, dispensing wisdom to the Woman's Educational Club at Toledo, declared himself unsympathetic with the study of the classic languages because they tend to develop the spirit of autocracy in our high school pupils. According to the local Times, he strongly favored the study of the various branches of science in preference to Latin and Greek, "arguing that a knowledge of science makes people more tolerant towards one another." This statement is beautifully illustrated in the present war. The toleration fostered by the highly scientific inventions of machine-guns, mortars, asphyxiating gas, liquid fire, submarines and battleships is simply unexampled in the annals of history. The poor monks of the Middle Ages, on the other hand, who, in the seclusion of their cloisters preserved for the world the classic literature which is now threatening to overturn our democracy, were of course notorious for their autocratic habit of mind.

Lancaster's "Movies"

FIVE separate committees which recently investigated the moving-picture theaters of Lancaster, Pa., reached practically the same conclusion regarding the moral perils of the city's film-halls. The Ministerial Association, the last of the committees, examined 134 moving-pictures and then made the following report:

> When only 49 per cent of the pictures can be classed as good (and this only by a very liberal estimate); when 22 to 40 per cent of the pictures show marital infidelity and illicit love, and immorality made falsely attractive by fine clothes and luxurious surroundings; when 20 per cent of the pictures show murders and suicides, and 10 per cent intemperate drinking and drunkenness, and 27 per cent robberies and theft and gambling and poisoning and kidnapping and blackmailing—it is time, we feel, that the Christian forces of this community should arise and call a halt, either by warning all parents to keep their children away from such shows, or by petitioning the mayor to use his prerogatives to appoint a local board of censorship to supplement the work of the State Board, which this latter board openly and freely declares is inadequate.

"These pictures were a veritable school of crime—and the impression they left was a sneer at virtue and goodness," was one of the investigator's opinion of what he saw. Lancaster's moving-picture theaters are probably no better nor worse than those of any other American city of its size. But how long will the patient public endure this corruption of children by vile films?

A New Feature in College Work

THE idea of developing stereopticon lecture clubs in our Catholic colleges, previously discussed in our educational columns, is gradually gaining favor and has everywhere met with signal success. The lectures are given in Catholic schools, institutions, parish halls and before Catholic organizations. No pains are spared in carefully preparing the speakers and in gathering from all available sources, in Europe and America, the best and most attractive illustrations of the subjects chosen for treatment. The latest college organization of this nature which has come to our notice is the "Little Flower" Lecture Club of St. Louis University. The members, we are told, are fully alive to the vitiating influence of the "movies" and have therefore set themselves the task of counteracting the evil in a practical way. "They are persuaded that there is more genuine beauty and romance in Catholic deed and thought; that there is more that appeals to the human mind and heart in the life, for instance, of a Xavier, a Marquette, a Bernadette, or the 'Little Flower,' than in anything that can be conceived by the brain of an Ince or a Griffith." Nothing could be more true. Catholics have but to utilize the magnificent material furnished them in the lives of the heroic men and women of their own faith; but the treatment must be worthy of these lofty themes and no haphazard efforts should be tolerated. Neither time nor labor is to be spared in the historical study, the perfect wording of the lecture, and the richest choice of illustrations before the speakers are permitted to make their appeal to the public. Success is then assured beforehand.

Cardinal Farley's Tribute to the Polish People.

THE following letter of Cardinal Farley, with its beautiful and affectionate tribute to the Polish people, was written to the Reverend Aloysius Warol, S.J., editor of the new Polish Messenger of the Sacred Heart;

> It is a great joy to me to learn that you intend to publish a Polish Messenger of the Sacred Heart for the benefit of the exiles of that heroic Catholic nation, which, during so many centuries, was the bulwark of Christianity against the infidels, and which, more than once, by the unparalleled bravery of her sons saved the Church of God from utter ruin in Europe. It was a pleasure to me to be able to encourage the Catholic people of this happy land to contribute to the relief of your people in blood-stained Poland where brothers are compelled to fight against brothers and where so many women and children are exposed to the very worst miseries of this terrible war. But it is a much greater happiness to be able now to call down God's blessing on your work of strengthening their hearts to bear the cross which our loving Heavenly Father has seen fit to lay upon them. May the teaching and example of the Sacred Heart give them patience in their sorrows and strength to overcome the temptations which surround them! And may the thought of the heroism of their forefathers who kept the Faith amid persecutions greater than have ever been known except among the early Christians and in Ireland, make them as heroic now in fighting against the more subtle persecutions which all who wish to serve God faithfully must endure even in time of peace. May Almighty God bless your great work! May the Sacred Heart of His Divine Son instruct you how to make known the great lessons which He teaches mankind from the Crib to Calvary! May all success attend your Polish Messenger of the Sacred Heart!

It would be superfluous to add further words of encouragement or recommendation. The new monthly, Poslaniec Serca Jezusa, is published at St. Francis Xavier's College, New York. The editors have wisely decided upon the modest price of five cents a copy, with special rates for bundle orders.

The Church as Pacifier

IN the stirring discourse Father Thomas J. Campbell, S.J., delivered last week at the Pro-Cathedral, Brooklyn, on the occasion of the silver jubilee of Bishop McDonnell he thus described the Church's humanizing and pacifying power:

> What are all the dioceses of the world, but sections, portions, divisions, territories of the universal and visible Kingdom of God on earth? And who are those who govern them but the delegated and consecrated representatives of him who is the Supreme Ruler and the Chief Shepherd: the Vicar of Jesus Christ? What they do he does; without him they would be absolutely helpless. When, therefore, this world-wide Kingdom exerts an influence not only on 800,000 souls as here on this island, but on countless millions in every clime and nation and in every condition of life, by modifying, checking, controlling, and in numberless and sublime instances almost completely eradicating the terrible appetites of the animal nature of men and substituting for them impulses and ambitions that are noble, elevating and supernatural, it is clear, even though in individual cases it succeeds only to a slight degree, or not at all, that a mighty power is at work in the interest of the world's peace and succeeding to an extent that defies calculation. For suppose if you can that the doctrines and morality inculcated by Christ, not only such as the Catholic Church teaches, but that all the shreds and remnants and vestiges which have remained despite the ravages of heresy and schism, were completely eliminated from the world; and that man were left absolutely in the power of those brutal instincts by which he is prompted to such a frightful extent today, what would the whole world be but hell? It is in preventing that catastrophe and in eliciting splendid examples of Christian piety, even in the bloody trenches and reeking battlefields, that the Sovereign Pontiff, the Representative of Jesus Christ, displays his power on earth; and makes it manifest to those who reflect that he is infinitely greater than if he were merely sending back an Attila to his forests, or putting Henry IV on his knees in the snows of Canossa.

A remarkable circumstance of the jubilee celebration was the fact that Father Campbell also preached at the consecration of Bishop McDonnell which took place on St. Mark's Day, 1892, at St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York.

Citizen, Patriot and Man of Peace

ALL the bells throughout the mountains and valleys of Switzerland were lately rung to usher in the fifth centennial of the great Catholic patriot to whom Switzerland is indebted for the preservation of her national unity, the Blessed Nicholas von Flue. Distinguished in his country's battles, he refused to accept from a grateful nation the highest dignity it could bestow on him. When after the Burgundian wars the delegates from the various cantons fell into disagreement, and there seemed no possible settlement except an appeal to arms, an embassy was sent to seek his advice. As a result unity and peace were so firmly established that they continued unbroken for centuries. After a strenuous life of public service and after giving ten children to his native land, the hero retired to a hermitage where his bed was a board, his pillow, a stone, and his sole food for twenty years, the Holy Eucharist. This last fact, a constant miracle, was carefully verified during his own lifetime by both the civil and ecclesiastical authorities. From his family have sprung at least thirty priests. In its official proclamation the Swiss Government thus describes his unique services to his native land:

> The present day (March 21) vividly calls to mind the memory of a venerable figure in Swiss history. In a period of extreme danger to the old Federation, Brother Klaus (the familiar name by which he was known), looking far beyond mere petty local interests, threw the weight of his moral influence into the scales for peace, a peace of no mere temporary nature. He firmly welded together the bonds that had loosely joined the members of the Federation, so that it remained unbroken in the crisis of the Reformation. Thus was established the solid foundation of the present Swiss ideal: the peaceful happy union of peoples of diverse tongues, all dowered with equal rights, and the harmonious blending of three distinct types of culture. . . . In the foreign affairs, too, of the Federation, Brother Klaus, for his piety and wisdom had won him international honor, devoted himself to the interests of peace. His influence reached as far as the courts of Innsbruck and Milan. The principles which he so ardently recommended to the Government at Berne have a deep significance even now. They are summed up in the faithful observance of our civic duties, in the protection of the weak, and mainly and above all things, in the preservation of a civic peace founded on mutual charity and esteem.

Swiss ideals are like our American ideals. Surely we have a lesson to learn from the illustrious Catholic patriot, a lesson of mutual love and helpfulness. "God grant," wrote the President as he ordered the ringing of all the bells in Switzerland, "that these chimes may find an echo far beyond our own frontiers in perpetuating the spirit of the man of peace from Ranft."

The "Unbiased" "Independent"

The Greek Schism and Benedict XV

Frequent complaint is made of the lack of fair play in the treatment of Catholic questions by secular publications. A striking instance of this is shown in the correspondence with the editor of the Independent, which is given in the current issue of the CATHOLIC MIND. The explanation of the status of the Greek Schism, which completes the number, is both interesting and instructive.

The War.—The British have advanced east of Arleaux-en-Gobelle and captured Fresnoy; they have also made some progress on the twelve-mile front from Fresnoy to Cherisy, and have occupied the latter place. Bullecourt, further south, was attacked but is still held by the Germans. The French have moved north along the Craonne plateaux, have stormed the city itself and advanced beyond it. West of Craonne they have pierced the German line for a distance of four miles and southeast of Craonne they have taken three important heights. In the Champagne district, between Reims and Aüberive, the French have advanced about half a mile on a front of about two miles, and have got possession of Mont Carnillet and Mont Haut.

Bulletin, April 30, p.m.-May 7, a.m.

In Armenia the Russians have evacuated Mush. In Mesopotamia the Turks who were defeated at Samara have retreated fifteen miles in a northerly direction along the Tigris. Further east they have taken up positions a few miles south of Bandiadhaim and about twenty-five miles southwest of Kifri. Renewed activity is reported in the Trentino, Macedonia, Volhynia, Galicia and Rumania, but in none of these places have important results been achieved.

The principal interest of the week centered around the censorship section of the Espionage bill. In the public press and in the House of Representatives there was violent opposition to the measure as reported by the House Judiciary Committee, principally on the grounds of its unconstitutionality, its assumption that the press was not loyal and could not be trusted, and of its uselessness. Other objections laid stress on the fact that it barred constructive criticism, that it deprived citizens of their inherent right to a fair trial, that it made it possible to inflict severe penalties for presumptive and not proved acts of conveying useful information to the enemy, and that it gave the President power to punish men on the strength of his own individual judgment. When the bill was put to the vote, the censorship section was rejected, the vote being 260 to 105. Representative Gard then introduced the following substitute:

The Espionage Bill

> During any national emergency resulting in a war in which the United States is a party, or from imminence of such war, the publication, wilfully and without proper authority, of any information relating to the national defense that is or may be useful to the enemy is hereby prohibited, and the President is hereby authorized to declare by proclamation the existence of such national emergency and is hereby authorized from time to time by proclamation to declare the character of such information which is or may be useful to the enemy, and in any prosecution hereunder the jury trying the case shall determine not only whether the defendant or defendants did wilfully and without proper authority publish the information relating to the national defense as set out in the indictment, but also whether such information was of such character as to be useful to the enemy. Provided, that nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment or criticism upon any fact or any of the acts or policies of the Government, or its representatives, or the publishing of the same. Whoever violates the foregoing provision shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than ten years, or both.

The majority believed that in this form the censorship section had lost its most objectionable features, since it provides for trial by jury and leaves the press free to publish news and to criticize the conduct of the war, although under direction from the President. Accordingly it was passed in the House by a vote of 190 to 185. There was little discussion on the other sections of the Espionage bill, and in the final vote it passed by a majority of 220 to 167. As the Espionage bill just passed by the House has a separate identity from the bill on the same subject still under consideration in the Senate, the whole bill and especially the censorship section passed by the Representatives will again be open to discussion by the Senate.

In the Senate, discussion of the Espionage bill was concerned mainly with the embargo section. For the clause reported by the Senate Interstate and Commerce Committee, the Senate substituted the following amendment which passed by a vote of 40 to 30:

> When during the pending war the President shall find that exports to a particular country are being used directly or indirectly to supply an enemy country, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States to such country except and under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

In its present form the measure gives less authority than was asked for by the Administration, for in its original draft the President was to be empowered to limit the exportations of foodstuffs, when in his judgment "public welfare or safety shall so require."

The Army Bill

Efforts were made on April 30 to unravel the parliamentary tangle in which the Army bill was involved, owing to the fact that in each house the bill as passed had a separate identity, but discussion on the matter was postponed to make way for the consideration and passage of a resolution authorizing the Government to take possession of the ninety-one Austrian and German ships in American ports, and to assume title to the same. On May 1 the Senate Army bill was again voted through in the Senate, being incorporated as an amendment to the House bill. Two slight changes were made: one in the phrasing of the prohibition clause, so as to make it incumbent on the President, and not a matter of choice, to prohibit the sale of alcoholic liquor in camps and to soldiers in uniform; the other intended to secure moral conditions in military camps. Senator La Follette proposed an amendment to submit the question of conscription to the people by a general referendum. His proposal was defeated by a vote of 68 to 4. Senator McCumber wished to offer an amendment eliminating the clause which exempts from liability to conscription members of religious organizations with creeds opposed to warfare. His proposal was rejected by a vote of 54 to 17. The bill has gone to conference, and the conferees will be informed on the attitude of the Administration.

Stringent regulations for the censorship of cable messages to be sent out of the United States, and of telegraph and telephone messages to be sent to Mexico, were published on May 1 in an executive order signed by the President. The object of the regulations is to prevent the enemies of the United States from receiving valuable information. The enforcing of these rules devolves upon the War and Navy Departments.

Food Control

Two measures concerning domestic food control were introduced into Congress during the week. The first, which was sponsored by Mr. Lever in the House and by Senator Gore in the Senate, provides for a survey of the country's food resources and for conferring authority on the Government to prevent food speculation. The second, also introduced by Mr. Lever and reported favorably to the House on May 3 by the House Agricultural Committee, has for its main provisions the following:

> To fix maximum and minimum prices for food, clothing, fuel and other necessities, and the articles required for their production. To prescribe regulations to govern the production of those commodities and if necessary to requisition the producing factories, mines or other establishments. To compel holders of necessities to release them in amounts insuring equitable distribution. To regulate exchanges in such a way as to eliminate market manipulation. To compel railroads to give preference to the movement of necessities. To levy such importation duties as are found necessary to prevent excessive "dumping" of foreign products. To impose limitations or prohibitions upon the use of grain in the manufacture of liquor. In addition the Secretary of Agriculture would be empowered to establish standard food grades, to license and control the manufacture, storage and distribution of foods, to prescribe the percentage of flour to be milled from wheat, and to regulate the mixing of wheat-flour with other flour in the making of bread and other food.

Mr. Hoover, the Chairman of the food committee of the Council of National Defense, recently returned to this country, brings with him detailed information about the food shortage in the countries at war, and also about the methods which resulted in very great waste. He declares that similar difficulties can be avoided in this country only by coordinating separate activities under one administrative head. He has been in consultation with Secretaries Baker, Lane and Houston concerning the general situation and the two bills, especially the second, just submitted to Congress.

In a conference between the Secretary of Agriculture and the representatives of the Allies, insistence was laid on the necessity of unifying the food control of Canada and the United States. One of the methods suggested and likely to be carried out is the adoption by Canada of regulations similar to those in the United States.

The Submarine Menace

Official pronouncements both in this country and abroad have made it clear that the submarine campaign now constitutes a serious danger not only to the Allies but also to the United States. Secretary Lane has made public the fact that German submarines destroyed in the last two weeks 400,000 tons of shipping. Germany, it will be remembered, built her hopes of winning the war on her ability to sink an average of 1,000,000 tons a month; at the present rate of sinkage that average has been almost reached, and there is every prospect of the figure growing larger. As a consequence, Mr. Lansing has thought it wise to enlighten the public in the following statement: "There is no use of our closing our eyes to the fact that the situation is very serious."

Up to the present Great Britain and France have failed to meet the issue adequately, and there is very little prospect of their doing so in the immediate future, for their every resource is already taxed to the utmost. The task, therefore, devolves to a large extent upon this country, and the Administration has made it clear that the United States has accepted the burden. The President and the Commissioners to the International War Council have practically completed their deliberations; and although the details of their plans have not been divulged, it is known that every effort will be made by the United States to tide the Allies over the next eight months. This is the period set by Germany for bringing the Allies to submission, and it is generally taken for granted that after that period the menace will have ceased to be serious.

Two things have to be done: to furnish the Allies with food and supplies and to drive the submarines from the sea. The former is the more pressing of the two needs, and is the immediate concern of the Administration. The plan elaborated by Mr. Balfour and the President, according to the New York Sun, involves the following items:

> Putting into the transportation service of the Entente enough tonnage to keep up the flow of supplies regardless of ships sunk; construction of wooden ships and other light craft of 2,000 or 3,000 tons at the maximum rate of speed; providing British shipyards with much-needed supplies of steel, regardless of cost and regardless of the amount kept away by the U-boats; organizing a system of food production and food transportation in the United States which will expedite at an amazing rate the inflow into Entente countries.

With a view to securing the utmost efficiency in carrying out this plan, legislation will probably be introduced into Congress in the near future which will confer upon the Government authority to nationalize shipping and shipbuilding industries as far as may be necessary to meet the present crisis. Mr. Charles W. Morse, a recognized expert on shipbuilding, is confident that the United States can build 5,000 ships within a year, with four months required for the completion of each, provided the Government will commandeer the necessary labor and materials. The investigations of the Shipping Board would indicate a lower figure as the utmost possible output. But there is confidence that the combined efforts of England, with Lloyd George's promise of 2,000,000 tons within a year, and those of Japan and China, who have also promised cooperation on a large scale, will produce ships faster than they can be sunk. There are also rumors that although this Government feels the utmost sympathy with the perilous position of Holland and the Scandinavian countries, and will do her utmost to relieve their shortage of food, insistence will be laid on the fact that assurances must be given by them that no supplies forwarded to them shall reach Germany, and that the ships belonging to these countries shall brave the submarine peril and not remain idle in port.

France.—No news in the last months has created such interest both in France and abroad as the announcement recently made that the Cabinet had decided to restore the post of Chief of Staff in the Ministry of War and had appointed General Philippe Pétain to the new position. It is remembered that when Marshal Joffre retired from the high command of the French armies on the western front General Pétain refused to accept the proffer of Joffre's place, because it did not carry with it much wider powers than Joffre had possessed. It is also known that recently when discussion was begun in the French Ministry over the matter of a change in the high command, General Pétain again insisted that he would not accept the post unless he were vested with the fullest authority. The revival of the office of Chief of Staff in the Ministry of War is therefore of the greatest military significance. It confers the highest possible honor and authority on General Pétain, without seeming to displace General Nivelle, commander of the French armies on the western front.

The New Chief of Staff

General Pétain's splendid defense of Verdun has made him extremely popular with the troops and the general public. The post just conferred upon him, a new one, which so far has not been used in France in the present war, is evidence of the esteem in which he is held. The powers of the new Chief of Staff in relation to those of General Nivelle will be as follows. General Nivelle remains the Commander in Chief of the troops fighting at the front. He will direct and execute the operations of the war on the Somme, the Aisne, in Champagne, Lorraine and Alsace. But his authority does not extend to armies now being prepared and trained in the interior, nor to the English or Italian armies. He is the executive chief of the war operations; he is not their directing head. The latter will be General Pétain. He will prepare the great operations and coordinate them with those of the Allied commanders. He will see that perfect union and contact with troops at the front and the rear be maintained and that the great transport and commissariat lines be kept open and clear. He will administer all the military resources of the country not only in the line of battle, but in the colonies also. Those who know the new Chief of Staff are convinced that he is equal to the arduous tasks and responsibilities which have been thrust upon him.

Rome.—A few days ago in St. Peter's the imposing ceremony of the beatification of the Venerable Giuseppe Cottolengo took place, thus adding another name to the long roll of the children of the Church conspicuous for their holiness, their love of God and their neighbor. At a time when works of beneficence and charity are engaging so much attention, this solemn act of the Holy Father is singularly appropriate.

The Roll of Honor

Blessed Giuseppe Cottolengo founded at Turin, in 1828, the "Little House of Divine Providence" for the relief, shelter and care of the indigent poor. The institution established by this heroic priest was appropriately named; for, devoid of temporal means and resources, its founder trusted in Providence alone to foster and further his work. Providence so visibly helped him that Pius IX called the "Little House of Providence" the "House of Miracles." It has given a home, shelter, love and affection to thousands, and, while attending to their temporal needs, has also watched even with more solicitude and care over their spiritual wants. The Little House of Providence is a work in which the inhabitants of Turin are especially interested, but owing to its wonderful growth and success, it has come to be something like a national institution of which all Italians are proud. The history of the apostle of Turin is an eloquent proof that in the cause of charity the Catholic Church is ever bringing forth the remedies needed.

If in the person of the Blessed Cottolengo, the Church puts the seal of her approval on the virtues of the active life, on the other hand she calls to the attention of the world the virtues of the hidden life in the person of the Discalced Carmelite nun, Sister Anne of St. Bartholomew, whose beatification is announced for the solemn function in St. Peter's on May 6.

After a very short interval these acts of the Holy Father were followed by another, in virtue of which, in presence of Cardinal Vico, pro-Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, of the Rev. Angelo Mariani, Promoter of the Faith, and of Alexander Verde, Secretary of the Congregation, he juridically and authoritatively pronounced on the "heroicity" of the virtues of the Venerable servant of God, Joseph Maria Pignatelli, of the Society of Jesus. The Venerable Father Pignatelli, eminent for the rare combination of the virtues of the active and contemplative life, was the link between the sons of St. Ignatius scattered by the decree of Pope Clement XIV which suppressed their Society, and the new generation of their Order which was fully restored by Pius VII. It was owing to his gentleness, prudence and patient skill that the Society of Jesus, even before the general decree of its restoration throughout the world, was recalled to Sicily, Sardinia, Naples and finally to Italy and Rome itself.

Russia.—Foreign Minister Milyukoff was the object of hostile demonstrations in Petrograd on May 3. The riot was the expression of the Socialists' dissatisfaction with the diplomatic note that the Foreign Minister had sent two days before to the representatives of foreign countries. Milyukoff said in part:

Opposition to Milyukoff

> The declaration of the Provisional Government, being imbued with the new spirit of free democracy, naturally cannot afford the least pretext for assumption that the demolition of the old structure has entailed any slackening on the part of Russia in the common struggle of all the Allies. On the contrary, the nation's determination to bring the world-war to a decisive victory has been accentuated, owing to the sense of responsibility which is shared by all in general, and each one of us in particular. This spirit has become still more active by the fact that it is concentrated on the immediate task, which touches everybody so closely, of driving back the enemy who invaded our territory. It is understood, and the annexed document so expressly states, that the Provisional Government in safeguarding the right acquired for our country will maintain a strict regard for its engagements with the allies of Russia.

The Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, who learned of this note only after it had been sent, insisted that they should have been consulted about it, charged the Minister with lacking sympathy with them and wished to know the character of Russia's "engagements" with the Allies. The Delegates were strongly opposed to furthering a war of conquest or annexation and demanded that a new note be sent to the Allies. To make it clear how dissatisfied the Delegates were with the Foreign Minister, soldiers marched through the streets of Petrograd bearing banners inscribed with demands for the resignation of Milyukoff, and even of the Provisional Government. The Minister courageously addressed the mob at midnight from the steps of the Marinsky Palace, saying:

> I declare to you that the Provisional Government and myself, as Minister of Foreign Affairs, will defend a position in which no one will dare to charge Russia with treason. Never shall Russia consent to a separate peace. The Provisional Government is a sailing vessel which can only move with the help of the wind. We look, then, for your trust, which is the wind that is to make our ship go forward. I hope you will supply us with that breeze, and that your confidence will aid us in propelling Russia towards liberty and prosperity.

Before he finished speaking the Minister had so far overcome the antagonism of the populace that they began to cheer him. The Executive Committee of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates then sat in a special session with the Council of the Provisional Government and an understanding was reached, the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates accepting the Provisional Government's explanation of the May 1 note. The Ministers said that the note, in speaking of a "decisive victory," had in view only a solution of the problems mentioned in the communication of April 9, which declared that "Free Russia does not aim at the domination of other nations or at depriving them of their national patrimony or at occupying by force foreign territories." The Delegates insisted, however, that the power in Russia rests in the hands of the workmen and soldiers.

Democracy is certainly spreading in the army. At the suggestion of the soldiers, Minister of War Guchkoff has issued an order placing all discipline in the hands of the troops. The document empowers each army corps, regiment and company to elect a special committee whose office it will be to control food supplies, take justifiable measures against abuse of power by military chiefs, settle disputes between officers and soldiers and prepare for the election of delegates to the Constituent Assembly. The order further provides that:

Democracy in the Army

> Hereafter all soldiers will be citizens of Russia. Complete religious freedom. Free speech guaranteed. Attendance at church services not compulsory. Mail from trenches shall not be censored. All mail—including pamphlets—shall be delivered to soldiers at the front. The servile "sir" abolished in replies by private soldiers to officers. Hereafter privates shall say merely "yes" or "no," without the "sir," in answering officers. Also, soldiers hereafter need not salute their officers "unless the soldier wishes." Privates, however, must come to "attention" when commanded to do so. Corporal punishment in the army completely abolished.

An alliance of military and naval officers has been formed in Petrograd to assist in organizing the army on a new basis.

Luther and Lying

HERBERT THURSTON, S.J.

THAT Luther was guilty of many conspicuous faults of taste and temper is admitted by his most ardent admirers. But a more delicate point which has been much discussed of recent years is the question of his intellectual honesty. Was he a truthful man? The work "Luther und Luthertum" published in 1904 by Father Denifle seems to have been written with the direct purpose of answering this question in the negative. The distinguished Dominican made out a very damaging case and the vehement outcry raised by the divines of the Fatherland showed plainly enough that the blow had got home in a sensitive spot. Probably, however, it should be admitted that Denifle did sometimes press the charge of conscious deception too far, and it is to be noted that the rather uncompromising language used was in a good many instances quietly modified in the second edition. But the Lutheran defense, even as represented in Köhler's "Luther und die Lüge," is a weak one. It rests for the most part upon such pleas as that the charge of conscious perversion of the truth has not been made out, or that Luther merely echoed the calumnies of others, or that his recollection of his early life had grown blurred and indistinct. We may remember the usurper in "The Tempest"

> Who having unto truth by telling of it
> Made such a sinner of his memory
> To credit his own lie, he did believe
> He was indeed the Duke.

So the Wittenberg professor seems by degrees to have persuaded himself into a view of many incidents in his past history which is demonstrably in contradiction with the ascertained facts. Such, for example, is the account he gave of the Bible, as a book practically unknown to his student contemporaries; such again, the story of his discovery of the real meaning of "the justice of God" (Rom. i:17), a meaning, as he afterwards untruly alleged, which contradicted the teaching of all the scholastic doctors; such, his assertions regarding the value set upon the vows of religion apart from belief in Christ; such again, the exaggeration of his numberless diatribes against the vice and profanity which reigned at the Papal court. Of course when Luther declared that in Rome Masses were said with such scandalous haste that ten in succession occupied less than an hour, he may not altogether have intended his hearers to take him seriously. But he also knew that some of them did take such utterances seriously and he was quite willing that the cause of the Evangel should be promoted by these extravagances.

Moreover, statements of fact represent only one class of the prevarications with which the Reformer stands charged. He is accused of garbling texts and of falsifying his translations, the most famous examples being the insertion of the word "alone" in Rom. iii:28: "Man is justified by faith alone without the works of the law." It is asserted also that he taught very lax doctrine when formally discussing the permissibility of lies of excuse, and he certainly made no scruple about circulating calumnies against his opponents, though he had made no attempt to verify the reports. Whatever may be the weight of each of these counts taken singly, in the bulk they leave a decidedly unfavorable impression, and the laborious vindications of such writers as Sodeur, Walther or Köhler somehow make the reader feel that a cause which requires so much explanation and apology cannot be fundamentally a sound one. But it is impossible to discuss the details here, and even the well-known case of the bigamy of Philip of Hesse, in which Luther avowedly recommended the Landgrave to conceal the fact by "a good round lie," is too complicated for summary statement. Suffice it to note that such ardent American panegyrists as Dr. P. Smith and Professor McGiffert, after much setting forth of extenuating circumstances, come round in the end to the frank admission that the incident was "the greatest blot" on Luther's career.

But difficulties similar in kind meet us at every turn. Let us take, for example, an instance, hardly noticed by either Denifle or Grisar, from Luther's relations with Henry VIII. The English King in 1521 attacked Luther's sacramental doctrine by the publication of his "Assertio," which won him the title of "Defender of the Faith." Luther had the book in June, 1522, and published two pamphlets in reply, one in German, and the other, more copious and argumentative, in Latin. The former appeared in July, the latter in November. The language of both is characteristically violent. Luther calls the English king blasphemer, blockhead, hypocrite, slanderer, babbler, sacrilegious robber, wretched scribbler (miserabilis librifex), monster of folly, chosen vessel of Satan; he ranks him among asses and Thomistical swine, among the dregs, filth and offscourings of impious and sacrilegious men, he makes him creep and snore and vomit and belch and drivel, and with an audacity almost sublime, he winds up his Latin pamphlet by claiming credit for "abstaining from the virulence and lies of which the King's book is full." Two years later, however, the Reformer was told that Henry's allegiance to Catholicism was shaken. Hoping to gain a convert for the cause of the "New Learning" he accordingly wrote to Henry expressing regret for the "pamphlet which I published foolishly and precipitately, not of my own motion but at the behest of certain men who were not your Majesty's friends"; and adding: "If your Serene Majesty wishes me to recant publicly and write in honor of your Majesty, you will graciously signify your wish to me and I will gladly do so?"

Now if we may call things by their names, the excuses thus made are simply untrue. It is an obvious case of the common or garden lie of convenience. We need not profess to be horrified, Luther had been equally disingenuous in his dealings with Leo X, but this is just the sort of insincerity to which the man of high principle will not stoop, though the unscrupulous partisan thinks nothing of it. It was not true that Luther had published his pamphlets against Henry precipitately. Upon the Latin edition, the only one circulating outside of Germany, he had spent no less than five months. Again, while it is of course possible that friends may have encouraged him in this onslaught, it is certain both from the nature of the work and from his surviving correspondence that his heart was thoroughly in the task before him. To represent himself as having written at the behest of others was a flagrant insincerity. As Dr. P. Smith (English Historical Review, xxv, 662) remarks in reference to this incident: "Although Luther was certainly sincere in his wish for reconciliation, one can hardly blame Henry for regarding the letter as a piece of artful hypocrisy."

Equally characteristic of the Reformer were the calumnies he retailed about all whom he regarded as enemies. Henry he accused of stealing the crown of England by murder; of Tetzel he declared with equal untruth that he had been sentenced to death by the Emperor Maximilian for gross immorality; of Erasmus he pretended, though he had reason to know the contrary, that he died the death of an unbeliever; of Sir Thomas More, one of the noblest characters of that or any other age, Luther did not scruple to say: "He was not executed for the Gospel's sake, but that he was a cruel tyrant who shed the blood of many innocent Christians whom he tortured in prison with strange instruments." There is a widely prevalent opinion, among historians, however, that the martyred More was the gentlest of men.

The general conclusion must be that Luther was a man to whom the idea of truth for truth's sake meant nothing at all. He may not have set out deliberately to deceive, but the mood, or often enough the fierce passion, of the moment habitually distorted his perceptions and warped his judgment. At the time of his marriage Luther, writing to different correspondents, gave seven different reasons for the step he had taken. To one he declared that he had married because his father wished it, to another he explained that he wanted to put an end to certain gossip, to a third he described his nuptials as due to pity for the forlorn situation of Catherine Bora, and so on. Of course a man's action may often be determined by a mixture of motives, but the conscientiously truthful person detects this and says so. The laxer moralist gives the first plausible reason that comes into his head. In this matter again Luther bore a curious resemblance to that modern heresiarch, Mrs. Eddy, the foundress of Christian Science. Both alike illustrated that type of character which without being designedly untruthful is entirely reckless of truth. They were too self-absorbed, too much in the grip of the storm of feeling which possessed them at the moment to scrutinize the data of memory or to weigh the consequences which might be deduced from what they said. The mere fact that some episode of past history was felt to be antagonistic to present feeling, for example Mrs. Eddy's early indebtedness to Dr. Quimby, or Luther's religious outlook under monasticism, was enough to obliterate the past from their memory. Any reminder of these forgotten years was brushed aside as an impertinent intrusion, something utterly insignificant beside the business of the moment and above all, beside the new revelation which they regarded as their own creation and handiwork. One may explain such temperaments, but one does not trust them. It is not to a character of this type that we can look for guidance in the supreme problems of faith and morality.

Pan-Slavism and Rome

George Calavassy

CATHOLICS may be excused if they welcomed the news of the overthrow of the autocratic and persecuting power of the imperial Russian Government. For the revolution of a few weeks ago has given liberty of conscience to the whole Russian people and deprived the Holy Synod, the highest religious tribunal in the country, of the opportunity of imposing its dogmas upon millions of unwilling people. And if press reports are to be believed, the new Government has given proof that it intends to put into practice the promises which it made in regard to freedom of conscience, by liberating from his long captivity the exiled and imprisoned Ruthenian Archbishop of Lemberg. With these facts before us, the following bit of history will not be untimely.

At the end of the eighteenth century Poland was partitioned among the three great Powers—Austria, Prussia and Russia. The majority of the Ruthenian Catholics were thus brought under the Russian yoke. A methodical persecution begun by Catherine I, and continued in the most barbarous and cruel fashion by Nicholas I, effected, in appearance at least, the desired end, the Russification of the Ruthenians dwelling within the boundaries of the Muscovite Empire. After the Russian Government had suppressed the sees of all Catholic bishops and had done away with all those members of the clergy who had remained faithful to Rome, it formally announced the incorporation of the Ruthenians into the official Orthodox Russian Church. Thirty-eight years have elapsed since the last Catholic see united to Rome, that of Chelm, was suppressed. In spite of this, more than 15,000,000 faithful Catholics, officially considered as members of the Orthodox Russian Church, remain faithful to the cause of union with Rome and are only awaiting the favorable moment to prove their loyalty and fidelity to the Faith. When in 1905 Nicholas II, forced to it by the threat of a coming revolution, published a ukase of tolerance, almost 1,000,000 of these unfortunate Ruthenians openly declared themselves Catholics. But a counter-order issued under the influence of the Holy Synod suddenly put a stop to this movement back to the old beliefs and religious practices. Catholics were evidently not to be included within the scope of the imperial edict of tolerance. Let us hope that the tolerance to Catholics proclaimed today will be real and that it will last.

The recent proclamation of religious liberty will [illegible] the most important results in Russia itself, where for a long time men have been turning their eyes [illegible] and have felt the need of a closer bond with the nations of the West and their civilization. The act will not fail to have the most salutary effect outside of Russia also. That great movement known as "Pan-Slavism" has long been making use of the Russian Church as a means of influencing and mastering all those who in some form or other adhere to the Orthodox Russian Church. Slav States like Serbia, Montenegro and Bulgaria have long felt the weight of the iron hand of Russia. We need not go far to find the principal and determining motive which urged Bulgaria to join the Central Powers in the present conflict. It was the hope that she would thus escape Russia's grip tightening around her. It is not the first time that the Bulgarians have thus attempted to emancipate themselves from the yoke. When just a half century ago, the Bulgarians asserted their independence of the schismatical Patriarch of Constantinople, a large number among them turned their eyes to Rome. Yielding to their prayers, Pius IX in person consecrated the first Uniat Archbishop of Bulgaria, Mgr. Sokolski. The Archbishop had a few thousand followers and it was hoped, not without some foundation, that the whole nation would soon follow the example thus given. But the Holy Synod was watching over the interests of the Orthodox Church. The Russian Government interfered, put a stop to the movement, and did away with the Uniat Archbishop, of whom no trace has since been found. But many sturdy Bulgarians remained faithful to Rome.

If it is probable that the victory of the Central Empires might lead the Bulgarians back to the bosom of the Catholic Church; it is not improbable on the other hand, that in case of a victory of the Allies, the Bulgarian Government, in the supposition that Bulgaria would still be left independent, would take every possible advantage of the separation of Church and State in Russia, and hence of the impotence and powerlessness of the Holy Synod, to urge the whole nation towards Catholicism, in order to find some protection against the conqueror.

Pan-Slavism was not limited to Slav kingdoms. It found energetic champions in the Turkish Empire. Constantinople, Mount Athos, and Jerusalem were its centers. Russia had already acquired a great influence over the Patriarchiates of Jerusalem and Antioch. Russian gold often smoothed out all difficulties in the way, and Catholics naturally felt the disastrous consequences of Russian influence. This was more particularly the case after the infidel French Government decided to abandon its protectorate over the Catholic missions. This policy was the signal for the more fanatical among the schismatics to enter upon a period of petty annoyances and at times of downright persecution of the Catholics in the East.

When at the beginning of the war, the news spread that Constantinople was to be Russia's prize, the tidings caused no small alarm among all those who are interested in the fate of these missions. Even those who sympathized with the Entente must have shrunk from the prospects of a victory destined to ruin the missions. On the other hand, the recent revolution in Russia inspires hope, for it will have a favorable effect on the cause of Catholicism both in Russia and in the Balkan States. The Greek Patriarch of Constantinople has already lost two-thirds of his metropolitan and episcopal sees of former times. If he wishes to recover his former glory there is but one means for him to do so. He must once more be united with the See of Rome and the Supreme Pontiff of Christendom, the center and the source of all spiritual power.

The revolution in Greece has not been inspired by the same motives as in Russia. Nevertheless it would not be astonishing were it, to produce similar effects from the religious point of view, especially if Venizelos were to return to power.

These are the circumstances which Providence has deemed favorable for the undertaking of a great work in the East. Already Leo XIII had realized that in order to effect the reunion of the Greeks with Rome, the Greeks had to be reached by a closer contact with the people. Prejudices had to be done away with, suspicions removed, the jealousies and fanaticism which Greek schismatical leaders had long entertained against Rome had to be rooted out. To accomplish this Catholic communities of the Greek rite had to be formed. With this end in view, Leo XIII sent the French Assumptionist Fathers to Constantinople with the permission to adopt the Greek rite in case they should not find native Catholic priests of this rite. Ten years later a member of a community of native Catholic missionaries of the same rite saw one of its priests cruelly tortured by the schismatics and almost done to death. In a letter to this valiant champion of the Faith, Pius X, after congratulating him on his heroism, assured him that the blood which he had shed in such a noble cause would undoubtedly produce the most abundant fruits. A year later the same generous missionary, Isaias Papadopoulos, was consecrated bishop to bring to completion the structure whose foundation stones he had watered with his blood.

When conceiving the idea of founding a Greek Catholic community at Constantinople, Leo XIII had the intention of making it the see of a Catholic patriarch with jurisdiction over the Balkans and Asia Minor. The stirring events now going on may render the measure useless. Meanwhile the jurisdiction of Bishop Papadopoulos is more extensive than that of the schismatical Patriarch of Constantinople. It embraces Thrace, Macedonia and a large portion of Asia Minor. Great good is being done, conversions are becoming more and more numerous every day, and if the number is not larger it is because the means, especially missionaries and priests, are wanting. Sometimes a single priest has to attend to several villages far apart and almost without any means of access or communication. Yet in spite of persecution and trial the work is going on. There are undoubtedly many obstacles and difficulties. But the mere thought that a hundred million souls might again return to the unity of the Faith should fill all generous Catholics with the deepest consolation and joy and at the same time urge them to make the greatest sacrifices to bring about that happy result.

Above everything else missionaries are needed for the work. Even if the Greeks were again to be reunited to Rome, little can be expected for the spiritual good of their flocks from the schismatical clergy, who for the most part are ignorant and incompetent. The very fact that the Congregation of the Propaganda makes an appeal to the charity of Catholics and asks them to forward this noble undertaking by building churches and schools and founding a seminary, and that the Holy Father himself takes such an interest in it proves the importance of the work.

But there must be no illusion or mistake. Reunion will not be accomplished in a day or a year; schism has still its stanch defenders. Time, labor, prayer and patience will be needed. And if Catholics are wise, they will make use of the peculiar situation which undoubtedly will be created after the war. Strange as it may seem, the war may bring about the realization of a wish and prayer which the Church has long entertained, that of the return to the unity of the Faith of so many of her children who have been led away from her fold. Terrible as this war is, which has caused so many tears, so much sorrow, so much blood, if one of the consequences, little dreamed of no doubt by those who criminally brought it about, were to be the return to the bosom of the Church of whole nations which in olden days were the fairest dower of the Bride of Christ, it might well be an occasion to exclaim, "O felix culpa." Such a result would be some compensation for all the war's sorrows and heart-breaking tragedies.

The French Clergy and the War

BARBARA DE COURSON

MUCH has been said and written of the admirable attitude of our soldier-priests who have proved themselves excellent fighting men, simply because devotion to duty and readiness to sacrifice all that men value, lie at the root of their spiritual training, but in posts less tragically prominent, other priests have bravely faced a tremendous problem and have shown themselves nobly patriotic and devoted. So striking indeed is their attitude that it has alarmed the suspicious anti-clericals who are now doing their best to minimize the priests' influence. These irreconcilable enemies of the Faith represent the small minority that holds the reins of government. They have been the bane of France for the last half-century, and now their evil prejudices, consciously or not, serve the interests of the enemy. M. Maurice Barrès and other well-known writers, alluding to their sectarian attitude, openly state their belief that the Germans, who desire, above all things, to divide the French people in order to diminish its strength, secretly support those manifestations of anti-clericalism in which our officials still indulge. One of these manifestations took the shape of what M. Barrès calls the "shameless report," "la rumeur infâme," which accused the clergy of having encouraged the war, on the one hand, and, on the other, of having shirked its dangers.

It seems strange that a report so absurd should make its way, in the face of crushing facts, all pointing to the very opposite conclusion. But in times of turmoil and strain, one must be prepared for surprises. Such a report, therefore, although deserving of contempt, calls for a refutation.

A booklet written by a distinguished scholar is before me. It gives an admirable summary of the patriotic services rendered by the French clergy, during thirty months of unprecedented suffering. The priests of France have been faithful to the program which, as far back as 1914, was given to them by the Bishop of Viviers, who told them that the mission of the clergy might be summed up in these words: "They must hearten their flocks for the struggle and encourage them in their sorrows." The Bishops in their pastoral letters, the parish priests in their spoken and written words, have never ceased to preach courage, patience and prayer to their afflicted people. In August, 1914, a German general condemned the Curé of Pilon, on the Meuse, to be shot. "I know," he said, "that you have not fired on our troops, but nevertheless you represent the soul of the resistance made against them": "l'âme de la résistance." The words correctly describe the part played by priests, who were too old to be affected by the law which summoned their younger brethren to the colors.

The Bishops of sees, either invaded or partially destroyed by the enemy, men like Mgr. Turinaz at Nancy, Cardinal Luçon at Reims, Mgr. Tessier at Chalons, Mgr. Marbeau at Meaux, Mgr. Lobbedey at Arras, shared the dangers of their flock and never ceased to relieve their sufferings. Those of the regions long held by the enemy, Mgr. Chollet at Cambrai and Mgr. Charost at Lille, have had a more delicate and difficult part to play, that of acting as the defenders of their captive and afflicted people. The accounts which reach us prove that their calm firmness has, in many cases, happily influenced the attitude of the German invaders.

The Bishops of the interior districts have been less sorely tried, but in proportion to the demands made upon them, they too have been angels of strength and consolation. From the outset many of them took the lead in the relief work organized for the benefit of the victims of the war, especially for the orphans, whose spiritual and moral welfare must be protected against the monopoly of the State.

The Archbishop of Paris and many other bishops, by placing themselves at the head of works founded for the benefit of these little ones, are safeguarding their Christian education. At Grenoble, Mgr. Maurin, now appointed Archbishop of Lyons, was moved by the sad plight of many women whom the war had deprived of their usual employment, gave up part of his house to serve as a work-room and paid them for the clothes they made for the soldiers and refugees. The Bishop of Verdun assiduously visits the exiles from his diocese, now scattered far and wide, and collects alms for these ruined people. Mgr. Guillet, Bishop of Limoges, welcomed the refugees from the North as his children, and even founded a paper, the Refugee's Friend, to console and help them. The Bishop of Soissons has organized permanent works of assistance for his much-tried flock. Many dioceses, under the direction of their Bishops, have sent money, clothes, food, medicines to the soldiers at the front. The diocese of Quimper, by no means a wealthy district, sent 19,459 francs in the space of a year; Limoges, in the same period of time, forwarded 20,529 pairs of socks, 4,000 tubes of iodine, 222 kilos of chocolate, besides many other gifts. The diocese of Versailles, between August 1914, and August 1915, sent 300,000 francs' worth of useful articles. These gifts do not, by any means, represent even a small portion of the presents forwarded to the front. They merely give a few instances of the generous impulse, due to the personal action and initiative of our Bishops.

With the same self-sacrificing patriotism, the Bishops put their colleges and seminaries at the disposal of the different Red Cross associations, for the use of the wounded fighting men. Some of these buildings were, of course, commandeered by the military service de la santé, but many more were offered as a free contribution. In the diocese of Orléans, it is interesting to notice that in November, 1916, thirty-three buildings belonging to Catholics were serving as hospitals, whereas only eleven public buildings, were employed for the same purpose.

When the French people were requested to give their gold, in exchange for paper money, and to subscribe to the national loan, Cardinal Amette, in the name of the French Episcopate, urged the Faithful to give a patriotic example and to bring their gold to the banks. The Bishops followed his lead. They represented that the giving of their gold to their country was a patriotic duty and that Catholics were bound to set an example. In many places the curés were chosen to receive the gold. "France," wrote the Bishop of Meaux, "can always count on her priests to give an example of patriotism." In the single diocese of Versailles, 800,000 francs passed through the hands of the priests alone. In a working suburb of Paris, the curé, who is a well-known popular writer, made an appeal from the pulpit to his people; they responded by bringing him 300,000 francs in gold.

The directors of many local banks and the prefects of certain départements fully recognized the generosity with which the priests used their influence to support the Government's request for gold and on November 9, 1916, M. Ribot in the French Chamber publicly praised the spontaneous and energetic action of the French clergy. For once, the majority of the Chamber applauded these words and deigned to recognize the services rendered to the country by the curés.

A subject so vast as the part played by the priests of France during the war must suffer from such a brief treatment, but enough has been said to show that our clergy has lived up to the stern duty entailed by an ordeal that has now lasted nearly three years. While the soldier priests on the fighting line are laying down their lives in a spirit of martyrdom, their brethren at home are doing double work to fill the empty places, besides lending themselves with cherful good will to all those noble tasks that promote the honor of God and the welfare of the country.

The Foundation of Patriotism

J. Harding Fisher, S.J.

PATRIOTISM is love of country, expressed in spontaneous emotion and stern fulfilment of duty. On its emotional side it means those feelings of affection for the land of birth or adoption, which spring up unbidden in the human heart, rousing a man to indignation when his native land suffers insult or injury, and filling him with pride and joy in its present and past glorious achievements. Patriotism means attachment, taken for granted at home and accentuated abroad, to the skies, plains, mountains and streams, that gave us our first welcome into the world and cheered us in time of trial. It necessarily supposes a particular part of the world, towards which the patriot's heart turns naturally and affectionately, a land which is pictured in his imagination when he thinks of home, and often perhaps for which, in spite of himself and in spite of itself, he cherishes an instinctive and ineradicable love.

The root of patriotism is in the soil, but its flower is in nationality purified and elevated by religion. It is concerned with a definite, restricted portion of the human family, with which kinship is claimed in habitation, language, customs, traditions, laws, history and aspiration, and with which man claims and acknowledges sympathy in the general community of nationalities. These two elements, love of the land and love of the people, two loves which the exile carries with him to the ends of the earth, and which make him homesick for the "old sod" and the old people, are the basis of the emotional side of patriotism and are so intimately united that they almost defy analysis.

On its rational side patriotism is the conscious recognition of those obligations which spring from the relation of sonship that exists between the citizen and the State. As God is the Father of all men, as the Church is the mother of all Christians, as the heads of the family are the parents of the children in the home, so is the State the universal parent of all who are bound to her allegiance. That the State possesses a very real kind of parentage is clear from the fact that in every civilized language there is a term, consecrated by general and acknowledged usage, to express such a relation. No one feels the least surprise, when a State addresses her members as sons and daughters; and it is obvious that there is and should be a sharp line of distinction between aliens and citizens, implying the existence of rights and duties in the latter not found in the former. This general usage is based on a fact in nature, otherwise it would not be universal. A moral union, similar to that which binds together the family, exists between the State and its members; and the head of this moral union is the Government. As the parent confers sonship, so the State bestows civil life on her citizens; and in the one case as in the other, the method is the same: that is, either by birth or adoption.

There is another sense in which the functions of parentage are attributed to the State. It does not indeed give the fundamental gift of human life, but once that life has been given, the State begins to aid the parent in the discharge of his duties. It is incumbent on the State to help educate the child, though not directly and exclusively, for education is the primary intrinsic purpose of parental authority. Nevertheless in the matter of education, the State, although it has no right to invade the sphere of parental authority, has the right and the duty to supplement it, by safeguarding and facilitating education and providing those means without which education would be impossible.

In other matters which concern the welfare of its citizens the State has a primary function. Its proper purpose is to foster the life of its members, and by careful, continued action to enable them to fulfil their earthly destiny in a worthy manner. The State, without infringing on inalienable rights, should help its citizens to reach physical, mental and moral maturity and perfection, coordinating various human activities so as to render possible the realization of legitimate social impulses and desires, affording citizens assistance and protection in the pursuit of temporal goods and happiness, and securing to them against aggression, both foreign and domestic, the peaceful possession and enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty and temporal well-being.

These functions are clearly analogous to the duties of parentage; and the consequence is that it is the settled conviction of every civilized man that the State is rightly called and should be considered the Fatherland. Just as the son, precisely because he is a son, feels himself a member of the family and looks to his father for assistance, so the citizen realizes the dignity and the privileges of his citizenship and has a well-grounded confidence that wherever he goes his flag affords him protection, and that in the defense of his just rights his country will employ, if necessary, the entire resources of the State.

Now parentage is a mutual relation. Paternity is unthinkable without offspring. The father connotes the child. The parent has duties, so too have the sons and daughters. As there exists in the parent an exalted form of altruistic love for the child, so there exists in the child a responsive love for the parent. The same is true of the State and the citizen. And it is precisely in this responsive devotion to the State on the part of its citizens that patriotism consists.

Further, the very fact that benefits have been received lays the beneficiary under obligations to do good to the benefactor. Man, therefore, is under a strict obligation of making return to God, parents, and the State, each in their kind and degree; for from each of these three he has received the priceless gift of life. And because this obligation imposes duties that call for continuous service and at times heroic sacrifices, God infuses into the soul with sanctifying grace moral virtues whose function it is to facilitate their fulfilment.

Thus, religion is a moral virtue which enables man rightly to discharge his debt to God; piety, not in the modern current sense but in the technical signification employed in the classic expression "pius Aenèas," is a moral virtue closely akin to religion but distinguished from it, which enables man to perform properly his duties towards parents and the State. It would seem at first sight that in all three cases the virtue should be that of justice; but this is not the case, for justice is concerned with the payment of debts which it is the power of the beneficiary to pay in full, whereas the debt under which a man lies with regard to the three authors of his being is so great as to be beyond the possibility of payment. Hence it is that as all three have given him life, all three have the right to demand, in case of urgent need, every sacrifice, even that of life itself.

Such is the doctrine of the Catholic Church. In every land and in every crisis her voice has rung true. An example in point may be taken from the October number of Brownson's Quarterly Review for 1861, in which the distinguished Catholic editor at the time of the Civil War wrote as follows:

> We have from the first maintained, and with the fullest approbation of the Catholic authorities in this country, that Catholic morality enjoins upon all Catholics, whatever their rank or dignity, to be loyal to the legitimate Government of their country, and be ready to defend it, when called upon, at the sacrifice of their property, and even of their lives.

Patriotism is one of the elemental things, and therefore is easily recognizable. The counterfeit cannot long pass for the real. The tests are simple, a child can apply them. The sentimental side, it is true, may be open to deception, for tender feelings cost little; they are a question of temperament. But regarding its practical manifestations, there can be no doubt. In general it may be said that its intensity is in direct proportion to the narrowness of the ethnological limits within which it has its play, the closeness of blood relationship it implies, the community of interests it represents; but in the case of the individual its sincerity may be measured by the magnitude and the number of sacrifices he is willing to make. Patriotism is love, and the standard by which it is to be judged is deeds. The most obvious of the tests of a man's love for his country is his readiness to hearken to the call of duty, to submerge personal and domestic interests in the larger interests of the State.

The Odd Spring Drama

JOHN B. KENNEDY

THE rather pedantic art of the Washington Square Players of New York is not an innovation in metropolitan dramatic life, for ever since the public gave its approval to the ordinary there have been artists who strive to gain support for the odd. Its usual dramatic vehicle is the one-act play, perhaps because it is erroneously supposed that an average audience can relish art only in small doses. A few seasons back an attempt was made to translate the Parisian Grand Guignol into New York and Chicago, and gems like "Any Night" and "Fancy Free," mere tabloid obscenities, were presented to the public and reviewed by the police. The promoters of this enterprise overlooked the important fact that New York's theatrical temperament is better described as colic than Gallic. However, one result of the experiment was the inspiration of a lot of learned young men and otherwise amiable young women to produce a myriad of gasping playlets, some of which have been made public, the great majority living and dying over the cruets of Bohemian tables d'hôtes.

The one-act play is a legitimate byway of expression and in the hands of a genius can be made singularly effective. Take "Fear" as an instance. But its brevity is its chief technical handicap, often leading the author to a crude distortion of truth in order to obviate the inevitable "punch." Yet there is a service that can be well rendered by the one-act play. In the form of a skilfully-laid mosaic it can provide a tolerably complete picture of racial character. The Negro Players of New York have approached this desirable effect. Hitherto it had been popularly believed that negro histrionic talent was limited to buck and wing dances with variations on the saxophone, although there have always been students of the race who appreciated its genuine vocal and dramatic abilities. The work of the Negro Players gives what will doubtless be fresh knowledge to many. In "The Rider of Dreams" we learn that two centuries and more of social bondage have not eradicated the Afric romance from the negro soul. Prester John is an underlying hint in negro fantasy, and although the rider was not particularly lofty in his dreams, his ideal of existence was something better than etherialized laziness; it was to achieve poetry without the dubious pleasure of poetic pain.

Probably it is asking too much that good dramatists give us more than good drama. From playwriters who are nothing more than clever we expect nothing better than clever plays. But when a man is philosopher enough to understand the spiritual motions of his kind, and when he has the God-given faculty of expressing those motions, he should remember that a law somewhat higher than that of art obliges him to publish the moral as well as the message of his realism. Until the Negro Players or any similar organization add to our moral and spiritual assets they are not fully justifying their existence. They who cry out "art for art's sake" may sincerely differ, but one who earns a living by his art should not decline to teach a moral lesson through it.

The quest of the odd that gave us the abortive Grand Guignol translation, the Washington Square Players and the Negro Players, among other more mechanical eccentricities, is responsible, no doubt, for "Grasshopper," which purports to be an Irish play. There is excellent brogue in Grasshopper and some Celtic poetry in its lines. The scene is a true reproduction of the Irish country; but as genre the picture is false. It will be recalled that "A Playboy of the Western World" contained laughingly beautiful dialogue and that its actors were remarkably able; but the storm of protest that greeted its tour, if a trifle too robust, was well founded. The "Playboy" certainly led those of neutral attitude towards Ireland to the conclusion that the men of rural Ireland were merciless, if merry, sots. This presentation of Irishmen in their cups which seems to be a stock situation of the drama written by certain Irishmen would go by unmolested, were it true to life. But even if we do not pause to compare Irish alcoholism with British alcoholism, a comparison much in favor of the former, particularly when England's heavy hand in Irish affairs is pondered, and, for the sake of brevity, admit that the portraits of insobriety are true to Irish life, these portraits are still vicious, because they present a wretched effect without so much as a hint of its cruel cause. They impress the unbiased viewer with the utter squalor of Irish poverty, but they fail to define that poverty as the bitter fruit of a foreign seed. It is as sinful for an Irishman to depict his own kind as irredeemable topers as it would be for an American to wrench Benedict Arnold from his context in the history of the Revolution and proffer him as an exemplar of American initiative.

It is to be regretted that a reputable Irish poet is co-author of "Grasshopper." Whether by artistic error or not he subscribes to the calumny that an Irish peasant lass, fooled by a preposterous philanderer, commits suicide! They may do these things in Japan, but never in Ireland. Mr. Colum has rendered too much tribute to the Caesar of dramatic climax. The question arises: Why cannot these Irish poets who love Ireland propagate that love by true drama? The man who wrote "Thomas Muskerry" should know that "Grasshopper" is distasteful to those who are most generous with moral and financial support for maltreated Ireland. Turbulent operas of Irish theme and melodies are far more acceptable than the counterfeit canvases of the ultra-artistic painters of Irish life and manners.

Another result of the quest for the odd is "The Willow Tree," a play founded upon a pagan myth, and, chiefly because of its foundation, described as "charming." It might have been written by a lay recruiting sergeant, so gentle are its words and so obstreperous its purpose. In "Out There" we are confronted with the same non-American theme, the "slacker." These London sentimentalities will surely find no welcome outside of cosmopolitan New York. The word slacker and the character it describes fits no American part, unless it be that played by the estimable ladies who contend that the sacredness of motherhood is merely a matter of taste. This leads to the reflection that one notable result of the war is the swelling of the ranks of American actors by Englishmen who are touchingly modest in their estimates of the value of their personal services to the English Government in this day of strained national resources.

Sir Herbert Tree's rendition of "Colonel Newcome" has decided merits, although the average playgoer attaches more importance to the actor's knighthood than to his nuance. It requires no mean degree of literary bravery for a dramatist to recast a classical novel of length, and the only artistic reward for this bravery is the benumbing labor of the exploit. An intelligent reader can derive great pleasure from a dramatized or picturized version of a favorite story, although the redactions are seldom adequate. Yet the substance of the old stories is so superior to that of the new, whatever may be the degree of progress made in form, that their adaptation in plays and films deserves encouragement.

What with "Nju" (call it "new," the press artist requests) and "The Brat," the odd is well emphasized in current dramatic offerings. Perhaps it suffices to name the first a Russian tragedy and to bless our Constitution that Russian psychology had no part in its framing, for the pursuit of happiness, according to the dramatists, is anything but a popular sport in the ex-Empire. The next crop of Russian drama should be more cheerful. In "The Brat," a trite theme, the beggar-girl and the prince, is cleverly if audaciously coated. "The Very Minute" is a partially successful attempt to attack alcohol without the aid of melodrama, despite the fact that the sudden death which closes the play has the flavor of a cinema-moment. Some good moral rebukes are administered to the drunkard by his psycho-pathological uncle, and apart from a few flaws in the philosophy and rhetoric of the dialogue the play's sermon is apt. It is without sex emphasis, hence of merit. "Bosom Friends" is a vehicle for introducing a group of well-known performers and "Our Betters" has the distinction of being one of the very few imported plays by reputable playwrights that can be classed with the bald and degenerate type of domestic pseudo-satire.

The blanket moral deducible from the latest drama is that while the dramatists enthusiastically endorse the maxim that honesty is the best policy they are loth to present it as the necessary hinge of social comity and personal reform.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The editorial "Let Them Get Acquainted," in AMERICA for April 28 is a probe applied directly to a festering wound, and one which has received altogether too much discussion in theory and too little consideration in action. AMERICA seems to approve of Mr. Spearman's ideas on mixed marriages, and if this is the case AMERICA is in my opinion right. Now the situation is this: AMERICA stands forth as the representative of a very powerful educational organization in the Church; AMERICA has approved of a certain theory; now let us see if the Jesuits are going to do anything about it. The editorial in question is fine, but it is only talk; we need action. Until the body of educators, for which AMERICA speaks sees fit to follow out these ideas in practice they may talk all they wish about them. Meanwhile we want "less noise and more action."

New York. AGNES MARY RICHERDSON.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Catholic academies and colleges for young women which refuse to permit their students to take advantage of suitable opportunities to meet Catholic young men are fostermothers of mixed marriages, and your April 28 editorial, "Let Them Get Acquainted," might well be made the subject of meditation in many such an institution.

One of our largest Catholic universities is almost on the same campus with a Catholic college and academy for women, yet the myopic policy of the latter will not so much as permit a student at the university who has a sister at the college to take his best friend to call on her, though it be Sunday afternoon and the reception room flanked with chaperons. "Altar-talks on the peril of mixed marriages" no doubt serve a useful purpose, but the surest way to eradicate an evil is to remove its cause. If the Catholic college man be given opportunities to meet the Catholic college woman he will not need to be told that he ought not to marry a Protestant or an infidel.

A Chinese Mission

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I wonder if your readers would be interested in the workings of a distant mission in China, under the charge of the Sisters of the Immaculate Conception. Here in Canton we are devoting ourselves to the care of orphans, lepers, the aged and foundlings, and to the preparation of Chinese maidens for a share in the work of converting their countrywomen. The maidens come to us to be prepared for the religious life. After a period of instruction and training they are allowed to take vows and adopt a rule of religious life, and then they go back to the missions from which they have come, veritable apostles. They assemble the women and children and teach them catechism, and prove themselves invaluable auxiliaries of the missionaries, because they can reach those members of the flock who, on account of the custom of the country, which insists on a sharp line of separation between the sexes, must remain to a marked degree outside of the sphere of sacerdotal influence.

The orphans come to us under conditions which would move hearts of stone. The lot of orphans is always sad, and it is especially so here in China. All the solicitude of the nuns cannot wholly fill the void in their unfortunate lives nor satisfy their hunger for parental love. When they attain the age of eighteen or twenty years, they are at liberty to choose their state of life. Should any feel drawn to the religious state they are allowed to join the band of virgins spoken of above; those who select the married state are wedded to young Christians.

The aged women are still with us, but as the Little Sisters of the Poor have come to exercise their charity in their beloved field of labor, they belong to a passing category. They are truly attached to us and are grateful for the care we give them and for the childish happiness which we have been able to bring into their lives. They are eager to render us any little service that their infirm health permits. At Shek-Lung, near Canton, our Sisters have charge of an island in which there are about 240 lepers. Isolated from all that they hold dear, and tormented not only by excruciating suffering, but also by the loathsomeness of their disease, they are being taught to know and love God and to await in patience their entrance into that kingdom where suffering shall be no more.

As to the foundlings, about one-fourth of the number are brought to us by women who make a livelihood by the traffic. They seek them in the open fields, along the banks of rivers, and in the streets of cities, where they find them at times almost buried under heaps of rubbish and not infrequently half-eaten by pigs and dogs and rats. In such cases all we can do for them is to give them baptism, and often the saving waters have scarcely ceased to flow before their sanctified souls are soaring up to their Father in heaven. Often they are seemingly dead when they are brought to us, but we baptize them conditionally nevertheless; not infrequently they then give some sign of life to prove that their souls were lingering merely to receive the fruits of redemption. Who knows but the self-sacrifice of one or other of our many auxiliaries may have been rewarded by the salvation of such souls? During the past year we baptized 1,901 of these poor waifs, the majority of whom are already with God making intercession for those who have helped to save them. Such is our work. But our resources have been badly crippled by the war. We are sorely in need of help.

Canton, China. SR. MARIE DU ST. RÉDEMPTEUR.

Poland and the Prophets

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A writer in AMERICA for April 14 quotes the words of Peter Skarga's prophecy about the restoration of Poland. There is a more recent and much more remarkable prophecy to the same effect. It was published in the Civilta Cattolica in 1864, and is reproduced in the "Christian Trumpet," a book of which the third edition was printed in 1873. We read therein that a certain Dominican friar went to Poland in the early part of last century to preach a series of missions. He was inhibited by the Russian Government from exercising the ministry on pain of exile to Siberia. Being greatly aggrieved, he addressed himself in prayer to Blessed Andrew Bobola, S.J., who had suffered martyrdom for the Faith in Poland in the century before. He besought the martyr, who had often foretold the liberation of Poland, to obtain from God that the Poles should not be robbed of the Faith. That night, in the Dominican convent, where he stayed, Blessed Andrew appeared to him and bade him look out of a window that commanded a view of the quadrangle. Instead of the enclosure, he saw a vast plain, in which Russians, Turks, English, French, Prussians, Austrians, and others that he could not well discern, were fighting furiously. "When the war which you see there ends," said the apparition to him, "Poland shall be restored, and I shall be its principal patron." I have not the book by me, and do but quote from memory. Is not this prophecy in course of fulfilment? And does it not forebode defeat to the two Teutonic Powers which, with characteristic selfishness, gave autonomy only to that part of Poland which they wrested from Russia? ✠ ALEX. MACDONALD.

The Origin of Life

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Brilmyer in AMERICA for May 5 says: "With all due respect for the opinions of Aristotle, St. Thomas, and Dr. O'Malley, I still believe in the 'continuity of life' as expressed by Wilder." That settles Aristotle and St. Thomas, not to drag in Dr. O'Malley, even if continuity of life as expressed by Wilder relates to germ cells only, not to anything St. Thomas or Aristotle ever heard of. I thank Mr. Brilmyer for setting me in such distinguished society.

Dr. Muttkowski had a letter in the same number of AMERICA in amplification of his original article. This letter is altogether a discussion of side issues, and even more than his first article it ignores the main point under discussion, viz., that the human zygote has organs fit for the reception of the soul, therefore it receives the soul. He complains that he is "taunted with the sponsorship of a 'human morula,' which is indeed 'bad biology,' when I specifically cautioned against such an interpretation." He did caution that he was arguing from a supposed analogy, but the analogy, unfortunately, does not exist; nothing exists, as the biological statements were incorrect. The unioval twin-theory, which is further insisted upon in the letter, has been shown to be irrelevant in AMERICA for April 11. Moreover, it is decidedly improbable even as a theory, and the new proof adduced is no proof.

If one followed every digression that crops up in a debate of this kind the discussion would last until the crack of doom. Keep to the question. I have followed the vagaries of my critics, other than Dr. Muttkowski and Father Murphy, who are worthy of great consideration, because these others were amusing, and because, in my Irish way, I like to fight just for the sake of a fight, but the Editor tells me I must stop.

If I understand Father Murphy, he says I hold that Aristotle and St. Thomas were of the opinion that conception and infusion synchronize. I have said the direct contrary several times. He says also: "It is quite gratuitous, as being groundless, to represent the Scholastics as teaching that generation takes place only after the corruption of something else." This is a comment on my phrase, "There is always an instant of time in which death, or the corruption of the primitive form, intervenes between the corruption of one and the generation of the other"; that is, between the corruption of the life in the separate germ-nuclei and the infusion of the newly created human life. St. Thomas, the chief of the Scholastics, says, I. Q. 118, a.2, ad 2: "Since the generation of one thing is always the corruption of another, in man, as in other animals, when a more perfect form comes in, this supposes the corruption of any preceding form." The form of a human being is his life. Life comes from contingent life in lower animals, but human life, the human soul, does not; it is created de novo and infused after the corruption (Death) of the preëxisting germ life. Father Murphy says: "It surely is plain that life must reproduce itself before dying, if it is to do so at all." Transeat! John Smith does not reproduce himself in John Smith, Junior, so that he makes the life of John Smith, Junior. God attends to that directly.

What About Ireland?

FOR some time past England has been proclaiming that the Allies are at war in the cause of democracy. At every opportunity British statesmen have lifted their voices to say that their nation is sacrificing itself in the cause of freedom, especially for the liberty of weak and abused peoples. Quite naturally this protestation has been met by the query: What of Ireland? and England has been silent or evasive.

But with the entrance of America into the war the problem has become too acute to be ignored or brushed aside lightly. This nation is pledged to democracy by its Constitution and traditions, and by our very temperament and habits of life Americans are critical of a policy which consists of two elements, one, a proclamation of liberty for all, the other, oppression in Ireland.

This critical phase of thought is naturally accompanied by doubt regarding the sincerity of England's intentions, and doubt is only too apt to be succeeded by negation, a detriment to the success of any cause whose fate depends on strong convictions in its favor.

True, this is a question with many complex ramifications. But at least two features of it are perfectly clear. Fundamentally it is a purely ethical problem that has been given an acute international emphasis by the entrance of the United States into the war, in behalf of liberty.

For these two reasons Americans are taking a special interest in the matter and all of them who are unprejudiced are freely speaking their conviction that Ireland has a perfect right to full freedom, a statement quite in accord with England's reiterated assertion that she is fighting for the "right of small nations to govern themselves." However much Americans may have deplored Casement's exploit, they cannot, if they are true to the ethical sense and to the traditions of freedom, repudiate his last words: "Self-government is our right. It is no more a thing to be withheld from us or doled out to us than the right to life or light, to sunshine or spring flowers." Our forefathers expressed that same principle in immortal words to the effect that all men are endowed with the right to liberty and the pursuit of happiness. And because they appreciated the difference between a speculative formula and a practical proposition, they gave their blood that the aforesaid principle might be put into effect. Since that day American character has not changed, hence the question: What about Ireland?

Knowledge and Righteousness

IT was an ancient Roman poet who for a moment stayed his hasty pace along the path of dalliance to say that despite his life, he knew very well what was right and proper, and approved it. Then he went his way as before; not insincere, but weak. Evil-doers are in no doubt as to the moral character of their acts. Their lack, like the poet's, is not in the intellect, but in the will.

There was a time, particularly in this country, when it was thought that education alone would make a man healthy, wealthy, and, in the truest sense, wise. Schools therefore set themselves the task of training the intellect, on the supposition, it may be, that a well-disciplined intellect necessarily connoted a will panoplied against iniquity. The possibility that a man might employ his trained wits in a wrong way, received scant consideration, until the discovery that some of our most successful criminals were men who had used their brains to defy the law. Society then began to understand that its most pernicious enemy was not the ignorant and easily detected lout, but the rascal clever enough to cover his tracks.

Within the last few years the "knowledge-theory" has been applied to the teaching of morality in many State schools. To break "the conspiracy of silence," matters usually reserved for the lecture room and the clinic have been presented with a most unscientific and unhallowed openness, even in mixed classes of adolescents. It need not be said that this abomination received no welcome in Catholic schools. Every friend of innocent and unspoiled childhood will be glad to know that educators, outside the Church, are now realizing the pernicious futility of trying to train to personal purity through pathology and anatomy. "Who knows best the dangers of morphinism?" asks Dr. Richard C. Cabot of Boston. "Why, of course, it is the doctor. And who gets it oftenest? The doctor." Experience should have taught even the professional educator, quick to adore new idols, the truth of Dr. Cabot's conclusion: "Long ago I made up my mind that knowledge did not keep anybody straight in matters of sex, in matters of hygiene, or in avoiding a habit like morphinism." Ovid, the ancient poet, was right, and so is Dr. Cabot, the twentieth-century physician. Knowledge is useful for many things, but it is not a panacea.

Healing the Sick

MISCONCEPTION with regard to things Catholic on the part of those outside the Church is so common that it no longer occasions comment. We are accustomed to broad statements on our practices and doctrines, that are completely at variance with the facts. In the pulpit and in private conversations, where there is no danger of challenge, non-Catholics are by no means chary of hazarding remarks founded merely on vague impressions; but greater caution has been the custom in printed books. "Does Christ Still Heal?" a volume just off the press and written by a Protestant divine, is an exception.

Finding that the practice of anointing the sick has fallen into desuetude outside the Catholic Church, Dr. Wilson, the author, urges that it be readopted. He is a bold man to take up the commission given by Christ and recorded by St. James, V: 14, 15, for non-Catholics are very noticeably at sea about the meaning of St: James' words: "Is any man sick among you? Let him bring in the priests of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick man: and the Lord shall raise him up: and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him." Not content, however, with giving his own interpretation of the passage, with which even he scarcely hoped to find much agreement among his religious brethren, he tells his readers of the errors of the Church, where, awkwardly enough for himself, he finds the practice of anointing the sick in full vigor. He says:

> In the Roman Church the apostolic custom of anointing the sick began to lose its original character about the eighth century. From this period on one may mark its development into the modern sacrament of Unction, the object of which is preparation for death, not the healing of the body. (Italics inserted.)

There are several false statements in this sentence, but as they rest on the authority of the Rev. F. W. Puller, whose aberrations are not unknown to Catholic theologians, they may be disregarded. The italicized words will excite the amusement of Catholics. It would be hard for the author to discover a single Catholic in the whole world, who has ever heard or read a sermon or instruction on Extreme Unction, in which insistence was not laid on the fact that the Sacrament is intended also for the health of the body; and it is safe to say that the doctor will not find a single Catholic catechism, a single book of Catholic doctrine, or a single Catholic theological treatise on the Sacraments, in which there is not clear and explicit teaching to the effect that Extreme Unction was instituted by Christ not merely to remit sins and serve as a preparation for death, but also to act for the supernatural healing of the body. Where then did the doctor get his information? Why do non-Catholics refuse to consult easily accessible sources of authentic information? When will they stop writing absurdities about the Church?

May's Liturgy

IT was an unerring instinct that led the Church to dedicate the month of May to Mary. Blossoms and birds, bright skies and gentle breezes, the laughter of children, the charm of new-born creatures, the loveliness of earth's fresh garments, all blend harmoniously to form a glad ritual of praise and thanksgiving for Our Lady's high perfections. The vernal beauty of the world, the sights and sounds and odors of spring remind Mary's children of her virtues, suggest her gracious power, and symbolize her motherly bounty, just as the poet's soul of Father Gerard Hopkins sings that the very air he breathes

> Minds me in many ways
> Of her who not only > Gave God's infinity,
> Dwindled in infancy,
> Welcome in womb and breast,
> Birth, milk, and all the rest.
> But mothers, each new grace
> That does now reach our race,
> Mary Immaculate,
> Merely a woman, yet
> Whose presence, power is > Great as no goddess's
> Was deemed, dreamed: who
> This one work has to do—
> Set all God's glory through,
> God's glory which would go
> Thro' her and from her flow
> Off, and no way but so.
> I say that we are wound
> With mercy round and round
> As if with air: the same
> Is Mary, more by name,
> She, wild web, wondrous robe,
> Mantles the guilty globe,
> Since God has let dispense
> Her prayers His providence.
> Nay, more than almoner,
> The sweet alms' self is her
> And men are meant to share
> Her life as life does air. . . . .
> Be thou, then, O thou dear
> Mother, my atmosphere;
> My happier world wherein
> To wend and meet no sin.

However fitting and beautiful a tribute to Our Lady's transcendent dignity we no doubt regard May's liturgy to be, we know that she sets a far higher value on the homage of men's hearts, on a love and admiration for her that finds practical expression in purity of life. Congratulations on Mary's unique prerogatives as Virgin, Queen and Mother come with a bad grace from men of unclean lips and polluted souls. Our Lady is a lover of sincerity. That freedom from sin's taint, which we so admire and praise in her, she would have us strive, in our poor and imperfect way, to obtain and retain. In securing for her children the strength to near that goal, Our Lord's gracious Mother is more bountiful to men than is May, the month of flower, to hilltop and valley.

A Woman's Hate

A FEW days since there dropped from the editor's mail-bag an anonymous and apparently inoffensive letter written on sweet-scented, delicately-tinted paper bearing a large golden monogram. The first sentence of the communication was tolerably mild, the second took on the appearance of a porcupine at bay, the third belched fire, the fourth spat hot brimstone. Thereafter words and quills and fire and brimstone flew here and there and everywhere. The letter became a second Vesuvius in eruption, the writer was an angry Presbyterian. She "fairly hated Catholicism," and a hundred ink-drops, scattered higgledy-piggledy around the word "hated," emphasized her passion.

Now a woman's hate is seldom awesome and often pitiable, if, for no other reason, because it is altogether unnatural. At any rate the passion of our correspondent was without objective foundation. True, she assigned two causes for her rage: Catholicism has exalted the Kaiser and has stirred up trouble at home, by insisting on the union of Church and State.

Clearly, these are strange charges. It is wonderful indeed that the Catholic Church, always intolerant of heresy, should have taken so kindly to the exaltation of the high priest of Lutheranism. And no man, but only a woman, has heard of it.

May it not be that our correspondent has missed her cue? A Kaiser was exalted not many years ago, and, strange to say, the occasion for the honor paid him, was an act of unjust aggression done in pursuit of the State supremacy to which the war is attributed. A Kaiser was acclaimed for a brutal attempt to annihilate the power of the only institution that could have prevented the present slaughter—the Catholic Church. And Presbyterians shouted loudest and threw their caps highest in the air.

The lady who wrote the volcanic letter can find this terse description of the event in a book sent out by Fleming H. Revell Company, Publishers of Evangelical Literature, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City:

> Mr. Chiniquy is one of the most conspicuous champions of Protestantism of the present day. He was invited to Scotland by the leading ecclesiastics to take part in the Tercentenary of the Reformation, and to England in later years, when all her leading Protestants stood forth to honor the Emperor William of Germany and Prince Bismarck for their noble resistance to Papal pretensions to authority in Germany.

Mr. Chiniquy was once a Catholic and twice a Presbyterian; the Kaiser was pursuing a policy that has ended in war. The lady has missed her cue.

And she has missed it twice. Catholics have not insisted on the union of Church and State. Presbyterians arrogated that function to themselves.

Women have long memories, and it may be that the writer of the fiery communication under review can reach back in thought to 1830 and 1835. If so, she will recall that the leaders of the No Popery movement of those days were prominent Presbyterians who, according to a Protestant writer in the Pittsburgh Manufacturer, quoted by the Truth Teller for May 30, 1835, designed a "union of Church and State . . . a union of religious and political power, and a Presbyterian government, and a disfranchising of all those who are not of their religious creed ("Historical Records and Studies," Vol. IV., Parts I and II, pp 174, 175). To make matters worse for our correspondent the Rochester Democrat, quoted in the New York Catholic Diary for July 2, 1830, rose to the height of power and declared: "The Presbyterian Church will be the established church of this Union or we will wade through blood to attain that just prerogative." (Ibid.)

Surely the anonymous lady has missed her cue. But it is not her fault. Her letter bears the postmark of a Southern town, and the air is balmy there now, and the banjos are twanging and the darkies are singing and "meetin'" is on, and the pulpit was always the source of a "pure Gospel."

Hospitals and Animal Houses

"THEY say it's a good hospital," remarked the convalescent college man. "From a scientific viewpoint I suppose it is. All the care and attention regularly bestowed on an interestingly inoculated rabbit in their biological animal house, I am sure they lavished on me. But no more. Somehow, too, I couldn't help feeling that the interest was of the same kind; intelligent, but aloof and coolly impersonal. I was a diseased organism and so was the rabbit. The Sisters' hospital for me next time. There they treat you like a human being, and not like a specimen."

Our college man here pointed an essential difference. The Catholic hospital omits nothing sanctioned by genuine science, but they who conduct it premise that the patient is something more than a valuable animal. He has an immortal soul. Therefore, unless forced to other action, Catholics should always make use of Catholic hospitals. The sick need spiritual ministries. Even in the best non-Catholic hospitals, these ministries are not always regarded with a sympathetic eye, and it has not been unknown that through indifference or bigotry, dying Catholics have been deprived of the Last Sacraments.

Catholic social workers in particular, should not expose the defenseless poor to the possibility of illegal and immoral practices too common today in non-Catholic clinics and hospitals. Hence, whatever the necessity, these facilities should not be used, unless it is certain that nothing will be done contrary to Catholic principles of morality. In the New York Medical Journal for April 28, Dr. Morris H. Kahn boasts that in conducting a birth-control clinic at Mt. Sinai Hospital, New York, "Section 1142 of our Penal Code was ignored." For Catholics the warning is clear. Choose a hospital for your sick, not an animal house.

THE MOVEMENT CALLED "VERS LIBRE"

THE first and perhaps the abiding thought of the conservative critic in dealing with free verse is apt to be that the writers thereof have blundered into a worse tyranny than the supposed one from which they fled, or rather into a position far more evil than any tyranny: an anarchy sprawling, formless, vague, and barely articulate. His tendency will be to condemn and, particularly if his experience has been with the more freakish and violent of the new school, to condemn absolutely, root and branch, principle and practice, theory and exemplification. And yet looking back over the course of English poetry we cannot but think that the critic in so doing would be wrong, and this for two reasons: first, on the score of precedent; and secondly and chiefly because of something else with which precedent is often confounded, but which is a wholly different and vastly more important concern, namely tradition.

Now if we were basing an argument for vers libre principally on precedent we believe we should not have much difficulty in proving the truth of what Sir Philip Sidney said long years ago, that "Verse is but an ornament and no cause to poetry;" nor should we be at a loss for instances from Shakespeare, Milton, Patmore, and Francis Thompson. In the choruses of "Samson Agonistes," for example, that austere and yet magnificent work of Milton's old age, we should find free verse, the very thing itself, and though it comes only to some twenty or thirty lines, it is there, it is a fact; and if we considered that Milton is the supreme artist, the greatest stylist of our literature, we should have to admit that it is there not inadvertently or by momentary lapse, but consciously and by design.

But these instances, perhaps, would be few and meager and probably too slight to base a theory upon; and so we should go on till we came to two writers who openly and at large wrote the thing we today called free verse: "the inspired madman," Blake, and that brawling, uncouth, obscene, tender, animalistic, grotesque, and powerful personality, Whitman. Now we are fully aware of the trenchant criticism to which both of these writers, and especially the latter, are liable. We, too, can see their faults, their excesses, their innumerable violations of the primary laws of good writing; but speaking generally and not dealing at all with minute particulars we say that when a writer's work endures and has influence, in the one case for over one hundred years and in the other for over sixty, there must be in the mass of it somewhere something that stirs and has a being, in short, that is alive; for in more senses than one "Securus judicat orbis terrarum:" the judgment of the world can be securely relied upon.

And, finally, when in our own day so devoted and painstaking and conscientious a lover of his art as Yeats gives vers libre the approval both of his praise and his example, we are safe, we think, in assuming that there is something in the new manner beyond mere noise and a frivolous desire for novelty.

What, then, is the meaning of vers libre? The first object and impelling motive of the vers-libristes is expressed in their very name: it is freedom. And freedom from what? Specifically from formal meter, for though they have by extension carried their revolt further, both into the field of subject or theme and into their manner of handling that theme, their quarrel and their innovation may be said to begin and to end with the measured and customary beat of verse. Their endeavor is after a closer, a truer, a more perfectly adapted means of expression, an instrument more delicately and subtly responsive to all the shifts and turns and variations of the poet's emotions.

Just here perhaps sounds the voice of objection, asking why the means, the instrument, that Shakespeare and Milton and Wordsworth found adequate should now suddenly and all at once be rejected as incapable and outworn. Well, we do not know fully why so many of our present-day poets are dissatisfied with the old medium—or if we did this is not the place to set forth the reason—but we do know the fact that they are so dissatisfied; and the tradition of English poetry is simply this, that when the poets are dissatisfied with anything in their art, they change it—and criticism comes limping along afterwards and gives it justification.

When Samuel Simmons, the worthy printer of "Paradise Lost," put forth that immortal work to the public he insisted on having from the author "a reason of that which stumbles many others, why the Poem rimes not." Milton complied in a short preface tracing back the practice to "Homer in Greek" and "Virgil in Latin" and to "some both Italian and Spanish poets of prime note" and to "our best English tragedies." This was interesting and no doubt of benefit to his readers, and yet with respect to the real reason of just why he selected that particular mode, blank verse, not even Milton, we hazard, with all his powers of expression could have given a satisfying or a true answer; for the cause was hidden in those mysterious and secret places of the soul whence come poetic inspiration and selection and to which no vision has yet penetrated from the time of Socrates down to the present day.

Wordsworth lived to be eighty years old, but so radical and absurd was his reform considered that he was not generally recognized as a poet till the last ten years of his life. Shakespeare, it is true, is that rare specimen, a living and an appreciated genius, but he was appreciated mainly as a playwright, and as for his medium, that he found at once ready to his hand, remolded and reformed by Marlowe, at what cost to precedent and with how much creaking of old lumber let history tell.

The whole tradition of English poetry, then, as a thing breathing and alive is on the side of innovation and freedom, and moreover on the side of an innovation and a freedom not prepared in advance by critical formulae, but introduced boldly and ab initio by the poets themselves. This is the course which poetry has always followed and which it must continue to follow if it is to advance, for, as someone has succinctly put it, "Progress is change."

Now unfortunately there has of late got abroad in the land a kind of praise-monger who by his, or her, indiscriminate laudation and wholesale eulogy has so befogged the real matter in hand that for the average reader it has become almost impossible to see the plain thing itself over which they rhapsodize. And still the incense goes up and the tom-toms beat and the dithyramb is chanted, till at last the disinterested onlooker—or interested only for poor, beclouded poetry—is fain to cry out: "Stop! Poetry needs no such ceremonial. If this thing which you rave over is incapable of standing upright on its own legs, strong and clean and vital, then all the powers of earth and man will never be able to breathe life into its dead body!" So would he be tempted to say, and so, perhaps, would he say; but his protest would probably go unheeded, and the sacred rites of puffing up mediocrity and incompetence would still continue. The poor critic, alas! we shall always have with us; only the common-sense of mankind no longer follows him when he discovers a genius behind every bush.

Here then we have the two extremes: the rigid conservative who can see no good in a new thing, and the enthusiastic radical who can see no bad in it. Somewhere in between, we think, lies the golden mean and the true answer. We have, of course, throughout this paper been dealing with vers libre merely as an hypothesis, purely with the theory of the thing; and this we consider needs no apology, since only in this way can we discover the principles on which it rests. Our chief object—and, we think, result—has been simply to show this, that there is no reason per se, no inherent cause, no a priori condition against which vers libre must dash itself and come to naught. This, however, though important, is largely a negative result, and after all what will decide the question, what will give vers libre either its triumphant sanction or its caput mortuum is practice, its actual showing forth of the truth and vitality it professes to embody.

History of the Prima Primaria Sodality of the Annunciation and Sts. Peter and Paul. From the Archives. By Father ELDER MULLAN, S.J. St. Louis: The Queen's Work Press. $2.00.

One of the encouraging signs of the times in the eyes of those who are striving for the betterment of Catholic life is the revival of the ideals and the practices encouraged by the Sodality of Our Lady. The exhaustive volume of Father Mullan on the Prima Primaria or the Mother and Head of all sodalities of the Blessed Virgin is for that reason most welcome. With a care, accuracy and attention to detail which must have cost no little labor, the author has sifted the archives of the Sodality and from their careful study has presented us with a history of the growth and progress of the body which everywhere makes edifying reading. One of the results of the perusal of the volume will be to clear up certain false impressions of the aims and purposes and original workings of the Sodality which at times have prevailed. The Prima Primaria, founded in 1564 in the Roman College by the young Jesuit, John Lemis, was a body meant for gentlemen. Its aim was to put within their reach those extra means of perfection and personal sanctification which would help them to be more thorough Catholics. It had as a special end to cultivate devotion to the Mother of God and to inculcate the imitation of her virtues. Of social influence on the outside world, in the modern sense of the word, the Sodality had very little, nor does it seem to have aimed at any. It was meant to foster and deepen the individual's spiritual life. In doing so, as Father Mullan remarks, it was true to the ideals set down by St. Ignatius, that that work is far more reaching in its spiritual results which advances along the path of holiness those who by their lives, their authority and example may have it in their power to influence others. The direct influence of the Prima Primaria extended to the select few. It tried to render these as perfect and as rounded in their spiritual life as possible. For its founder and its directors knew that their influence would inevitably reach a wider circle. This may be called social work of the highest order. The same lofty destinies everywhere await the Sodalities of Our Lady if they are faithful to the practices and the spirit of the Mother and Head of all, whose story Father Mullan has told us with such fulness and authority.

Mechanisms of Character Formation. By WILLIAM A. WHITE, M.D. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

Studies in Forensic Psychiatry. By BERNARD GLUECK, M.D. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $2.50.

In these studies in Freudian psychoanalysis, Dr. White addresses himself to the physician, Dr. Glueck to the legal practitioner. Approaching the subject from different points of view, fundamentally the philosophy of the two books is identical. Dr. White reaches the crux of the question when he writes: "The material of which the dream is composed must necessarily be made up of the dreamer's psyche, and there must be some sufficient reason why it is put together in one particular way rather than in another." If "psyche" be accepted for the content of the complex influences and experiences which constitute man's adequate mental life, the proposition is acceptable. Psychologists of the neo-scholastic school readily admit activities, which, however "unsusceptible of introspective observation," to quote Father Maher, at times exercise a real and even intimate influence over thought and action. That in sleep, when the volitional control of thought, together with the ability to reflect and discriminate, is suspended, these under-surface activities should flow in upon the imagination, seems not only a possibility but a fact. The extent of this influence, and its significance, are the precise points in question. Dr. White quotes with approbation, Dr. G. Stanley Hall's illustration of the iceberg, one-tenth of which is visible and nine-tenths below the surface. Sailing serenely in the face of the wind, the berg apparently sets at naught the laws of aerodynamics; but the contradiction disappears when it is remembered that the mass is moving in response to forces acting upon the submerged nine-tenths. It is hardly probable that Dr. White accepts this picture literally. Could the submerged and visible proportions be reversed, the illustration would be nearer the truth. We sometimes respond to influences dimly apprehended and defying analysis, but that man as a rule reacts to motives which cannot be oriented, is a statement not borne out by fact.

An obvious weakness in a system which attempts to search the secrets of the soul, is its uncertain philosophy of the nature of the soul and its faculties, particularly the will. Dr. Glueck, for instance, pronounces the freedom of the will "a wholly artificial concept," primarily, it would seem, because of the existence of abnormal mental states. Certainly, if Dr. Glueck means to affirm that in the so-called "border-line cases" and in actual insanity, the will's power of choice is weakened or completely destroyed, he is only defending a proposition held by all Catholic philosophers. These states, however, are characteristic not of normal man but of abnormal individuals, and no more disprove the freedom of the will, than the existence of the blind disproves the sense of sight. Furthermore, the current Freudian interpretation of "symbols" is arbitrary rather than scientific, and in the hands of certain practitioners, it becomes little less than Walpurgian. A man with his feet in the mire is not all mud. His eyes may reflect the pure fire of the stars.

The Life of the Grasshopper. By J. HENRI FABRE. Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

Another of J. Henri Fabre's captivating stories of insect life has here been given to the English-speaking public by a capable translator. Though entitled "The Grasshopper," the book covers a much wider range, including as it does the cicada, locust, cricket, mantis and foamy cicadilla. After rescuing the grasshopper's reputation from the ill-repute which the false fable of "The Grasshopper and the Ant" handed down through the centuries has given it, the naturalist proceeds to tell in language simple and quite untechnical what he has discovered by nights and days of persevering observation about the metamorphosis, structure, instinct and habits of these various insects. With the rare quality of representing colorless facts in a vivid novel-like style, the naturalist imbues the reader with that enthusiasm for the mysteries of insect life which he himself possessed. As a stern scientist he tests the various possible explanations of a difficulty and perseveres until he finds the right one. Thus, with microscope in hand, he watches the cicadilla sink from sight beneath the foamy curtain of its own construction, and with a delicate test-tube endeavors to investigate and elucidate the process. So, too, he examines and explains the music box of the cicada, its sense of sight and hearing, its progress from an earthy home into the light of day without leaving a trace of the numerous cubic inches of earth which lay in its path, the cannibalistic habits of the mantis, and the solitary life of the cricket. The scrupulous exactness of the man, not satisfied with the conclusions of others until he has tried for himself, carries assurance and conviction to the true naturalist and lover of nature.

There is, however, another class of scientists to whom the book will be of equal interest and value, namely, the philosopher. The cosmologist combating the old difficulty against finality, for example, "the apparent useless waste of eggs among insects, etc.," will derive new courage from M. Fabre's book, while the psychologist, confronted with the various theories of evolution, will be interested in these words of an exact scientist: "Can it be that the theory of progressive acquirements is only a specious lure? Are we to abandon the savage theory of the crushing of the weak by the strong, etc.? Is it permissible to doubt when the evolutionists talk to us of the survival of the fittest? Yes, indeed it is! etc." Well does M. Fabre say, "It wants but a midge's wing to confound our proudest theories." F. E. L.

Lex Talionis. By RABBI JOEL BLAU. Excerpt from Central Conference of American Rabbis.

In a thorough yet readable manner Rabbi Blau shows in this pamphlet the evolution of the law of retaliation among the Jews, its counterpart among other peoples,—especially in the Code of Hammurabi,—its interpretation and execution in Bible, Talmud, and Mishna. If we read merely the words of the law in Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy, we get rather a goose-flesh-bringing sensation. This sensation disappears when we study in an historical setting the "eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot" legislation of Judaism. The punishment of crime is as old as the human race. Before the evolution of criminal-court procedure, whose was the right and duty to punish the criminal? At the outset, if Cain be a witness, any one could kill the murderer. Later on it was the duty of the nearest of kin, the goël, to take that vengeance against crime which was necessary for the well being of society. In time kofer was accepted instead of talio, a certain sum of money in place of the retaliation of bodily injury for bodily injury. In the study that Dr. Blau makes of "Lex Talionis" it loses all gruesomeness, and compares favorably with our modern methods of criminal procedure. The doctor is, however, wrong in thinking that the New Testament is inconsistent in supplanting this law by the counsel of forgiveness of injuries while at the same time making use of "the well-known Talmudical saying, 'with what measure ye mete, it shall be meted unto you.'" For, first, the "measure for measure" rule of Christ is not Talmudic in meaning; between man and man, it is a rule of forgiveness and mercy, not a rule of retaliation. Secondly, the mere wording of the New Testament "measure for measure" rule may just as readily have infiltrated into the Talmud as vice versa. The Jerusalem Talmud was first edited in the third and fixed in the fourth century of our era; the Babylonian Talmud was the literary work of 430 A.D. to the sixth century. W. F. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Petunia" (Dutton, $1.50) is a novel from the gifted pen of Mrs. George Wemyss, which sustains, if it does not surpass, the high level of excellence reached in "Jaunty in Charge." The story is a little more involved than its predecessor, but is like it in its whimsical portraiture of character, its originality and its careful workmanship. If it has any fault it is that it is over-clever. The most attractive persons in the story are subordinate in importance, and one is tempted to wish that the author had reserved them for a separate study. One of the most pleasing things about the book is its sympathy with the idiosyncracies of human nature. Its characters are not paragons of virtue, but very human, with obvious faults and shortcomings, and for that very reason, as not infrequently happens in real life, possessed of more subtle charm.

Never did the world so much need to meditate on the Sacred Passion of Our Lord as now. It needs its lessons of abnegation, of self-denial, of strength. Father Donnelly's "The Holy Hour in Gethsemane" (Kenedy, $0.75), a series of meditations on the "Anima Christi," will do much to inculcate these lessons. The meditations are substantial in doctrine, pithy in diction and thoroughly practical. They are preceded with a short explanation of that excellent devotion known as "The Holy Hour." With Father Donnelly as a guide, an "Hour for Holiness," an "Hour for Perfection and Strength," an "Hour for Perseverance" will be profitably spent before the Blessed Sacrament, and cannot fail to awake greater love for that consoling mystery of our faith. "The Holy Hour in Gethsemane," besides bringing home the lessons of the Sacred Passion, will have the further value of teaching a method of prayer and meditation as easy as it is practical for all who use it in the spirit indicated by its author.

In a good paper on "Medieval Preaching" contributed by the Rev. E. J. Quigley to the current Irish Theological Quarterly he calls attention to the remarkable familiarity with the Scriptures that preachers then had. He cites as an instance Dr. Neale's comparison between a little-known twelfth-century preacher and Dr. Newton, a celebrated Protestant pulpit-orator:

> Preaching on the same text, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord," the priest of the dark ages makes in his sermon fifty-seven Scripture references: seven to the Gospels, one to the Epistles, twenty-two to the Psalms, nine to the Prophets and eighteen to other parts of Scripture. Newton quotes twenty-one texts: nine refer to the Gospels, two to the Epistles, nine to the Prophets, one to the Psalms, and none to any other part of Scripture.

Yet the Bible is widely believed to have been a closed book to medieval priests but the particular possession of modern Protestant preachers.

The Catholic World for May is quite warlike. Father Burke begins the number with a stirring "Call to Patriotism." Father Palmieri writes on "The Church and the Russian Revolution." Dr. O'Hara on "Rising Prices and the War Loan," and Father Aveling on "Some War Impressions of a Chaplain." Among the other contributions to the number are Father Talbot Smith's paper on Notre Dame University's diamond jubilee, Henry Somerville's discussion of "Eugenics and the Feeble-Minded," Emily Hickey's "Thoughts on the Merchant of Venice," and Joseph Francis Wickham's "On Reading Virgil Again." In a searching examination of "The Literacy Test." Father T. J. Brennan reaches the conclusion that "The Immigration bill is un-American," and believes that: "if this present bar had been set up fifty or a hundred years ago, there are many of those representatives and senators who voted yes who would now be in European war trenches or concentration camps; for their fathers or grandfathers could not pass the test now raised by their offspring."

Two little books recently published with the object of showing the wisdom of conscription are Jennings C. Wise's "The Call of the Republic" (Dutton, $1.00) and Mary Roberts Rinehart's "The Altar of Freedom" (Houghton Mifflin, $0.50). After giving a good sketch of ancient, medieval and modern military systems, Colonel Wise states his thesis thus: "Compulsory universal military service, with liberal exemptions for educational purposes at schools and colleges where military training is given, and in the case of dependencies and physical unfitness, is the only honest, fair and economical system of defense, and withal it is the only real democratic system." His plan calls for three lines of reserves who in youth served two years with the colors, and who in case of need would form an American army of 4,000,000 men. Mrs. Rinehart's booklet is an "appeal to the mothers of America," who "must learn," she maintains, "personal service," and that "is not rolling bandages for the other woman's son." She warns us that we must not repeat the mistake of the mothers of England who did not insist at the beginning of the war "that every man in the Empire bear his share."

"False Witness" (Hodder and Stoughton, London, 3/6) is the authorized translation of "Klokke Roland" or "Bell Roland" of Johannes Jorgensen, and is dedicated to Cardinal Mercier. It is an answer to the "Appeal to the Civilized World" made by the chief representatives of German science and art, in which they protested that Germany was not guilty of the war, that it was not true that Germany had criminally violated the neutrality of Belgium, that German soldiers had attacked the life or property of a single Belgian citizen without provocation, that Louvain was destroyed by German troops in the blindness of rage, that German methods of warfare are contrary to international war, and, finally, that it is not true that the struggle against the so-called German militarism is not directed against German culture as the enemies of Germany pretend. While the author writes with warmth and indignation against the signers of the "Appeal," he also adduces argument and document in support of his counter-statements. Of the value of both argument and proof the reader must judge for himself and apply to them the soundest rules of evidence. Only thus can he hope to come to a correct conclusion.——In "Scraps of Paper" (Doran, $0.25) are given exact reproductions of the German proclamations issued in Belgium and France. These bring home to us forcibly what the invasion meant. With the exception of a short foreword by Ian Malcolm, M.P., they are published without comment. For the future historian of the war they will prove to be of great value.

The following batch of spring novels deserves but brief mention: "All-of-a-Sudden Carmen" (Putnam, $1.35) is Gustav Kobbe's amateurish story of a little waif who was left at the stage-door and was brought up by old Yudels to be a prima donna. There are some amusing pictures of stageland in the book.——"The Golden Arrow" (Dutton, $1.50), by Mary Webb, is a realistic tale of Welsh farm-life today. The characters seem faithfully drawn, but in plot and description the sordid often predominates.——To read "Good Morning, Rosamond!" (Doubleday, $1.35), by Constance Skinner, is like walking in the dark. You move, but you don't know where you are going. There is that rare thing, "a professor with degrees," in the book. Seven young ladies, Palametta, Anabeth, Anabel, Justinia, Constanza, Maravene, Claribel and Bertholin Pelham-Hew, are also introduced, and the scene closes on page 384 with "They laughed for sheer gladness," i.e., not the seven, but the dull hero and the duller heroine.——"Cinderella Jane" (Doubleday, $1.35), by Marjorie Benton Cooke, proposes to show how a lady who marries in haste may, while repenting at leisure, make a bad bargain good. Of course, there is a tertium quid, one Martin Christiansen, who begins by proposing to develop the heroine's mind, and ends by proposing an elopement. Jane, who had adopted Greenwich Village provincialism under the delusion that it was "culture," stood in need of much mental development, but the accomplishments of this caddish philanderer hardly fitted him for the difficult task. The great problems of life are not solved by surges of sentimentality. Unless they are referred to principles, they cannot be solved at all.

Though the critics are for the most part of the opinion that John Milton is not the author of the ancient nursery lyric, "Hey Diddle Diddle," there is little doubt that if he had been inspired to write that little masterpiece, the lines would have been something like these "Miltonic Mother Goose" verses that Willis Boyd Allen contributes to the May Bookman:

Of dire events, strange, inconcatenate,
Attuned to ribald mirth and revelry,
And eke to sequent madness multiform
And shameful flight: sing thou, O wanton Muse!
"Hey diddle diddle"—thus the nursery rhyme
Ancestral and prerevolutionary,
Chanted by bard maternal, fond, anseric,
Its weird inception takes. "Hey diddle diddle"——
As 'twere a maddened shriek of helpless woe
Drawn by Grimalkin from the viol strings,
Protesting thus their feline genesis.
Then springs aloft the bovine mountebank,
Till Dian's silv'ry orb itself is spurned
By volant hoofs all supercalcitrant;
While far and wide resounds upon the blast
Fell cachination canine, at the sport:
And lo, what dread catastrophe is this!
Two forms, one discoid, one attenuate,
Comrades of eld at many a festive board,
Have fled to realms chaotic, dark, unknown.

The Worker and His Half-Loaf

DICK WHITTINGTON, as all children know, was stayed in his flight by voices, and eventually became Lord Mayor of London. With regret must one chronicle the fact that no voices intervened to stay Pierre Laroche when he set out some months ago from Manchester, to seek his fortune in New York. On his arrival in this oasis of opportunity Pierre bethought himself to examine his credentials. On the positive side these consisted of an aurora of rosy hopes, and one or two acquaintances. On the negative side they were more numerous. He boasted no skill in any particular kind of labor, he was only twenty years old, he had no great amount of physical strength, and, worst of all, no cat to pilot him to fame and fortune. It does not seem probable that Pierre will ever become Mayor of New York. Unless he returns to his green fields he is more likely to become a public charge. Not, of course, that a mayor cannot be a charge on the public. Some measure up very well to the definition.

By an unusual stroke of fortune Pierre managed to put an assistant janitorship of a small apartment house between himself and starvation. His duties are somewhat trying, but cannot be fairly called intricate or unusually laborious. Applying himself to his task for sixty-five hours a week, he receives the munificent sum of $10; "munificent," states his employer, "if you know Pierre." But do not jump to the conclusion that Pierre's honorarium is excessive. It is common for New York waitresses, in whose behalf the legislature has just passed a bill of relief, to work eighty-four hours a week. The Consumers' League found one who kept at it for 122 hours.

Pierre's Budget

YET even such as Pierre must live. With $10 at his disposal he thus arranges his forces in the struggle for a living. Rent, $2.50; laundry, 25 cents; carfare, 70 cents; food, $5.25; total, I believe, $8.70. Carfare Pierre explains on the ground that he could not possibly secure a room within walking distance of the apartment. A weakness for cleanliness justifies the laundry bill. Food, averaging 75 cents daily, undoubtedly seems to verge on the gluttonous. Pierre is not a good manager; he was never made to plan. He dines at a Third Avenue restaurant, not because he likes it, but because he knows of no eating clubs and has never heard of cooperation. But he really does not get a great deal for his outlay. A cup of coffee, with four or six thin slices of bread and a pat of anemic butter, cost 10 cents; if he adds a couple of eggs the check registers 25 cents, and he cannot buy an order of meat for less than 5 cents under this total. The other meals, not excessive in quantity, you can figure out for yourself, and from an examination of Pierre's budget a fair mathematician will compute that Pierre can annually set aside against the rainy day about $67.50.

But to fix this rung in the ladder to fortune he may never buy a newspaper or a cigarette. A glass of soda, a magazine, a trip to the beach or to the "movies" are not for him. Recreation that costs anything is definitely excluded. If he falls sick he cannot afford to pay anything for treatment or medicine. His clothes, as you may have noted, must never call for repair or renewal. Anything like a social life is beyond his means. Marriage is impossible. True, Pierre alone in his cheerless room is not a poor naked wretch, abiding the pelting of a pitiless storm. He exists, with a roof over his head and a little to eat. But no one with any respect for words or facts will contend that he lives as a man should live. And there are in New York today many Pierres, faithful, but largely incompetent, and soon to be unemployable rather than unemployed.

The wage-rate is the barometer of the laborer's prosperity, but it is difficult, if not impossible, to prepare a general summary of wages which will not be false, because out of date, before its publication. From time to time, however, some insight into prevailing rates is given by the work of investigating committees. The Consumers' League of New York, for instance, in an abstract issued in February, 1917, stated that three-quarters of all woman restaurant workers were paid less than $9 weekly. "The usual wage in several of the well-known New York tea rooms was $3.50 a week for full time, which is ten or twelve hours a day. The aspect of tipping presents a more subtle evil. The girls need the money and they deliberately work for it, partly by good service, partly by adopting an intimate personal tone towards men customers."

A report based on statistical findings from 105,000 men and women was published by the New York Factory Investigating Commission in 1915. The Commission fixed the minimum on which the average family could be maintained at $876.43 in New York City and at $772.43 in Buffalo. Yet it was found that one-half of all the wage-earners investigated received less than $416, one-third less than $364, and one-eighth less than $260. These figures, however, should not be too strictly interpreted, since no distinction seems to have been made between heads of families and those contributing to part support of a household. The United States Census of Manufacturers, compiled in 1905, indicated that 79.3 per cent of the men and 99.1 per cent of the women over sixteen years of age engaged in manufacturing industries were paid "$10 and not more than $15" a week. This is equivalent to saying that only twenty-one out of every one hundred men and hardly one in a hundred women receive a weekly wage of $15, or $780 for a full working year.

Some Effects of Low Wages

THE Manly Report of the Commission on Industrial Relations, written last year, has been severely criticised for some of its recommendations, but so far as I know its statistics of wages have never been seriously questioned. Manly writes:

> The most exhaustive investigation ever made showed that the incomes of almost two-thirds of the wage-earners' families, including the earnings of father, mother and children, were less than $750 a year, and of almost one-third were less than $500. . . . These figures show conclusively that between one-half and two-thirds of these families were living below the standards of decent subsistence, while about one-third were living in a state of abject poverty. American society was founded, and for a long time existed, upon the theory that the family should derive its support from the earnings of the father. Now investigation shows that 79 per cent of the fathers of wage-earning families earn less than $700 a year. Therefore less than one-fourth of these fathers could have supported their families on the barest subsistence level without the earnings of other members of the family.

It cannot be denied that Manly has here touched upon one of the gravest evils in modern industrial life; the forcing of mothers and children into shops and factories This unhappy condition has greatly contributed to weaken or even to destroy family life, and in too many instances has exercised a most baneful influence over the physical and moral welfare of the young workers. Manly continues:

> Between one-fourth and one-third of the male workers, eighteen years of age and over, earn less than $10.00 per week; from two-thirds to three-fourths earn less than $15.00, and only about one-tenth earn more than $20.00 a week. This does not take into account lost working time for any cause. All available statistics show that in our great basic industries the workers are unemployed on an average at least one-fifth of the year.
> From two-thirds to three-fourths of the women workers in factories, stores, and laundries work at wages of less than $8.00 a week. Approximately one-fifth earn less than $6.00 and nearly one-half earn less than $6.00 a week.

The effects of these low rates not only upon the material standards of living, but upon education as well, are apparent. "The last of the family to go hungry are the children," writes

Manly, yet in the larger cities "from 12 to 20 per cent are noticeably ill-nourished." Two-thirds of all children in the public schools leave before the completion of the grammar course, and "those who leave are almost entirely the children of the workers, who, as soon as they reach a working age, are thrown . . . into industrial life." With these conditions in mind, a brief study of food prices will show how keen is the worker's struggle for his half-loaf.

Wages and Food Prices

IN May, 1916, the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics published the subjoined table, comparing the union wage-rate with the price of food from 1907 to 1915:

Year	Wage-rate per hour	Full time hours per week	Full time weekly wage-rate	Retail prices of food
1907	100	100	100	100
1908	101	100	101	103
1909	102	99	102	108
1910	105	99	104	113
1911	107	98	105	112
1912	109	98	107	119
1913	111	98	109	122
1914	114	97	111	125
1915	114	97	112	124

When it is remembered that not all laborers had attained the wage-rate set by the unions the table is particularly instructive. Within these years, while the weekly wage-rate increased twelve points the price of food, to which about two-fifths of the laborer's income is devoted, advanced twenty-four points. Definite figures showing the increase in rent, clothing, and other necessities, rated on the same scale, are not at hand. Should these show a comparable increase the worker, despite his larger wage, would be in worse condition in 1915 than in 1907. With the decade 1890-1899 taken as 100, the Times Annalist calculates that in April, 1917, the cost of living is 270. One year ago it was 166.1.

Changes in Recent Years

ACCORDING to a report issued by the Department of Labor towards the end of March, 1917, the annual food bill for a family of five rose from $339.30 in 1913 to $425.54 in 1916. In the last ten years, it is reported, there has been an average increase of 10 per cent per hour in wages, "but the rising cost of food has operated to reduce the pay of the workingman about 16 per cent expressed in terms of food his dollar will buy."

> A workingman who made $3.00 a day in 1907, working ten hours a day, in 1916 worked nine hours and thirty-six minutes a day, and drew $3.48 for it. But it costs him $4.17 to buy the same quantity of food his $3.00 would cover in 1907.

Putting the matter in another way, it is estimated that if in 1907 one dollar's worth of food weighed ten pounds, in 1916 it would weigh a trifle over seven pounds. It is too early to look for complete figures covering the last six months, but prices current during that period in Eastern cities indicate that the ten pounds of 1907 have now dropped to about six pounds. The New York Budget, dated February, 1917, quotes the following figures as a weekly food summary for a family of five:

Meat and fish	$1.54	$1.975
Eggs and dairy products	2.03	2.665
Cereals	1.545	2.047
Vegetables, fruits, etc.	1.80	2.262
Sugar, tea, coffee, etc.	.466	.52
	$7.381	$9.469

This estimate records an increase in two years of 28.3 per cent, while according to the same study the cost of clothing rose from $104.20 to $127.10, an increase of approximately 22 per cent. Figures submitted by the New York Call for April 29, based, it is said, on estimates furnished by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, show that food prices advanced 24 per cent in the year ending February 15, 1917. In other words, in one year the dollar lost one-fourth of its food-purchasing power. "The man who earned a dollar last year should be earning a dollar and a quarter this year if he is to keep up the same standard of living." But he isn't.

Governmental Price-Fixing

TESTIFYING before a Senate Committee two weeks ago Secretary Houston admitted that he could find "no economic reason" for the present high prices, since the food products of the country "were greater, or at least equal, to the average for the last five years." On the other hand, Professors H. R. Seager and R. E. Chaddock, of Columbia University, in their recent pamphlet, "Food Preparedness," hold that "our food production has not kept pace with the growth of our population." In view of the further fact that, according to the Times Annalist, "we waste $700,000,000 worth of food a year," they propose "an aggressive governmental policy," both to check this waste and, for the period of the war, to secure enlistments for agricultural service. To many this policy will seem the first step towards governmental price-fixing, a departure full of difficulties, both economic and legal. It is one thing to forbid a combine to raise prices, but quite another to set a maximum price upon commodities. Apart, however, from reasons of expediency, and of constitutionality as at present interpreted, the Government has the right and, should no other way of protecting the worker from exploitation be at its disposal, the duty of assuming this office.

EDUCATION

The Greekless Graduate

HE was a polished product of Dr. Flexner's "Modern School," which anathematizes, among other traditional subjects, the Greek classics. As he slid noiselessly into a cushioned chair in the Pullman, a glow of honest pride suffused his face at the thought of his successful completion of the modern course. Safely tucked away in his suitcase was the precious diploma asserting that the Greekless graduate was proficient in typewriting, civics, athletics, elocution, dancing, arithmetic, English literature and settlement work. "What a blessing," he purred, noticing an elderly man beside him, reading a pocket edition of Plato, "that less than one per cent of the high school and college students in the land are studying Greek." "How did he know the Platonist was reading Greek, if he was himself Greekless?" you ask. The answer is easy. Somebody had once showed him what Greek looks like, and it made a dire impression on him, as the sign of the Apocalyptic beast.

The Glacier Goddess

THE Greekless one then produced a Shelley. "Arethusa," he read, "arose from her couch of snows in the Acroceraunian mountains." "Ah," he mused, "she must have been a glacier goddess. But I wonder what that 'Acroceraunian' means. I imagine Shelley used it just for the sound." In the next stanza he wondered likewise what was means by "Alpheus," "Erymanthus," "Dorian" and finally "Enna's mountains," "asphodel," and "Ortygian" shore. Of course he had, as the diploma averred, an exhaustive knowledge of English literature, although he had mistaken the fountain Arethusa for a glacier goddess, which was one goddess unknown by the Greeks, and he had missed seven words in the text. Similar, or worse mistakes, would be made by him throughout the entire range of English literature from Chaucer to Francis Thompson. Still he honestly felt that he might know more about it, so he asked the Greekful one beside him. "You see," he apologized.

"I have no notes in this edition or I could have learned everything worth knowing about that text without knowing a line of Greek." "That's just where I disagree," said the Platonist. "After all, I told you only the surface meaning of the words. To you they are mere pale ghosts, abstractions. To me they bring a wealth of association, intimation, allusion and imaginative background. It would take at least a hundred lines of parallel passages, translated from the original, to make those words anything more than shadows to you."

Translated Classics

"WELL," retorted the Greekless one. "Why can't I get a book that has the hundred lines of parallel passages, and all the associations of the original? Then I need no more Greek than before." "Possibly so," rejoined Greekful, "but I used to think that one reason a man went to college was to acquire a knowledge of the tongues on which English rests, so that he would not have to carry a full set of the Britannica with him wherever he went. At your rate of commentary, a pocket edition of Shelley could not be transported except on a truck. Besides, I didn't mean that the translated passages would give you any adequate idea of the original. Your assumption that literature can be set from one tongue to another is false to facts. Languages are almost as distinct media of thought-transference, as air and ether waves are distinct media of material energy. You can get certain effects with light, that you cannot get with sound. In the same way you can get certain effects with Greek, that you cannot get with English. Translate a Murillo that depends on light waves for its effect, into a creation of Beethoven that depends on sound waves, and you may be able to take literature out of Greek and put it into English."

The Genius of Language

"COME now," said the Greekless graduate. "Don't you think you have overreached yourself? Your analogy is somewhat strained. Do you mean to tell me that when I read a translation of Aristotle or Plato, or Homer, I am not getting as much as is in the original?"

"I admit," replied the Platonist, "that the analogy is somewhat strained when applied to philosophical or scientific translations, because these deal with the universal and the abstract. That's why Cardinal Newman said that the multiplication table was the most gifted of all conceivable compositions, because it loses nothing by translation. But even here the analogy is not altogether strained. Scientists consider Greek more perfect than English even in scientific, universal words. But I deny that philosophy or science is literature. And I deny that the analogy is strained if applied to literature, which deals with the unit, the particular, the concrete, the personal.

"Well, I don't like your glittering generalities," Greekless replied. "I would like to know just what Greek can do that English cannot."

"That is not so easy to say," I grant you," replied the Platonist. "Each language has its genius, its capacities and its limitations just as any man of genius has. A poet, for instance, is narrow in so far as he is not a painter or scientist. In the same way Greek is narrow inasmuch as it is not English, and vice-versa. The man who has English alone is narrow to the extent that he does not know Greek. It is the business of refined scholarship to discover and feel the subtle laws that govern the genius of a language. It is easier for us to see that the spirit of a language is outraged, than to say precisely what are its peculiar capabilities."

"Well, give me at least an idea of what you mean."

The Classical Backgrounds

"CARLYLE is a good example. Either he did not understand the genius of English in certain points, or, if he did, he violated it. A typical flaw is his use of English compound words, after the manner of German or Greek. He tries in other ways to twist English as though it were German, and he uses word-formations and constructions that would tax the strength even of German. However, in some respects, Carlyle illustrates fairly well the genius of our language. He shows how many things can be done with English that are not according to its laws and principles. With Shelley, but in a different way, he shows that Greek is necessary for a thorough knowledge of English."

"Dr. Flexner doesn't agree with you. He ought to know, because he is the founder of the Modern School."

"Dr. Flexner is very much like the lawyer, or doctor, or engineer who would tell the members of these professions that most of what they have held as true for the last two thousand years is wrong. Such critics would hardly get a patient hearing. Why is it that only in education, where souls are at stake, men will listen to a sciolist whose teaching reflects on the intelligence of every great leader of the past?"

I don't know whether the Greekless graduate was convinced that Dr. Flexner had deceived him, and the world, by giving him a diploma certifying to his perfect knowledge of English. But he certainly relapsed into his Shelley with more submission than a graduate of the Modern School is taught to assume.

NOTE AND COMMENT

New York Merchants' Anti-Fly Campaign

"BEWARE of the Dangerous House Fly" is the warning message sent out by the New York Merchants' Association. The national appeal of the President in the great war crisis is almost overshadowed by this latest proclamation: "As a practical measure of preparedness the disease-carrying house fly must be eliminated. American military records show that it causes more deaths than the enemy." Then follows the sanguinary edict:

> Kill at once every fly that you can find and burn its body. The killing of just one fly means that there will be billions and trillions less next summer. The fly has no equal as a germ-carrier. As many as 500,000,000 germs have been found in and on the body of a single fly. It is definitely known that the fly is the "carrier" of the germs of typhoid fever. It is widely believed that it is also the "carrier" of other diseases, including possibly infantile paralysis. Clean up your own premises; and see and insist that your neighbor do likewise. The farming and suburban districts provide ideal breeding places, and the new-born flies do not remain at their birthplace, but migrate to towns and cities, using railroads and other means of transportation. Kill flies and save lives.

We are instructed that formaldehyde and sodium salicylate are the best fly poisons. A mixture, in equal parts, of cream, ground pepper and brown sugar is likewise recommended. Flies abhor the scent of lavender, geranium, mignonette, honeysuckle, and in general of all odors that are pleasing to man, and their hatred of blue is said by a French scientist to be "intense."

The Tip System Legalized

THE tip system has recently been legalized by the appellate division of the New York Supreme Court for the third department by a decision to the effect that tips, if not too large, are to be considered as wages. The principle found its application in the case of the wife and son of a taxicab driver who was killed. A demand was made that the award of compensation should be based on wages that covered both the money paid by the taxicab company and the tips paid by the customers. In approving this demand Presiding Judge Kellogg said:

> The employee could not have received the tips if the employer had not put him in the way of getting them, and we may well conclude that the tips were an advantage received from the employer similar in effect to board, lodging or rent furnished in addition to the money wages paid. The person rendering the service considers that the tip is his as a matter of right, and involves no particular favor. An extra large tip may be appropriated, but the ordinary tip is considered a payment of money actually due.

The usual tips are thus considered by the court as "part payment of the wages which the employer compels the person served to pay." Trade unionists on the contrary protest against the tip system and urge instead the payment of a definite living wage.

Socialists and the Holy Father

THE International Catholic Truth Society quotes the following words from an editorial that appeared in the English socialistic Labor Leader:

> When all the terrible carnage is over there are few men who will have less reason to be ashamed of the part they have played than the Pope. In face of all mother countries, or countries which call themselves mothers, the Pope has shown himself today the father of men. . . . Holy Father, you alone recall the laws of human brotherhood. I ask you to accept all the homage of my respect.

Among the deeds which have everywhere won for the Holy Father words of unstinted praise are his successful efforts to bring about an exchange of disabled war prisoners, the interning and nursing in Swiss hospitals of an equal number of prisoners from each of the contending forces, and the establishment of bureaux of information that enable relatives to get into touch with "missing" soldiers. So, likewise, when it was found that "the French were concentrating German prisoners in the unhealthy tracts of Dahomey, and the Germans retaliated by sending the French to the eastern marshes," the intervention of the Pope brought about the withdrawal of both these measures.

A List of Catholic Conventions

PRELIMINARY announcements of annual conventions have been sent out by various Catholic organizations. The meeting of the American Federation of Catholic Societies is set for August 26-29, and will be held at Kansas City, Mo. A new plan of organizing the Federation on diocesan lines, with the diocese as the unit instead of the county or State, has been proposed to the hierarchy. The annual convention of the Catholic Educational Association will meet at Buffalo, June 25-28. Through the courtesy of the Oblate Fathers of Mary Immaculate, the sessions will be held at Holy Angels' School. The Supreme Convention of the Knights of Columbus is to take place at Point Comfort, Va., commencing August 1. The Central Verein will hold its sixty-second General Convention at St. Louis, August 16-20, and at the same time celebrate the silver jubilee of the Catholic Union of Missouri. A special souvenir volume, narrating the history of the Catholic Church in the middle Mississippi valley, with special reference to the work of German Catholics, is under preparation. The convention of the Catholic Hospital Association is announced for August 29-31. and will take place at Chicago. The Catholic Press Association of the United States and Canada is to hold its meetings immediately before the convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, August 24 and 25, at Kansas City, Mo.

Eleanor Cecilia Donnelly

MISS ELEANOR CECILIA DONNELLY, for many years a widely known American Catholic poet, died May 1, at the Convent of Villa Maria, in West Chester, Pa. Catholics of the present generation have been familiar with her verses from their school-primer days. Her works are filled with the beauty and sweetness of religion, and the musical rhythm of her lines has no doubt greatly helped to give enduring popularity to many of her poems. She is known as "the Adelaide Procter of America," and her name, like that of Longfellow, is a household word in American Catholic homes. Her "Vision of the Monk Gabriel" is said to have furnished the latter with the theme of his "Legend Beautiful." That her reputation is not merely local is evident from the fact that some thirty volumes of her prose and poetry have found a place on the shelves of the British Museum Library. She was honored by receiving the special Apostolic Benediction of Pope Leo XIII and Pope Pius X, and was chosen to write the Jubilee Ode for Pope Leo XIII. Miss Donnelly was born at Philadelphia and was the sister of the famous Minnesota statesman and Baconian cryptogram advocate, Ignatius Donnelly.

German-American Patriotism

THE leading article in Collier's, May 5, deals with the subject of German-American loyalty to the Stars and Stripes. Its author, Henry J. Allen, speaks in passing of the achievements which have made German-Americans "in this hour a great national asset, and not a liability to worry over." He then recounts some of their military services rendered the country in the past:

> They will tell you of Washington's German bodyguard, of the German sharpshooters from Pennsylvania and Maryland, whose deadly fame struck more terror to British redcoats than a German Zeppelin now occasions in London. There were several divisions of these grim marksmen, and each man wore upon the breast of his homespun uniform in big letters, "Liberty or Death." They will tell you of St. Leger in the Mohawk Valley and of Herchheimer at Fort Stanwix. They will give you incidents of General Johann Kalb and his closing words upon the battlefield at Camden: "This is the death I have longed for. I am dying for a country fighting for justice and liberty." They will tell you that Friedrich Wilhelm August von Steuben, a German baron, reared in the school of Frederick the Great, was the chief organizer of Washington's army. He was an experienced soldier and transformed the "army" at Valley Forge into an efficient fighting machine. You would not have time to wait while they told you of all the names in the galaxy of their Revolutionary heroes. They will want you to know of the record of soldiery the German-Americans have made from the beginning; of the 187,858 who fought in the Union army during the Civil War. And if you question it they get out "The German-American Handbook" printed in 1916, and they show you the authority from official records. Generally they want you to note that it was greater than the contribution in men of any other race of hyphenated Americans. The Irish gave us 144,221, but the British Americans only 53,532. Thus saith the book, and that is why it was written. They will inform you of $600,000,000 of German-American money that went into Government bonds when the Union needed war money. But why enumerate? Bronze figures of their generals, who have fought for us in every war, greet the Americans in well-kept parks all the way from Boston to San Francisco. Their biographies have become a rich part of our heritage from the past.

So the writer continues, telling of Molly Pitcher, whose name was Marie Ludwig, and of General Custer, whose forefathers had for the convenience of their English neighbors thus modified their German name, Küster. "You'll find no manufacturing thing in which German-Americans have not made good," he adds. "They have pioneered in printing, in fabric making, in agriculture and things too numerous to mention, but in no department of human activity have they given forth a truer ring than in the expression of their everyday citizenship."

The War.—On the Western front the offensive during the past week has been for the most part on the side of the Germans, who have been making repeated attempts to retake the positions recently lost by them at Fresnoy to the British and on the Craonne plateau to the French. Against the latter all their efforts have proved ineffectual, but they succeeded in recapturing Fresnoy and in pushing back the British for a short distance west of the town. The British by counter-attacks were able to regain some of the lost territory and are again in the immediate vicinity of Fresnoy, but the town itself is still in German hands. Further south the British have advanced on a front of three miles, capturing the Roeux cemetery, the Calvary farm, which are both strong positions, and almost all of Bullecourt. On other fronts there has been fighting, desultory near Riga, along the Dvina and in Galicia, severe in the vicinity of Lake Doiran, and intermittent along the Italian front, but in none of these places has anything of importance been accomplished.

Bulletin, May 7, p.m.-May 14, a.m.

After concluding their deliberations the conferees appointed by the Senate and the House to adjust differences on the Army bill, made their joint report to both houses. The most important points on which a compromise was reached were as follows: The age set for liability to conscription was fixed at from twenty-one to thirty, inclusive; the amendment of the Senate authorizing the raising of a volunteer army for immediate service in France was discarded; the Prohibition section was reported in such a form as to make it a misdemeanor to sell liquor in camps or to men in uniform, but the part forbidding the gift of liquor was omitted; the clause on exemption was framed so as to free absolutely from liability to conscription officers of the United States and of the several States, ministers of religion, and students of theological and divinity schools; exemption from conscription for military service was retained in the bill for members of any well-recognized religious sect or organigation whose existing creed forbids participation in war, but such persons were made liable for non-combative service.

The Army Bill

After the bill had been reported to the House, a stormy debate on the Roosevelt amendment, as it is popularly called, took place, at the close of which the House by a vote of 215 to 178, recommitted the bill to its conferees with instructions to restore the clause which provides for the raising of a volunteer force. When the House action was made known in the Senate the report was withdrawn and sent back to conference. The bill will not be ready for the President's signature until it has been passed by both Houses in the form finally reported by the conferees.

Director Rogers of the Census Bureau has announced that approximately 10,000,000 men between the ages of 21 and 30 will have to answer the President's first call should the age section as now agreed on finally pass. This figure represents about ten per cent. of the total population of the country which is estimated to be between 103,000,000 and 104,000,000. The men liable for military service under the conscription measure are distributed among the States, roughly, as follows:

Alabama, 209,900; Arizona, 34,700; Arkansas, 156,600; California, 362,000; Colorado, 109,500; Connecticut, 123,600; Delaware, 20,100; Florida, 93,300; Georgia, 255,400; Idaho, 51,800; Illinois, 629,500; Indiana, 253,600; Iowa, 199,000; Kansas, 175,000; Kentucky, 202,200; Louisiana, 171,000; Maine, 63,000; Maryland, 121,500; Massachusetts, 355,400; Michigan, 288,100; Minnesota, 244,700; Mississippi, 175,100; Missouri, 315,600; Montana, 73,300; Nebraska, 129,400; Nevada, 16,500; New Hampshire, 36,800; New Jersey, 300,200; New Mexico, 41,500; New York, 1,068,000; North Carolina, 194,400; North Dakota, 89,000; Ohio, 494,300; Oklahoma, 213,500; Oregon, 108,100; Pennsylvania, 874,000; Rhode Island, 60,300; South Carolina, 137,100; South Dakota, 80,500; Tennessee, 195,080; Texas, 420,200; Utah, 46,200; Vermont, 29,400; Virginia, 186,400; Washington, 217,400; West Virginia, 141,600; Wisconsin, 229,500; Wyoming, 35,400, and District of Columbia, 37,400.

On the basis of these figures, which have been submitted to the War Department, one man out of every twenty of those liable for military service will be drafted in order to make up the first army of 500,000

Further discussion of the censorship section of the Espionage bill led to the introduction by Senator Thomas of a modified form of the amendment offered by Senator Cummins which read as follows:

The Espionage Bill

In time of war the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate rules and regulations for the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public and thereby to the enemy of information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations or with respect to any works intended for the fortification and defense of any place; and whosoever in time of war shall wilfully violate any such rule or regulation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment; provided, however, that no such rule or regulation shall apply to the proceedings of the Congress of the United States, nor to the debates therein.

As this amendment removed the most drastic features of the measure and restricted the proposed censorship to information concerning military matters, it was thought by its supporters that it might pass. Even in this form, however, it was argued that it might be interpreted so as to restrict unnecessarily the freedom of the press. Accordingly it was finally defeated in the Senate by a vote of thirty-nine to thirty-eight. Senator Kirby tried to effect a compromise by proposing an amendment, providing for a definite and specific press-censorship under the Secretaries of War and the Navy. This was rejected by a vote of sixty-five to five. As the House has passed the censorship section, and the Senate has thrown it out altogether, the matter will probably be referred to a conference of both houses.

The Senate has rescinded its action of last week by which it restricted the powers conferred on the President to put an embargo on supplies to be shipped out of the country. A modified form of the original embargo section of the Espionage bill was adopted after a debate behind closed doors. The text runs:

Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export from the United States to any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation except at such time or times and under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress; provided, however, that no preferences shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

The Senate also passed without a record vote an amendment proposed by Senator Reed to limit the effectiveness of the whole bill to the duration of the present war.

The Ways and Means Committee reported to the House on May 9 a War Revenue bill. According to the report made by Chairman Kitchin, "The war expenses for the remainder of this and the whole of next fiscal year are estimated to be about $3,800,000,000, exclusive of the $3,000,000,000 bond issue to finance the foreign loans." The bond issue of $2,000,000,000 already authorized, leaves a deficit of $1,800,000,000. This the Committee suggests should be raised by increasing income and excess profit taxes, internal revenue rates and custom duties. The bill aims at making the present generation "bear a fair and equitable portion of the burden of financing the war."

The War Revenue Bill

The main provisions of the bill are thus summarized by the New York Sun:

All articles on the free list to be taxed 10 per cent. Tariff on all articles on the dutiable list increased 10 per cent. Income tax provisions levy 2 per cent in addition to normal rate, with exemptions at $1,000 and $2,000 respectively for unmarried and married persons. Supertaxes begin on incomes exceeding $5,000 a year and reach a final total of 33 per cent on net incomes exceeding $500,000. Two per cent additional tax on incomes of corporations, insurance companies and partnerships. (New clause —a retroactive tax of 33 1-3 per cent of rates existing under the old law and applied to incomes for calendar year 1916.) Excess profits tax of 8 per cent additional upon incomes of corporations and partnerships. Taxes increased on wines, liquors and beer. Taxes on transportation of property and persons by rail or water, on telegraphic, telephonic and electric service, based on cost of service. Five per cent tax on advertising or advertising space other than in newspapers and periodicals. Taxes on life, marine, inland, fire and casualty insurance, with certain exemptions. Five per cent tax on automobiles and motorcycles, on tires and musical instruments. Moving-picture films, jewelry, pleasure boats and sporting goods are also taxed. Graduated tax on paid admissions to entertainments, charitable affairs excepted. Users of adhesive stamps employed in taxation must put their initials on them. Increased tax on inheritances.

The bill has called forth a great deal of adverse criticism in Congress, and it is believed that in its present form nothing more was contemplated than a tentative scheme which will undergo a good deal of revision before it is acceptable.

Apart from the conferences on the conduct of the war in which the commissioners from France and Great Britain have taken part, and in which close cooperation has been planned, their visit to the United States has had another important effect in arousing enthusiasm for the common cause and in calling forth popular expressions of the friendship entertained by this country for the Allies. The spontaneous welcome accorded the distinguished visitors both in the Senate and the House, and the reception given their words when they availed themselves of the unusual privilege granted them of addressing both bodies, although unprecedented in its heartiness, has found an echo throughout the country wherever they have gone.

Receptions to the Commissioners

Extraordinary demonstrations greeted Marshal Joffre and his fellow-commissioners in all the cities they visited, especially in Chicago, St. Louis and Boston. In New York City immense throngs, estimated roughly as close to 1,000,000 people, crowded the line of march, and by their acclamations and cheers moved the envoys as, by their own confessions, they had never been moved before.

Secretary Lansing has closed one of the channels of information through which newspaper men have hitherto been able to obtain expert information concerning international questions. The officials of the State Department have been instructed not to talk with newspaper men "even on insignificant matters of fact or details." In the future information on such subjects will be given to the public by the Secretary of State or the newly created Bureau of Foreign Intelligence. The other Departments of the Government have not followed the lead of the State Department. The Government has begun to issue an Official Bulletin to which the widest possible publicity is given, brought out daily under order of the President by the Committee on Public Information, of which Mr. George Creel is the chairman, with the Secretaries of State, War and Navy as members. Its purpose has been summarized as follows:

Other Items

> It is proposed to present in its columns all proclamations and executive orders issued by the President; rules and regulations promulgated by the Federal departments; official bulletins and statements; statutes bearing on the war and their construction and all other subjects related to the prosecution of the war, to which publicity properly may be given.

The first uniformed force officially reported to sail for the front consists of a body of 240 medical men, recently mustered into the United States Medical Army Corps. This force is to be raised as soon as practicable to 2,000. It will operate under the direction of the British, but will remain as a separate American unit, flying the colors of the United States. Another force, which is to sail in the near future, is a body of highly trained railroad men for work on communication lines. It is to have a strength of between 11,000 and 12,000 men, divided into nine regiments, and made up of volunteers. They will have the usual equipment of engineer troops, but will be occupied exclusively with the work of railroad operation and construction.

To reinforce the effectiveness of the American National Red Cross, President Wilson has created a Red Cross War Council, and appointed as its chairman Mr. Henry P. Davison, the well-known financier. Although it is planned to bring about close general cooperation between the Red Cross and the military branch of the Government, the present work of the Council will be concerned mainly with raising funds through voluntary contributions.

Ireland.—According to dispatches from London, Joseph McGuinness, a Sinn Feiner, serving a three-year sentence in prison for his part in the Easter rising in Dublin over a year ago, has been elected to the House of Commons. At a special election, held to fill the vacancy for the southern division of the County Longford, Mr. McGuinness won by a majority of thirty-seven over Mr. Patrick McKenna, Nationalist. The figures for the Sinn Fein candidate were 1,498, for the Nationalist 1,461. It is agreed on all sides that the consequence of the election may be of the gravest import and that the choice of Mr. McGuinness may open a new chapter in Irish history. It is felt and has been stated by observers in the closest touch with the political movement in Ireland, that the result in South Longford, repudiating as it does the Nationalist candidate and the policies of the Nationalist Party, would undoubtedly be repeated, not perhaps generally throughout Ireland, but in a considerable number of constituencies, if events should prove that the guarantees on the faith of which Mr. John Redmond and the Nationalist Parliamentary Party invited their countrymen to join in the sacrifices of the Allies for the common cause, were proved to be worthless. Everywhere throughout Ireland, there is, we are informed from many different sources, a feeling of distrust, dissatisfaction, disappointment and almost despair at the long delay in settling the fate of the country. The Prime Minister, it is announced, is again to make a statement on the question this week.

Sinn Feiner Elected

Italy.—The Catholic press of the country has not failed to voice an eloquent protest against the unwarranted action of the Government in its petty interference with the autonomy of the primary schools. Time and again the Government has meddled with the management of these schools, and Catholic editors and writers begin to realize that there is a well-organized attempt to restrict the liberty of education, particularly where there is question of Catholic schools. And this, they maintain, is only one indication out of many, during the past forty years, of a movement towards State monopoly of all rights in matters of education. Some six years or so ago the control of these elementary schools was taken out of the hands of the communes or town-councils and placed in the hands of a provincial board of more than a dozen members and some extra officers. Of these the majority were State nominees, and by limitations placed upon the minority, the power of the latter was gradually reduced, and the State became the predominant factor. That this was a great evil both owing to its encroachment on local rights, and also on account of the attempt, everywhere apparent, to secularize or "laicize" education, was generally felt by Catholics. But now the State purposes to carry its control still further. The number of members constituting the provincial board has been lessened, while the number of State nominees has been increased, and the elective element has also been diminished, the result being that almost all the authority has been taken from local bodies and vested in a central board practically constituted and controlled by the State. Protests are springing up on all sides against the arbitrary action of the Government and Catholics especially are denouncing what they consider an infringement of their rights in the matter of the education of their children.

Secularizing Education

Russia.—That the quarrel between the Provisional Government and the Executive Committee of the Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates is a serious menace to Russia's future is clear from a proclamation posted up throughout Petrograd by the Provisional Government, on May 10. The document frankly proposed a coalition government, which would be composed of "representatives of the live creative forces of the country who hitherto have not taken an active part in the administration of the State." The reasons for this proposal, the proclamation explained, are these:

Coalition Government Proposed

> The Provisional Government sought to rely on moral forces. Not a drop of the people's blood has been shed by its fault. No voice has been stifled. Unfortunately, the new social elements are too slowly welding—and unsatisfactorily. The welding has been hampered by the process of disintegration provoked by the collapse of the old régime. Isolated groups of certain classes of the population, lacking conscientiousness, seek to realize their aspirations through violence. They threaten to destroy discipline and internal policy and thus create anarchy. Therefore the Provisional Government believes it a duty to declare frankly that this state of things is rendering the administration of the country difficult. It may lead to internal disorders, defeat at the front, phantom anarchy and civil war—threatening the liberty which arises before Russia.

The Provisional Government's offer brought out the fact that the Socialists, as represented by the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, have no desire to share responsibility for the government of the country. The majority of the leaders of the Petrograd Council thought a coalition cabinet impracticable, and news came on May 12, that the Executive Committee of the Council decided, by a vote of twenty-three to twenty-two, not to share in a coalition. The Socialists seem to realize their limitations and frankly own that they are not prepared to assume governmental responsibility. But they insist upon their right to dictate to the Provisional Government.

In a meeting held at Petrograd, May 11, the Executive Committee of the Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates adopted and ordered published the following resolutions regarding a peace movement:

Socialists' Peace Conference

> (1) To convoke a conference of the Socialist International. (2) To invite to the conference representatives of all parties and factions of the international proletariat agreeing with the Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates' appeal to the peoples of the world. (3) To form a special commission of the representatives of the Executive Committee and one representative of each of the Socialist parties to organize the conference and arrange a program. (4) To publish immediately an appeal to the peoples of the world and a special appeal to the Socialists in allied countries concerning the convocation of a peace conference. (5) To send a delegation of the Executive Committee to neutral and allied countries and to establish contact with the Socialist Delegates at Stockholm. (6) The peace conferences to take place in a neutral country. (7) The committee, recognizing as a necessary condition that free passage be accorded to all parties and factions without distinction, requests that all parties in said countries demand from their Governments free passage for their delegates.

A few days before this resolution was adopted the Russian Socialists received from Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, a cablegram protesting against the "pro-Kaiser Socialist interpretation of the demand for no annexations."

"Should we not rather accept the better interpretation," he asked, "that there must be no forcible annexations, but that every people must be free to choose any allegiance it desires, as demanded by the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies?" He assured the Russian people of the "whole-hearted support and cooperation of the American people in the great war against our common enemy, Kaiserism."

Considerable anxiety is felt at Washington regarding the result of this peace movement. It is hoped that the American commission to Russia will reach there in time to counteract the strong German influences that are reported to be at work in Russia. The personnel of the commission is now complete and is made up of the following members: Elihu Root of New York, chairman; Charles R. Crane of Illinois, Chicago manufacturer and business man; John R. Mott of New York, General Secretary International Committee of Y. M. C. A.; Cyrus McCormick, President of the International Harvester Company; Samuel R. Bertron, banker, of New York; James Duncan, Vice-President of the American Federation of Labor; Charles Edward Russell of New York, author and Socialist; Major-Gen. Hugh L. Scott, Chief of Staff, United States army, and Rear Admiral James H. Glennon, U. S. N. The mission's object is to give the Provisional Government assurance of our moral and material support, and to assist in keeping the radical Socialists from making a separate peace with Germany.

The American Mission

News came on May 12 of the formation of a strong agrarian party among the peasants, who are said to have seized 150,000,000 acres of land. Unwilling to wait till the Constituent Assembly could gather and solve the agrarian problem, the peasants of many sections in Russia met and decided by popular vote to confiscate and distribute the lands. Thousands of soldiers are reported to have left the front in order to share in the allotments of property, and naturally this has impaired the morale of the army. Indeed the condition of the troops is causing the Provisional Government great concern. Minister of War Guchkoff confessed to the Duma that "destruction is getting the better of creative work, our military power is weakening and crumbling, and the country is on the verge of ruin." Another indication of the critical state of affairs was the resignation on May 13 of General Korniloff, commander of the Petrograd garrison, because the Committee of the Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates demanded that all Korniloff's orders should first be presented to the Committee for endorsement.

Land Seizures

Luther's Life-Work

HERBERT THURSTON, S.J.

WHEN Luther in October, 1517, published his famous ninety-five theses against Indulgences, he gave the first conspicuous proof of that quality which more than anything else enabled him to influence the destinies of the generation in which he lived. He was not a profound thinker, nor a speaker of extraordinary eloquence. Still less was he conspicuously raised above his fellows by the elevation of his moral character. But he had a ready comprehension of the currents of thought which swayed the contemporary world, and he had the skill, always coupled with an unbounded energy, to put himself at the head of the religious unrest by appealing to his countrymen on their weakest and most approachable side. Let it not be supposed that this is the same as saying that the Reformer was an unprincipled demagogue who had no higher aim than to exploit the passions of the multitude in his own interest. Such a contention would certainly be quite unwarranted. Luther to begin with, was Kerndeutsch, German to the core, and he exhibited in a high degree that combination of sentiment and bruskness which, as Mgr. Baudrillart contends, is characteristic of the Teutonic temperament. The same people who took a Gargantuan delight in the incredible violence of his invective were moved even to tears when they read how Dr. Martin Luther was touched by the pathos of a bunch of frozen violets and had striven with his own warm breath to thaw them back to life again.

Further he was a man of deep convictions, if one may apply that term to beliefs which have not been so much developed by a process of reasoning as by such moral factors as fretfulness under mental trials, impatience of contradiction and boundless self-confidence. But, however arrived at and however firmly held, the principles of the Reformer were all such as flattered human nature. He may have had opposition to encounter from institutions and individuals, but so far as the instincts of the masses went, he systematically rowed with the stream. No one who reads those three soberer writings of Luther which are sometimes called the primary works, can fail to realize how they made their appeal to that spirit of independence which it is always easy to stimulate by skilful flattery. In each tractate the root idea was emancipation, the casting off of some supposed form of tyranny. He began in the indulgence strife with the very popular pretext of emancipating his countrymen's pockets. He went on to emancipate their minds and ended by emancipating their morals. All Luther's teaching and all his personal example were in the direction of relaxation, and it was already an over-lax age. How could the results be otherwise than disastrous?

For, think for a moment, what were Luther's distinctive doctrines? What was that message of the Evangel which he considered himself commissioned by the Most High to make known to a bemused and demoralized world? Justification by faith alone, without works, the Bible as the only rule of faith, private judgment, the implicit denial of free-will, the universal priesthood of all Christian men, and with this a moral teaching which more or less formally recognized that under certain circumstances human frailty was incapable of obeying the precept of continence, and which consequently was prepared to make room for divorce or even for bigamy. To the man who has studied the history of the age, who knows something of the conditions generated by the invention of printing and the consequent revival of letters, and who understands the wide-spread social unrest and the undoubted increase in the superstitious and formalist elements of popular religion, the application of Luther's remedy will appear the most dangerous experiment that Europe has ever witnessed. It was as if a social reformer should find himself in a community of confirmed inebriates and should say to them: "My friends, what is wrong with you is that you have never learned self-control. Your masters have told you that alcoholic drink is poison and have kept it under lock and key. That is a fatal mistake. I, who was once a total abstainer myself, have come to release you from this foolish tyranny. I tell you that in future all restraints will be removed; you will be free to help yourselves. But I exhort you to practise self-restraint and then all will be well with you." Undoubtedly in such advice there would be an element of truth. But while men were ready enough to accept that part of Luther's doctrine which was agreeable to their desires, to cast off, in other words, all restraints upon their freedom, they saw no need to bind themselves again in fetters of their own forging. Luther in 1517 professed to discern that it was evil for men to lose their fear of God by putting their trust in the Pope's pardons. But was not his principle of salvation by faith alone just as insidiously subversive of all well-doing? Was it good for the rude German peasant, ignorant of theological subtleties, to be taught to look upon the Evangel and the Law as things fundamentally opposed? Was he likely to be drawn nearer to God by hearing that "The Christian or baptized man cannot, even if he would, lose his salvation by any sins however great, unless he refuses to believe; for no sins whatever can condemn him, but unbelief alone"? These words occur in one of the most widely popular of Luther's primary works ("The Babylonish Captivity," c. 3) and the writer goes on to insist on the worthlessness of confession, satisfaction and even of contrition as "mere vanity and vexation of spirit." Is not such teaching on the very face of it far more fatally liable to popular misconception and abuse than an over-great reliance on Papal indulgences? So, too, in the matter of Luther's equivalent denial of free-will, could the consequences be otherwise than evil? The Lutheran authors of the "Book of Concord," writing fifty years after the Reformer's great controversy with Erasmus, speak plainly enough in these words:

> It is not unknown to us that this holy doctrine of the malice and impotence of free-will, the doctrine whereby our conversion and regeneration are ascribed solely to God and in no way to our own power, has been godlessly, shamefully and hatefully abused. . . . Many are becoming immoral and savage and neglectful of all pious exercises. They say: "Since we cannot turn to God of our own natural power, let us remain hostile to God or wait until He converts us by force and in spite of ourselves."

Even more disastrously inevitable were the logical consequences of the principle of private judgment. By the same right in virtue of which Luther, almost in so many words, claimed to be his own infallible pope, Carlstadt demanded a similar privilege for himself, and indeed the whole array of the Reform under such men as Zwingli, Agricola, Schenk, Münzer, Egranus, Schwenckfeld and innumerable others, split up into many warring camps which the elder heresiarch denounced with indiscriminate ferocity. To tell the story of these contests or of the peasant revolt, or of the horrible fate of the Münster Anabaptists would be impossible here, but it is no exaggeration to recognize these horrible convulsions as the direct outcome of Luther's teaching. One single illustration must suffice. It may be found in the moral and religious fate of Wittenberg which 700 years ago was the scene of that first dramatic defiance of Papal authority and which had been more than any other spot the theater of Luther's own personal ministration of the Evangel. Writing to Duke John, the Elector, in May, 1530, Luther spoke proudly of the excellent generation that was growing up around him, conspicuous for their good dispositions and conduct and their knowledge of Holy Scripture. "It rejoices my heart," he said, "to see our young people—boys and even girls—understanding God and Christ better, having a purer faith and praying with more fervent effect than all the old episcopal schools and most famous religious houses put together." Fifteen years after, at the very close of his days, Luther denounced Wittenberg as nothing better than a Sodom and declared he would never return there. "I would rather," he wrote, "spend my poor last days in begging my bread than in beholding the wickedness of Wittenberg and in the bitter reflection that all my labor and pains have been utterly thrown away." Such words form a sad epitaph, and they are typical, it is to be feared, not only of the personal career of the wonderfully gifted leader, but also of the history of Lutheranism both in modern Germany and throughout the world.

A Reasonable Holiday

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

THE problem of a summer vacation is just now engaging the attention of many people. Parents wish to know not only what to do for themselves but above all what to do for their children, especially for their adolescent boys and girls whose long vacation should be spent in such a way as to be most beneficial to them for the coming school year.

Now it so happens that this country was given an excellent example of a successful vacation for young men, by the course of events last year. The President of the United States asked about 100,000 men to take a vacation on the Texas border. As the men came from all ranks of life and from all kinds of cities, towns and villages, the enforced experiment was complete enough to justify some rather broad conclusions.

The result of the trial is before the people in the form of the improved health of those who took part in it. I feel sure that it is no exaggeration to say that 95 per cent of those who went into camp came back better than they went and, in most cases, better than they had ever been before. Some who were stout and flabby returned thin and athletic, others who were slight returned heavier.

There were, of course, a few exceptions. There were some deaths from pneumonia; some of the men contracted dysentery, and some suffered from intestinal disorders by adding indiscreetly to the rations provided for them, but, as a rule, the men returned to their homes robust and active.

Without a doubt this was a successful vacation. And it is the easiest thing in the world to follow the régime. Get up promptly at an early hour, work in the open a while before breakfast, or sometimes take breakfast and then begin a long walk. In any case indulge in strenuous exercise in the open air for four or five hours in the morning, and then, having had nothing since a rather meager breakfast of substantial food, take an equally meager dinner of good, plain dishes, then rest for a while. After this there should be more exercise, then supper followed by some relaxation, music, for instance, and finally bed at nine o'clock, not in a closed room, however, but in a tent, if possible.

But where will all this be done? The President's order of last year supplies an answer to the question. Our young men were sent to the Texas border in May and June and remained there during the summer months. Were a medical man consulted, he would, no doubt, declare that the worst place in the United States for a holiday is the Mexican border. It is hot, dusty, very dry and uncomfortable; the nights are hot as well as the days, and there are many insects to make life still more uncomfortable.

There was an army-experience on the border just after our Civil War that is very interesting. The French had helped to set up Maximilian as Emperor of Mexico, and as soon as the war was over, General Sheridan with a fair army consisting of veterans, including the cavalrymen of Sheridan's own troops, was stationed there. For some three years, I believe, General Sheridan was the Commander of the Department of the Southwest, with headquarters in Texas. When he returned, according to a well known story, he was asked how he liked Texas. "Like Texas!" he cried. "If I owned hell and Texas, I would rent Texas and live on the rest of my estate." I understand too that an irate Texan hearing of this remark wrote this vigorous protest to General Sheridan: "Of course Texas is a pioneer State and the society is not all that might be desired, and there are portions of the year when the climate might be better, but Texas is a great and glorious State." To this General Sheridan replied that so far as he knew the only real objections to the infernal regions were precisely the society and the climate.

Nevertheless it was to Texas that our young men were sent. Yet they came away in better health than ever before. It is not the place of the holiday that counts but the mode of the vacation and people who are taking it. The chief beneficial element in the life of the soldiers on "vacation" was the discipline. They got up and went to bed at definite hours, they did very definite and rather hard outside work, they exercised all their muscles in various ways, they ate plain but substantial and thoroughly nutritious food. These are the supremely important conditions of a beneficial holiday.

I may sum up my remarks in these words. It does not matter much where the holiday is spent. Life should be lived in the open, vigorously, and early rising should be the rule. Food should be plain and substantial and should be taken with moderation. Two or three weeks of this régime would probably do all the young folk of this country more good than frivolous vacations spent in lolling during the day and in dancing at night. What the youth of the country needs is not rest but reasonable activity under such discipline as requires persistence. Then the results will speak for themselves. I wonder if that is an impossible ideal in our time.

Another Aspect of Ireland's Problem

DANIEL F. COHALAN, LL.D.

IT is a truism to say that England has built her Empire upon diplomacy rather than upon force and still it is remarkable that so few of her critics seem to realize how much she has accomplished for herself by attaining her ends through indirection and intrigue rather than by the open use or display of might. Nearly three quarters of a century ago John Mitchel said that she had always gained her ends by catching the ear of the world and in all her long career she has scored no greater triumph than that which has brought to her side, in this mighty conflict for her very existence, our own beloved land. Since she has been able to do this seemingly impossible task, is it any wonder that she has been able to convince, not alone the greater part of the rest of mankind, but a large portion of the Irish race itself, that it would be impossible to free Ireland from her control and set it up again as a separate nation, and further that even if that were possible, Ireland could not maintain her independence but would necessarily fall a prey to one of the other great powers of Europe? Of course the great majority of men do not think for themselves, and constant reiteration of a statement frequently gives it a force equal to that of truth, but it is a great tribute to the diplomatic skill of the English leaders that they have so thoroughly indoctrinated large numbers of the Irish with belief in British invincibility that to many of them the notion of an independent Irish republic seems only the dream of an enthusiast. However, many hard-headed students of history and of affairs have come to realize that with the end of the present war and with the new distribution of power and development of rights growing therefrom, Ireland may well emerge from her long period of effacement and become an important power in the councils of the nations and a potent influence in the progress of mankind.

For generations it has been the policy of England to teach the world that Ireland is only a British island and that the Irish are an unruly, turbulent, people, who, being unable to rule themselves, have been raised to a half-civilized state, by the unselfish and devoted efforts of England. But the world has got beyond all that and has come to understand that Ireland is a European island whose welfare and control are a matter of concern to mankind generally, and whose children, as they have demonstrated in many lands, are capable of making valued contributions to civilization and of rendering efficient service to the world. In this war the extraordinary development of the submarine, itself in a practical form the work of an Irishman, the late John P. Holland, has suddenly called into question the hitherto unquestioned English control of the sea, and, as English authorities themselves assert, unless the submarine be quickly and decisively curbed, England faces a situation which will leave her with relatively no more power than present-day Spain or Holland. Such an England never could maintain her control over Ireland, and with the freedom which the President has said should come to all the peoples of the earth, a freedom that the Allies, with England as spokesman, insist that they are seeking for the small nations in this war, Ireland with the aid of the submarine, would be able to protect herself, while she developed her wonderful natural resources and increased her population to the 20,000,000 people, which leading economists maintain she is able to support in comfort.

The insurrection last year shows that the old martial spirit of her children has not changed and gives the lie to the oft-repeated English tale that the Irish are not in earnest in their desire for liberty. When such men as those who fell last year in Ireland are ready to die for freedom, Ireland cannot be kept in subjection, and the events that have happened since—the convention recently held in Dublin, the elections in Roscommon, Longford and Cork and the actions of many local public bodies —show that they represented the faith and hope of the great majority of the people. Those events prove that if a plebiscite were taken to-morrow a large majority of the men and women of Ireland would declare themselves in favor of independence and of an Irish republic. Their wonderful performance in taking possession of Dublin, the citadel of English power in Ireland, and holding it with 1,300 men against nearly 40,000 English soldiers, for nearly a week until the naval guns had battered down much of the city, shows that an armed Ireland is at any time capable of driving the British forces out of Ireland. Indeed, if the Irish heroes of last year had done nothing more than save the young manhood of Ireland from conscription, from following the 100,000 or more recruited for the British armies and sent to die for England in Flanders and at Gallipoli, they have won the undying thanks of their countrymen. But they have done more than that. They have aroused the race pride of the Irish all over the world and stimulated and vitalized the determination of the men and women of Ireland to break the last link that binds them to England. They have shown the weakness of the boasted power of England and have aroused the country from the lethargy into which it had sunk after a generation of teaching that liberty was something for which to talk but not to die. The fighting in Ireland has taught many needed lessons to the Irish at home, and the war generally has taught them other lessons. They have learned that autocracy cannot stand against the will of a united people; they have seen the mighty Czar of all the Russias driven over night from his throne before the just anger of an aroused people, and they are fast coming to understand that while there are many minor problems upon which they may always differ, the interests of Ireland should be confided only to the control of those who are interested in Ireland alone, and that all Irishmen, even while differing in religious or party politics, should look first to the interests of Ireland.

The Irish question, Mr. Balfour and his few admirers among the American Irish to the contrary notwithstanding, is no longer a question of domestic British politics. It has been internationalized by the insurrection in Ireland and by the general interest aroused throughout the world as one of the consequences thereof.

The world can never again be as it was before August 1914. The tremendous conflagration that has raged over nearly all the earth has lighted up the dark spots, and mankind in general has determined that democracy in one form or another will have sway over all peoples. In the interest of the peace of the world, no one power or single group of powers will be permitted after this war to rule the seas, and no single fact will contribute so much to the freedom of the seas as the turning of Ireland again into a European island, free from the control of all of the great Powers and with its shores, commanding the approaches to the waters of northern Europe, outside the control of any foreign Power.

That the race which inhabits Ireland is capable of upholding its liberty and of developing the country's wonderful resources admits of no doubt. Although England and her friends have always tried to depreciate the Irishman in the world's opinion it has not been a task that was always successful. In nearly every land on earth, even in England, he has fought his way to the top in many activities, against all odds. And in Ireland, in the all too brief period when he was in control of the Government, from 1783 to 1801, he demonstrated, although but a small minority of Irishmen were permitted to have a voice in the Government, a capacity to rule with success, that makes certain an extraordinary career for Ireland when she comes into control of her own destiny. The story of that short generation reads like a romance. The progress that was made in commerce, in industry, in education, in all the things that make a country great is unrivaled in the modern history of small nationalities. While much remains to be done, the position of the country with relation to the richest parts of the world, the undeveloped resources, the fertility of the soil, the great harbors and wonderful water-powers, the genius and adaptability of the people all promise a splendid future.

Freed from the misgovernment of England and from the crushing burden of forces that have created and continued religious differences among the people for political purposes, in a single generation old differences will be forgotten and the people will unite without regard to old lines of cleavage and division upon the solution of the pressing problems of national progress.

Such a solution of the problem of Ireland is the one which addresses itself, not alone to the interest of the Irish at home, but also to the self-respect and dignity of the Irish race everywhere, and to the general interest of mankind. It promises peace and prosperity to the long and sorely tried people of Ireland with an opportunity to develop, on their own shores, the great gifts of a richly dowered race; it will promote the interests of the descendants of Irishmen all over the world; it means peace for the neighbors of Ireland in Europe, and it will gradually open for the other countries of the world a new and great market in the populous and prosperous country into which Ireland will be turned.

It is in line with the teachings and example of America; with the declaration of the President, that in this war we shall fight " for democracy, for the rights of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free people as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free."

It is in line with the new spirit that has brought China and Russia into the ranks of democracy and that will not be satisfied until all the world is ruled by governments founded upon the consent of the governed and responsible to them.

The Vincentians' Tercentenary

BY a remarkable coincidence, or rather by a benign disposition of Divine Providence, both the tercentenary of the founding of the Vincentians and the centenary of their coming to the United States are being celebrated this year. It was not indeed until 1625 that the " Congregation or Confraternity of the Fathers or Priests of the Mission " was given its first legal recognition, and not until the year following that its first four pioneers obtained formal ecclesiastical sanction, from the Archbishop of Paris, " to live in a community or confraternity and to devote themselves to the salvation of the poor country people." But the real inception of the Congregation was always assigned by St. Vincent de Paul to the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, in the year 1617. For on that day of grace the Saint preached the famous mission sermon, the first of a multitude, which showed that he had grasped the remedy for the spiritual ills of the poor of France and of the poor of the world and which set on foot the agitation which eventuated in the establishment of the Congregation of which he was the founder and the first superior.

The year 1917 is rightly celebrated, therefore, as the three-hundredth anniversary of the Congregation of the Mission, and it has been sanctified wherever the Vincentians are laboring, that is, throughout the world. In spite of its universal gloom, the year has its consolations for this devoted band of laborers in the vineyard of the Lord. Europe, Asia, Africa and America have looked up from their deep sorrows to wish them joy and to offer them cordial congratulations.

In the United States the year has an added significance, for it was in the year 1816, when the Congregation was just completing its two-hundredth year, that the Vincentians first landed on American soil. With the Church of the world, therefore, the hearts of American Catholics have gone out in a very special way to the sons of St. Vincent, and to his daughters also, in deserved and sincere congratulations on the happy completion of a full century of apostolic labor in our midst; and all our Catholic people, and in particular the priesthood and the poor, have found rich cause for felicitation in the possession, for so long a period, of these zealous men and women, the Vincentians and the Sisters of Charity.

The labors of the Vincentians, as they are affectionately called after the good St. Vincent, although they are more popularly known as the Lazarists from their famous establishment at St. Lazare, which for more than a century and a half was a veritable furnace of Divine love, in which the hearts of their own congregation and the clergy of Paris were tempered to a fine apostolic zeal, are so numerous, so widespread and so important, that the bare enumeration of them would take many pages. They are interwoven with the annals of the Church in France, Italy, Ireland, Poland, Turkey, both European and Asiatic, Abyssinia, China, Africa and many other parts of the world. Their work for the poor and the priesthood is a glorious record of fruitful effort. Their martyrs of charity both in civilized countries and in the foreign missions and their martyrs of blood at the hands of the French Revolutionists are inspiring examples of self-sacrificing zeal. But it is not with these so much as the debt of gratitude under which they have laid the United States that this paper is concerned.

The first superior of the Lazarist mission in the United States was the Very Reverend Felix De Andreis, a man of great learning and holiness, who with his companions was associated with Bishop Dubourg in the evangelization of Upper Louisiana, which at that time embraced a large section of the Middle West. The Lazarists made this immense section the scene of their apostolic labors. They lived in the early days a rather nomadic life, traveling at first through the territory now known as Arkansas, Illinois, Indiana, Mississippi, and Missouri. Later they went to Lower Louisiana as it was then called, and to Texas. Over this vast territory they journeyed with tireless zeal, everywhere preaching to the poor and establishing churches, but only to relinquish them to the diocesan clergy, as soon as priests could be procured to take their places. When this was done, they again moved forward in the van of the Church's progress.

Father De Andreis, as vicar-general of Upper Louisiana, was obliged to confine his labors mainly to Illinois, and it may be said without contradiction that to his efforts was largely due the impetus given to Catholicism in that flourishing stronghold of the Church. It is indicative of the character of these early pioneers, that even during his lifetime Father De Andreis was esteemed a saint. His death, which came all too soon, was universally mourned as an irreparable loss by both clergy and laity. After the lapse of a century the sweet odor of his sanctity still remains, and has made its way as far as Rome, where a few years ago the process of his beatification was happily begun. It is hoped therefore that before long his name, which is venerable both in the current and technical senses, will be added to the list of the Blessed who have lived and died in the United States.

In the organization of the Church in this country the Lazarists had an important part. Father Joseph Rosati was appointed Coadjutor Bishop to Bishop Dubourg, and later Bishop of St. Louis, Father Leo de Neckere, third Bishop of New Orleans, Father Jean Marie Odin, first Bishop of Galveston and second Archbishop of New Orleans, Father Michael Domenec, second Bishop of Pittsburgh, Father Joseph J. Ryan, first Archbishop of Toronto and Metropolitan of Ontario, Fathers John Timon and Stephen Vincent Ryan, first and second Bishops of Buffalo, and Father Thaddeus Amat, Bishop of Monterey.

Even the briefest sketch of the Lazarists in the United States would be incomplete without very honorable mention of their contributions to Catholic education. It was a happy augury for the work they were to carry on in this field of endeavor, that the first place to welcome their early missionaries was St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore; and this augury received greater emphasis when a few months later their first superior accepted the chair of theology at St. Thomas' Seminary, Bardstown. In 1818 the Vincentians made a modest beginning of St. Mary's of the Barrens, the first Vincentian seminary in the country. Twenty years later St. Vincent's College at Cape Girardeau was opened; its theological school was one of the predecessors of the present Kenrick Seminary in St. Louis, now efficiently administered by the Fathers of the Congregation. The seminaries of New Orleans, Cincinnati, Louisville, Philadelphia and New York were all for a time under their capable direction. In Brooklyn they have had charge of the diocesan seminary since its inception. They also direct St. Thomas' Seminary of Denver, and the Seminary of the Holy Angels of Buffalo. St. Mary's Seminary of Perryville, and St. Vincent's Seminary of Germantown are flourishing mother-houses and seminaries of their western and eastern provinces. Of their institutions of secular learning the best known are Niagara University, Dallas University, the De Paul University of Chicago, and St. John's College, Brooklyn. In all they have six colleges, one preparatory seminary, two apostolic schools for aspirants to their own Congregation, and four theological seminaries. Circumstances have obliged them to refuse the direction of many other institutions or to relinquish them into other hands once they had been started.

The multitudes of the Faithful in this country, for whose spiritual good the Vincentians are actually laboring, will joyfully unite with the other innumerable friends and well-wishers of these excellent men in congratulating them on their tercentenary celebration and in cordially expressing the wish that the Congregation of the Mission may pass many more centuries zealously extending the Kingdom of Christ.

The Enemies of Nature

Richard A. Muttkowski, Ph.D.

On a spring morning the average man rises with an irking ambition to accomplish things. Awakening nature has shaken her skirts, and man the sloven, is responding to her example. He proceeds to the garden, rakes the lawn and spades the flowerbeds, and when he has finished straightening, ordering, improving, he looks proudly about and discovers that he is only one of the many. For others have been improving what they call their own. Everywhere about him he sees the clipped greenery. The flowerbeds contain carefully ordered products of the hothouses, each a mirror of the other. The trees and ornamental shrubbery have been planted and trimmed to look alike. The houses differ only in the degree of barbarity to which the architect has been permitted to fling together an impossible jumble of angles, lines, and curves. Wherever he turns the same geometrical perspective meets his eye, and the average man recognizes an obtrusive, unstimulating sameness about it. He is depressed with the monotonous display of mediocrity and tries to escape it. In earlier days the wanderlust might have taken him to far lands. But, being modern and average, he goes to the public parks.

There he finds the progressive activity of the city in full swing. Emulating nature, the park commissioners have utilized the refuse to fill cuts and to provide artificial hills and embankments. Like nature, the city raises beauty from its wastage, yet the feeling of depression continues. For improvement has pressed nature into the "made-to-order" type. Flower plots mathematically arranged contain the uniform products of the city's green-houses; if they differ at all, it is only to form part of a mat or design. Even the imitative naturalness of the carefully juxtaposed trees and bushes does not deceive. There is an air of artificiality about the park, an air of geometrical beauty which offends and persists annoyingly. The average man wishes to escape the common plane, and cannot so long as he is among his kind. No wonder, then, that he turns to the open fields, the woods, the river and lakesides, seeking to escape from the orderliness of the city.

The sense of artificiality that hangs about cities does not leave him entirely in the country. Fields are inclined to be regular, the ploughshare's ideal is the straight furrow, the fences and hedges are more or less aligned. Yet the natural contours of the hills still persist, the trees grow as they please, and the hedges have escaped the gardener's shears. Flowers of various kinds fill the woods and meadows; birds, and perhaps some early butterflies glide showily through the air. If rill or lake there be, its waters gleam unsullied through the agency of man. At last the average man forgets himself, and is satisfied. And because he is average, because his logic, his perceptions, his cravings and aspirations are really average, so in his recourse to nature he is once more one of the many. But he does not feel his mediocrity, he does not feel artificial. For here nature is unregulated and unimproved; she is not of the man-made, yard-stick type.

Men, women, and the inevitable brood of children are plentiful in the countryside and all wish to enjoy the season's unfolding. Alas, they rave over the beauty and proceed to destroy, once more the characteristic of mediocrity. The "car-stop" is a place marked by bunches of wilted flowers plucked with greedy enthusiasm and cast aside after their freshness is lost. Spring-beauty, hepatica, bloodroot, anemone, marsh-marigold, wake-robin are abundant; alas, also a few sprigs of dutchmen's breeches, and, if it be late April, perhaps some early orchid or pasque flower, rarest flowers of all. Why is it that tender-hearted women, who would not kill knowingly, pick and kill the flowers of the field without the slightest thought? A passing desire of possession, a moment's adornment, and the flowers are wilted. Spring's awakening is also spring's sorrow; for each year sees the diminution of her treasures, each year sees her robbed of one or more of the flowers with which she is wont to bedeck herself. The various wild orchids and the pasque flower are practically things of the past; dutchmen's breeches is a rarity near cities. And with the flowers go the birds. Wrens, finches, bluebirds, still common near villages, are unusual near large cities.

Finally there arrives that mad, blind destroyer, the real-estate agent. In his vernal optimism he shamelessly "improves" section after section of outlying districts. Just outside the metropolis of one northern State there was for many years a plot of land, half a mile square, adjoining a cemetery, which was one of the favorite hunting-grounds of naturalists. No other place where so many wild flowers and birds and insects could be found! A little swamp formed the breeding-ground of newts, frogs, toads, and salamanders; while the creek traversing the woods contained a rich aquatic fauna. Delicious surprises awaited the naturalist in the way of flowers, mushrooms, birds, and insects. Flowers of the fields, of the woods, of the water and the swamp grew here in abundance. Butterflies, moths, beetles, dragonflies, and other insects of the rarest kind held tryst in the woods. Many a summer evening my brother and I went forth to pick the evening's flight of insects from the bait of stale beer and syrup smeared on trees. Laden with bags, cyanide bottles, torch-lamps, lantern-traps and nets, we might cross the cemetery, and no doubt we looked like disreputable ghosts stalking over the graves. But with a naturalist's joy in our eyes and the evening's poetry in our souls, we thought only of the splendid surprises that awaited us. And these were enough to satisfy the hungriest soul.

Real-estate activity has destroyed this paradise. Many a naturalist sighed and perhaps hid a shamefaced tear when full-paged advertisements announced the "improvement" of the section. The tiny swamp was filled in, the trees were made into lumber, the creek was regulated by cement embankments. To the soul that delights in neatly graded plats, in foot-rule arrangement of trees and shrubbery, in the alignment of sidewalks and curbs, the two-dozen symmetrical blocks must be an artistic feast.

It is the punishment of social life, this suppression and merging of the individual into a deadening mediocrity. To this monotony nature must be sacrificed, by this mediocrity nature is plundered. To escape the destructiveness of mediocrity, birds are now protected by law. Shall we soon resort to protection of wild flowers? Man wonders where the birds and wild flowers go. He interferes constantly with nature and howls when she rises in anger and smites him mightily. But man blames nature and not himself, another characteristic of the average man.

Rural Apostolate of Catholic Literature

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The rural apostolate of Catholic literature, outlined by Father La Farge, and commented on by Raymond Verimont in recent issues of AMERICA, is an effective way of doing good. I myself saw the scheme in operation five years ago in Teschen, which with its 20,000 inhabitants was the headquarters for liberalism in Austria-Silesia and a hotbed for the "Los von Rom" movement in the Crownland. The majority of the Catholics were indifferent and cowardly, and the same spirit infected the little towns and villages of the adjacent farming district. The sodalities set themselves to remedy this state of things; and although they found it a difficult task, they took up social work with apostolic zeal that was soon rewarded with success.

The Ladies' Sodality in particular accomplished remarkable results. They founded a society for Catholic women, and with its help they established a German and a Polish association for factory girls, which offered courses in sewing, cooking, bookkeeping, typewriting, etc. Experts were invited to lecture on hygiene, the duties of citizenship, apologetics and education. A kindergarten and a summer home for the younger brothers and sisters of the factory girls were started, which after a year were subsidized by the city.

One of the chosen fields of apostolate was a circulating library, which not only influenced the members of the societies but soon began to affect a much larger circle. Five thousand volumes were placed in the sodality hall, which were distributed free to members and to others at the nominal cost of five heller, that is one cent, for two weeks. Newspapers and magazines were at the disposal of all visitors to the library. Catholic priests and laymen were appealed to, and many books were resurrected from the dust of forgotten shelves. So many volumes were donated, that they overtaxed the available library space; and so a circulating library was formed with the idea of supplying the smaller towns and villages with good reading-matter. Boxes, capable of holding twenty-five or fifty books, were made and sent by mail or freight to neighboring towns. The parish priest or some private person was entrusted with their distribution, or at times the parish sodality. After Mass on Sundays the books were lent to the farmers and their families. To pay for current expenses a charge of one cent for the use of each book for two weeks was made. As soon as the volumes in the first consignment had been read, they were sent to another town and a fresh consignment took their place. In this way the circulating library was soon traveling all over the country. The ladies in charge of the library were in continual correspondence with the readers, and in this way the way was paved for other kinds of sodality work. Among the means used for raising funds was to write reviews, publishers furnishing the volumes gratis. One of the ladies of the sodality wrote 500 such reviews in two years.

Another form of the apostolate was the distribution at the church doors each Sunday of the Bonifaciusblatt, a publication similar to the Sunday Visitor, copies of which were also left purposely in street cars, on railroad trains, in stations, and on the benches of public parks. Members of the sodality made it a practice to ask at the news-stands for Catholic books and magazines. In a short time newsdealers were displaying Catholic literature in their stores and on their stands. The sodality purchased thirty or forty books from booksellers, but made it a condition that these books should be shown in the store windows for a month. As a consequence stores in which previously only dangerous books and certainly not Catholic books had been exhibited, now began to display Catholic books. This brought trade, and before long in Jewish and Protestant stores, Catholic publications were very much in evidence. Pressure was brought to bear on politicians to have objectionable books removed from public places.

After the outbreak of hostilities, the sodality began to work with the Red Cross and relief committees, and the "Press and Library section" of the sodality soon began to make its way into hospitals and into the ranks. Prayer-books, popular editions of the New Testament, and small pamphlets were given gratis. In the course of a single year one lady distributed about 15,000 books and pamphlets. Happy the priests who have such helpers. The Poles have a trenchant but expressive proverb. "When the devil does not know how to accomplish his purpose, he sends a woman to do it." There is wisdom in the saying. With proper modifications we might well act on its practical suggestions

A Vindication of "Surprising Lethargy"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Under the caption "Surprising Lethargy" there appeared in the communication column of AMERICA for April 28 an arraignment of the priests of Central America, who are so lacking in proper solicitude for their flocks as to let young men slip away unawares to non-Catholic schools in the United States. A pretty picture of the solicitude of the good old Irish priest is introduced as a contrast and as an example for the padres of Central America. It is all very nice and edifying, but the cases are by no means parallel. "What are the priests of Central America doing?" A comparison will clear the atmosphere of the discussion. Central America has an area of 182,563 square miles, a Catholic population of 3,966,335, and 550 priests; Ireland has an area of 32,365 square miles, a Catholic population of 3,336,937, and 3,606 priests. The above figures show that Central America, with an area six times that of Ireland, and a Catholic population exceeding that of Ireland by 600,000, has only one-sixth the number of priests. Add to this the fact that many of the prominent families live on ranches where they are not in daily touch with the priests, and the other fact that the heads of these families are infected with a certain amount of religious indifference, due to the prevalent anti-clerical spirit and the purely secular and even irreligious education received in the government schools, and more light is thrown on the situation. But the stronger light does not increase the shadow of lethargy that rests on the padres.

We might go further and refer to the espionage prevalent in some of these countries, which causes the priests from fear, and it is not a vain fear, of exile and persecution, to reduce their public utterances to the minimum. We forbear turning the spotlight on the records of our secular universities, for it would likely reveal a great many names of Catholics and would force us to one of two conclusions: either that our own good pastors are not free from the charge of lethargy or that their zealous solicitude has proved ineffectual. May not the padres of Central America be given the benefit of the latter conclusion?

Mr. Sugrue suggests the adoption of the plan proposed some weeks ago in AMERICA, namely, the dissemination through Central and South America of Spanish circulars containing information concerning the Catholic colleges and universities of the United States. It is, indeed, a good suggestion. Owing to the fact that the padres of Central America have been educated either in their own countries or in Europe, they are quite unacquainted with our Catholic schools of higher education. Such circulars would not only enlighten them but would encourage them to make even greater efforts to have their spiritual charges placed where their faith will be secure. That they are anxious to have them thus placed and are willing cooperators in the cause of Catholic education we know from experience. It would not be necessary for our Catholic schools to enlist the services of traveling men and of the officials of railroads, steamships and hotels, as non-Catholic schools are doing. Circulars, together with advertisements in such Catholic periodicals as El Ideal of Guatemala, will do the work. The Central American youths who are getting their classical and professional education in the United States today will be the influential men of Central America in the next generation. If we let them slip through our hands, they will enter the secular schools of this country, whence, imbued with the principles of atheism and indifferentism, they will return to their own countries, there to exercise an influence which will eventually beget in Central America a repetition of the horrors of Mexico. The seed is already sown. The same agencies which have brought about the Mexican reign of terror are now acting in Central America. It is time for us to be up and doing.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your editorial of April 28, under the caption, "Let Them Get Acquainted," must commend itself strongly to the consideration of Catholic educators. Doubtless your praise of Mr. Spearman's suggestions, and especially of the one wherein he urges "that the youths and maidens who attend our colleges and academies should be given while there more frequent opportunities for social meetings," will jar the sensitive tenaciousness of old traditions. You commend especially this suggestion as "no less praiseworthy than practical." Many would add "and no less practical than unusual," a fact which is implied both by Mr. Spearman and your comments, and included in our experience.

We are all very much concerned about the widespread evil of mixed marriages which both Catholics and thinking Protestants decry as one of the most prolific sources of infidelity. We do a great deal of theorizing on the subject without giving much consideration to the actual conditions in which our Catholic people are as a matter of fact placed here in the United States. We enjoy the privilege of religious freedom. The majority of our people are not Catholics, and the Constitution guarantees them the right to serve God according to the dictates of their conscience. We Catholics are a minority of the people in the proportion of less than one to five. We daily rub shoulders with our fellow-citizens, and it is natural that on the average our non-Catholic friends should outnumber our Catholic ones. Now love is proverbially blind, and the Church recognizes this, when she reluctantly grants dispensations for mixed marriages in order to avoid greater evils. Is it surprising, then, that there are so many mixed marriages, since marriage is the outcome of affection, and often of affection on short acquaintance? We may inveigh from the pulpit against the evils arising from mixed marriages; we may point out those evils to Catholic pupils; but does not experience prove that too often such principles are swept away before the fiery gusts of passion? Of course we must continue decrying the evil, for principle must ever be the foundation of Catholic action; but in the light of experience should not some means also be taken which will facilitate carrying out the principles learned, which will guide the unquenchable fire of human love along human, and at the same time, safe channels, and which will lessen the danger of falling into the pitfalls that lie in the path of the young man and woman? We may deprecate the early and close intimacies that today exist among our young, as manifested in dancing parties of children of the tenderest age, and in the attentions paid by boys and girls to each other at an age which two generations since would have been more wisely restricted. But the custom has come to stay and such deprecations will neither uproot it nor solve the difficulties arising from it.

Since the circumstances are such, and we must take them into consideration if we would not blind ourselves, it seems certainly desirable that our young men and women should become acquainted with one another before they leave school, in order that they may know and be drawn to one another, and that therefore "they should be given while in our colleges and academies more frequent opportunities for social meetings." Thus will be minimized the danger that the attractiveness of non-Catholics so captivate the affections of Catholics as to render null and void the principles they have learned.

I am well aware that many will not concur in such views; but before condemning them a priori, would it not be well to consider whether objections are not the product of other times when circumstances were not what they actually are today, and whether they are not more adapted to countries where the preponderance of the population is Catholic, and where, consequently, young Catholic men and women will probably be surely drawn to each other. At any rate, the suggestion merits careful consideration on the part of all Catholic educators, and should not be dismissed too easily.

Colleges and Social Intercourse

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of April 28 I noticed with satisfaction that you called attention to a subject which I know is agitating not only students at our Catholic colleges but their parents too; opportunities for social intercourse between the young people of our higher educational institutions and, I would add, a closer intimacy between the parents and professors and the professors and students. It is true that our colleges have their "proms" and banquets at the best hotels and at expensive restaurants, carried on, alas, after the extravagant and luxurious fashion of the world, but wise parents do not wish their sons and daughters to start their social life in such gatherings. Non-Catholic institutions have found and use means to bring their teachers, parents and young people together, and in doing so they are simply copying good old Catholic ways, for those familiar with usages in Catholic countries can testify that there exists in them no such spirit of aloofness as seems to have fastened itself upon us. In American cities, where we are so widely scattered and where even the very well-to-do are confined to close quarters, some general method, apart from meetings at games and plays, of bringing together those of similar ideals and similar education would seem imperative.

A Word of Protest

To the Editor of AMERICA:

You intimate that the discussion of St. Augustine's cosmogony is closed. Be it so. But I have a right to protest against the ascription to me of the reasoning and statement embodied in the words that follow: "Therefore St. Augustine adumbrated, when he mentioned wheels, that the earth turns on its axis." I distinctly declared that I did not dream of saying the Saint meant or hinted at anything of the sort.

Our Country, First and Always

ENGLISH and Scotch, German and Irish, French and Italian, Greek and Russian, were our forefathers who sought in this country the opportunities which persecution and political turmoil had denied them in the motherland.

Today, whatever strains may mingle in our veins, at whatever altars we may worship, we admit but one political allegiance. We are not Irish, not German, not English. We are Americans.

Not for a moment can we forget the country that has given us birth, on whose benign shores the oppressed of all nations have found a secure refuge, under whose fostering and watchful care we have lived as men should live, free and untrammeled in our right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. May our hands fall palsied to our recreant sides, and our tongues cleave inarticulate to our traitorous palates, if in our regard for any other nation under heaven, we slacken even in our most secret thoughts, in our love and our devotion to the great nation which has endowed us with civic blessings beyond all price.

Today, calm and unafraid, our country girds herself in her mighty strength, as she goes forth to do battle that liberty may not perish from among the nations of the earth. Our prayers go with her, our hearts, our possessions, our lives. It is not ours to palter, to question, to temporize, or by cold calculation to chill the ardor with which this most just war has been undertaken. Our duty is to obey the orders of legitimate authority, as the bidding of Christ Himself from whom all power in heaven and on earth is rightfully derived.

We offer no hypocritical lip-service, no mechanical loyalty, but a devotion founded on our loyalty to God Himself, and we draw from that high loyalty the firm purpose to dedicate ourselves with all that we are and have to the service of our beloved country. That is the devotion which she rightly expects of us, and the devotion which every Catholic who is not basely recreant to the teachings of the Church will gladly give her.

A Recipe for Cleverness

BE clever and let who will be honest! This is the well-loved motto of the younger American. To be reputed clever is to be taken into the very heart of social activity; it means becoming, as Shakespeare would say, "one of the which ones." Wit, wisdom, worth may be wanting in your general ensemble, but if you have cleverness, much will be forgiven you. Close observation has resulted in the compilation of the following recipe for cleverness:

Never do the expected, the usual, the natural; startle people.

Explain that everything old is wrong, because it is old; anything that has newness has goodness.

Take the attitude that religion is, more or less, a thing of the past; and being past, is old; and being old, is not good.

Learn the proverbs and invert their meanings. These inversions will be accepted as epigrams. Sense is not essential; euphony is sufficient.

Smile knowingly when the family virtues of a friend are lauded. Say nothing but indicate the inexpressible.

Be a cynic and measure the goodness of all else by that in your own soul.

Scoff at the validity of the marriage contract.

Question the desirability of offspring.

Go in for the "new poetry" and the "newer art," but attempt not to explain what they mean, or you are lost and become ordinary.

Borrow, without compunction, the literary clothes of those who write "smart" things.

Have the latest ideas on economics and quote the Socialist school.

Allude occasionally to the abysmal ignorance, crass ideality, deplorable lack of culture, and general untidiness of the Middle Ages. Vary the program now and then by calling them the "Dark Ages."

Polish everything that has become dun-colored from the prosaicness of truth, by the acid of flippant sarcasm.

Preach the efficiency of modern times.

The "new woman" will, on occasion, serve as a fertile source of discussion and present opportunities for you to say the wrong thing in the right place.

Never say a word about the war, but insinuate that you have your own ideas and might be a valuable aid to the peace conferees.

A sentence or two about "the end of kings," or a vigorously ejaculated "Send the kings into the firing-line" would indicate to your hearers a grasp of the fundamentals of the world-conflict.

Never indulge in the prosaic greeting, "Good morning!" The weather may be allowed to take care of itself. Light the match of conversation on your own glowing interior.

Read every word printed by the popular magazines on each fad as it is born.

Make only general remarks—heavily—and avoid proof—lightly. He who explains or proves is apt to feel the slapstick of boredom and may be dubbed Sir Knight Impossible.

Do nothing, yet never neglect an opportunity to utter the inutterable—vaguely.

A planned pun is none at all. But be not discouraged by this.

If your associates hint at your cleverness, foster their surmises into flowering belief.

Accentuate the disease-theory of criminology. That is being done in the "best circles" and it's the most comfortable explanation.

Place "Avaunt!" before ritualism, yet wear a florid and expansive lodge-emblem.

Let "everyone live his own life." This fiat makes a most effective verbal display and directs attention to your broad-mindedness.

A Riot of "Electives"

EFFECTIVE measures should be taken to save from themselves the boys and girls attending our public high schools. In some places, according to a writer in the New York Nation, these children are now allowed to choose from ten "general courses" which include art, music, "boys' technical cooperative," "agricultural cooperative," etc. As if this were not enough to puzzle and bewilder the callow young "electors" we are told that

> A mathematician, known for his deliberation and sobriety, has calculated that a boy or girl during the four years of life at a really modern high school has a choice from more than 100,000 different combinations of studies. Surely any freak of the mind should be satisfied in such a freedom, but during the time this essay was being written one or two more subjects have been added to the list, the making of trousers being one of them, and that means a considerable addition to this already respectable number. Such is the richness of modern education and such is the fertility of the scientific pedagogue, who ransacks the world of thought for new specimens of education with the same industry and success with which the naturalist adds to our known species of insects. But with this difference, the new insect is likely to remain merely a name or a dead specimen in alcohol, whereas a new educational discovery must be tried out on luckless living children.

Given the well-known proclivity of boys and girls to follow the paths of least resistance and to be governed by their schoolmates' counsel in the choice of the most "popular snap-courses" in the curriculum, it is not surprising that business men complain that the mind of the average high school pupil is almost as untrained when he is graduated, as it was before those 100,000 possible combinations of courses got in their deadly work. What adds to the seriousness of the situation is the fact that today so many parents, being wholly occupied with matters of more importance, gaily allow their fourteen-year-old sons and daughters to choose and follow worthless courses, say, in umpiring, printing, and hat-making. But literature, mathematics and history, hopelessly old-fashioned studies that require the expenditure of considerable brain-tissue, are of course declared "useless" and "uninteresting" by these lazy goslings, and parents practically endorse the verdict by allowing their children to shorten the class-hours assigned to essentials, so that more time may be devoted to fads and novelties. Meanwhile it is the patient tax-payer who foots the bill for these new and very expensive courses, and it is the flabby-minded generation of tomorrow that will show the sad results of the foolish system.

The War and the Children

UNLESS the sober sense of State executives intervenes, hysterical legislatures will do the country as much harm as any foreign foe. The Brown bill, recently passed by the New York legislature, which practically empowers the Commissioner of Education to excuse children from school for farm work, is a good example of legislation as useless as it is vicious.

Mr. Owen Lovejoy of the National Child Labor Committee, has recently published replies received from fifteen great agricultural States, in answer to the question, "Are city children wanted in your district?" Sixty-two per cent stated that children were not needed, and were not wanted. No labor is so expensive to all parties to the contract as child labor. It is bad for the children, bad for the producers, and bad for the community. Professor Dewey is right in saying that nothing can so strengthen the cause of the extreme pacifists as legislation of the kind fostered by Senator Brown.

Viewed in its possibility, and probability, of moral harm to the children, such intemperate legislation is even more objectionable. The bitter experience of England and Germany ought to teach us wisdom. An English social worker, Mr. Cecil Leeson, asks, "Had we set out with the deliberate intention of manufacturing juvenile delinquents, could we have done it in any more certain way?" Since 1914, thousands of boys and girls have been taken from school for factory or farm work, and since 1914, juvenile delinquency in England has increased by 34 per cent. In the great manufacturing town of Manchester, it has more than doubled, the exact increase being 56 per cent. Similar conditions are reported from Germany. In Berlin, the rate of delinquency in 1915 was twice that of 1914; in Munich, the first three months of 1915 numbered as many juvenile delinquents as the whole of the preceding year. In both countries the same reason is assigned for this shocking increase. Thrown with all sorts of associates, both juvenile and adult, in the factory or on the farm, home discipline breaks down, and; in Mr. Lovejoy's words, "the children run wild." No other result could be looked for.

This country is not so poor and desolate that at the very outset of the war, it must seek defense at the weak hands of little children. Only a foolish economy, a wasteful conservation, would prompt this course. The country's greatest hope for the future is its children. To them will fall the task of rebuilding, upon the ashes left by war's destruction, a State new-dedicated to liberty, and homes whose firm bond is morality. Nothing should be suffered to mar their preparation for this great work.

We need munitions for the war and we need food, but more than either we need children, developing in the normal environment of home, church and school. Not until the last trench has been reached, will it be wise to turn to them for such help as their frail and untrained hands can afford. And we are far, very far, from that trench.

Content with "Better"

OF St. Augustine it was once said: "He always tried, not so much to make men good as to make them better." He did not expect his penitents to attain in a few years the heights of holiness. If they grew, however slowly, only a little better than they were, he was quite content. He was not discouraged if his sermons seemed to produce no fruit. If, in spite of his valiant defense of the Faith, heresies still spread, the great Doctor of the West was not disheartened. After he had delivered God's message as clearly and forcibly as he could, the Saint left the rest to Heaven. From his close union with Our Blessed Lord he learned to imitate the Master's Divine patience. He recalled how many were the prayers, the instructions and the miracles of Christ, yet what a meager harvest He appeared to reap from His ministry and how often His Divine purposes were frustrated by the malice and stupidity of men. The Saint reflected that it is largely because man's span of life is so brief, that he fumes and frets if prompt, complete success does not crown his labors. God is so patient because all eternity is His.

There are many zealous promoters of God's cause who grow restive and impatient at the slow mental, material or moral improvement shown by those they are striving to make better. Quick and striking results are expected in return for the love, the prayer and the labor expended, so, when these hopes are not realized, discouragement comes to sadden the worker's soul and to enfeeble his hands. Apostolic men and women whom this spiritual malady attacks should make St. Augustine's practice their own. Be grateful, if the world, because you are in it, is made just a little better. Do not expect too much of poor human nature. Be surprised at nothing. Nevertheless, like St. Ignatius Loyola count yourself happy if through your influence even one sin is left uncommitted, and but one fellow-pilgrim finds the next step toward Heaven easier to take.

Public Opinion

NOT long ago an important administration measure was pausing on the brink of enactment. A prominent journal commenting on the pause declared that the President was waiting for the impulse of public opinion before taking the step. We have no quarrel with this comment which may be explained in a right sense, but a popular fallacy underlies one interpretation of it. Does "government by the people" mean that public opinion in this democracy should do the governing, that is to say, make the laws, interpret them and, above all, administer them? If this is so, then a most vital business requiring, at times, deadly promptness, technical wisdom and maximum clear-sightedness, is committed to an agent essentially slow-moving, untechnical, and often, at the outset, encumbered with befogged and biased vision.

A popular outcry may indeed be the expression not of a panic-wish conceived overnight but of a just and judicious demand which the long contemplation of a need or a neglect has finally made vocal and imperative. But if a sudden and unforeseen issue starts up then a popular outcry is no more to be trusted than any single man's headlong and instant judgment. A body of men are no more immune from judging wrongly, if they judge in a flash, than is one man. Then again, if there be no popular outcry but deliberate, widespread consideration there is the difficulty of gathering up the findings of this huge jury, and in the meantime inaction may have become fatal.

Some persons conceive republican government as a huge ship waiting in the locks of a canal until the water of popular demand has flowed in to the proper level to lift it and float it forward on its way. But what if the flow is so fitful and tedious that the ship's cargo spoils in the waiting or, if it be a warship, a battle is fought and lost?

Once more, an agent so many minded as the people is as open as the sky to the winds of passing impressions, of local prejudices which will set one section against another, of demagogues who, in speech or writing, will make the false appear true. To set such an agent up with a scepter or staff of office is to give a sword to a blind man who will wave it futilely, or to a madman who will wound and even slay himself.

It is utterly impossible and unthinkable to govern and be governed at once in the same sphere of action. Even when we speak of a man governing himself we mean that his two higher faculties tell the rest of him what to do, and enforce obedience.

Government as such should be carried on solely and absolutely by the governors. They are selected for the work. They are presumably the best that can be had and this presumption is a necessary postulate for perfect success. For if we assume the constant right of the people to improve at will their rulers by replacing them we shall have no rule and no improvement. It is the place and duty then of the governors to govern, frequently in advance of public opinion, sometimes, perhaps rarely, in opposition to it, but never as its slave.

We must, however, defer in conclusion to a great principle on which our country is founded and to which it looks for perpetuation far more than to any might of its armies or efficiency of its organization. It is the principle that, in an enlightened democracy, the great majority of the people have the welfare of the country at heart and must in time come to see what is for the best national interest. Hence there are two necessary qualities in democratic government which make it democratic and make it, for us Americans at least, the best government in the world. First it must be open and second it must be responsible. Open, so that what is done or proposed may be seen by all the governed and may be the object of respectful query, of discussion and even of criticism in season. Responsible, that is to say, done in the name and service of the people to whose rights the rulers must ever defer and at whose will delivered in due form and at a fixed time, they must yield up their vested power and obey the new rulers.

Of course this system does in a certain sense commit us and our destinies to the arbitrament of public opinion. But it should not place us at the mercy of a force impulsive and headlong, rising in a flame and dying down in ashes, such as, we fear, is a menace to the new-born republic of Russia. We have no deference for a public opinion which would usurp the delicate and difficult business of ruling or which vents itself in a sudden shout to frighten government into action. Rightly conceived public opinion is the true guardian of our rights. It is a sober, reminding voice which is constant and definite not so much in the demand for the specific legislation which has been the substance of party pledges as in the demand for conscientious ruling. Such a guiding power as this, educated in great ideals and inspired by a noble past, we can safely trust to keep us and our children and our children's children. And we ourselves, every man and woman of us, should realize that we are a responsible part of it.

ELEANOR C. DONNELLY

On the last morning of April in Villa Marie Convent, on the outskirts of the quaint old Quaker town of West Chester in Pennsylvania, a frail little aged woman closed her eyes forever on this earth. It was the feast of St. Catherine of Siena, and the venerable Dominican tertiary was robed for her last rest in the white habit of her patroness. Her solemn Mass of Requiem was sung in the convent chapel of the Sisters Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, whose honored guest she had been for so many fruitful years. During the Mass her beloved boys, the pupils of St. Aloysius Academy, sang her own hymn to the Sacred Heart, the last lines of the final chorus a prophecy fulfilled:

> Swift from the fetters of hell He frees us,
> Washing us white as the snowiest fleece;
> Deep in the glorious Heart of our Jesus,
> Grief is forgotten, and all is peace!

In the afternoon the little coffin was taken to the Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul in Philadelphia, where so dense a crowd had congregated that it was almost impossible for the funeral cortege to pass through the throng. In the procession of mourners was not a single relative; the aged woman, who had outlived all her kindred, was followed to her long rest by the Sisters of the Bon Secours, whose community she had been the means of bringing to Philadelphia, by the Sisters of the Immaculate Heart and by a little group of personal friends. Sisters from every congregation in the archdiocese were in the Cathedral to testify their love and their grief for one who had been ever the tireless helper of all their good works. The sanctuary was filled with priests, monsignori and bishops; the Most Rev. Archbishop Prendergast gave the absolution over the remains, and the funeral oration was preached by a poet-prelate, the Right Rev. Monsignor Hugh T. Henry, Litt.D. Before the mortal tabernacle of a great soul was taken away to the old family vault, near Commodore Barry's grave in historic St. Mary's churchyard, the casket was uncovered and for a full hour the deceased poet lay in state while the assembled crowd passed reverently by to look their last upon her face.

Eleanor Donnelly died in her seventy-ninth year. Her first poem was published in 1847, when she was nine years old; the now-closed volume of her life will cover a period of seventy years. Her literary output makes a showing commensurate with her length of years, for fifty published books, besides a great mass of uncollected devotional essays, poems and stories, remain a monument to her talent and her industry. In the list of thirty of her books which gained place in the library of the British Museum may be found a volume of "Short Lives of the Saints," two biographies, a "Memoir of the Rev. Felix J. Barbelin, S.J.," and the "Life of Sister Gonzaga Grace"; four compilations of devout thoughts from French, German and English sources; and six books of stories for juvenile readers. The remaining volumes and her other books published in recent years are collections of her poems. And it is upon the quality of her poetry that Eleanor Donnelly's fame chiefly rests. Those who wish to renew the memory of her poems can obtain from H. L. Kilner & Co., Philadelphia, the following volumes: "Poems," "A Tuscan Magdalen and Other Poems," "Prince Ragnal," "The Rhyme of the Friar Stephen," "The Children of the Golden Sheaf," and "Christian Carols of Love and Life." Richard G. Badger, Boston, is the publisher of Miss Donnelly's "The Secret of the Statue and Other Poems."

Our author's muse was essentialy dramatic and lyrical. She loved the legends of the Saints and was especially happy in this form of narrative poetry. Longfellow, who wrote his "Legend Beautiful," eight years after the publication of Miss Donnelly's "Vision of the Monk Gabriel," was generously willing to admit that he owed his theme to the then young Catholic poet. Like Longfellow, Eleanor Donnelly took her legendary subjects wherever she chanced upon them, sublimely indifferent to their earlier interpretations by other authors. Thus we have her beautiful versions of "The Legend of St. Elizabeth of Hungary," "St. Christopher's Burden," "St. Nicholas and the Doves," and of scores of other miracle-stories. Gifted with an extraordinary power of visualizing form and color, and an unerring perception of the value of contrast and the force of climax, Miss Donnelly gave to her poetic legends an atmosphere startlingly lifelike. There is nothing austerely vague, for instance about this picture from "The Two Quests of the Abbot Paphnucius:

Thàis the sinner, beautiful and bold,
Clad in soft garments, glistening with gold;
Her naked arms and throat with jewels bound;
Her splendid head with vines and tendrils crowned.

Like Edgar Allan Poe, Eleanor Donnelly, too, could paint the processes of human dissolution with dreadful fidelity of detail, but unlike the mortuary visions of the melancholy genius of "The Conqueror Worm," her realistic pictures serve only to accentuate the contrast between the death of the flesh and the life of the soul. Behold the conversion of Thais:

As one quick flash of lightning might illume
The dusky horrors of the charnel room,—
Rending the sheets and mildewed shrouds asunder
From ghastly carcasses decaying under;
So flashed God's grace on that perverted heart.
And sin's foul winding-sheets were rent apart.

Some fifty years ago, after the death of the gifted young daughter of "Barry Cornwall," it was Miss Donnelly's fate to be labeled "The Adelaide Proctor of America." Aside from the devotional inspiration common to both writers, and their equal fondness for legendary lore, there is little resemblance between the author of "The Lost Chord" and the seer of "The Vision of the Monk Gabriel." Adelaide Proctor's notes are all in the minor key: she likes misty monotones and twilight temperatures: her spring is chilly, her autumn sere: her chains to human love are broken links: her garlands are wreaths of willow. Eleanor Donnelly prefers victorious palm and laurel: her lyrics pulsate with passionate feeling: the paean of Christian triumph peals high and clear above all the tumult of living. Hearing, she obeyed the call:

Arise, O well-beloved!
And follow me with praise.
For all Thy paths are beautiful.
And peaceful all Thy ways!

After the immemorial fashion of all true singers, the poet kept her child-heart to the last. Though age and sorrow and loneliness had closed in about her lengthening path, she could sing blithely through all:

There are vistas of light and fragrance, there are fountains with silver rain,
While the fresh winds blow from the long ago, and my heart is a child's again!

The child-heart beats a tuneful measure through all her nursery-songs, and her lullabies sing themselves. Many of her sacred songs are exquisitely lyrical. It is a temptation to repeat every line of "Outside the Gate," but only a few stanzas can find space here:

Open to me the low, low gate
Of sweet Humility
That I may steal through the shadows late,
And walk alone with Thee. . . .

I smell the smell of the violets,
Breathing over the wall,
The dewy, delicate violets
That blow inside the wall. . . .

Oh, to be as a violet
Within Thy garden fair,
Full of the odors of Thy grace,
Wet with the dews of prayer!

Weary am I of pomp and pride,
Weary of self and sin,—
Open the gate, O Crucified,
And let me enter in!

Self had little part in the soul of our dearly-loved friend; like the artist in her poem, "Unseen yet Seen."

"No mean, self-conscious motive stirred
The tranquil depths of her patient heart."

The message of that noble poem rings with sincerity even to ears unattuned to the workings of the saintly poet's mind:

'Tis worth an infinite treasure to know
(Whatever beside should be unknown)
How utterly false and mean we grow
When we work for the eyes of men alone.

How blind and aching our sight becomes,
With the glare of glory such works may win us,
While a selfish purpose narrows and numbs
All that is noble and best within us.

'Tis only when self is dead and gone,
And our souls from the mists of passion free,
That the angels of God come in and crown
Our labors with immortality.

Indeed, so unmindful of temporary glory was Eleanor Donnelly that she made no attempt to regain credit for several of her dramatic poems which had drifted, nameless, into anthologies and "recitation series" without number. Many an audience has thrilled to the tragedy of "The Old Surgeon's Story" and "The Doom Cup," or to the dreamy pathos of "The Sleeper's Sail," without knowing anything about the identity of the author.

Our poet's very facility and spontaneity were responsible for many verses not up to the highest level of her talents, and in justice to her memory it should be said that it is unfair to judge her by anything less than her best. A critically chosen collection, now in contemplation, containing only the richest fruits of Eleanor Donnelly's genius will do more to perpetuate her fame than could be effected by thirty or fifty or a hundred volumes of unedited reprints.

REVIEWS

The New Poetry: an Anthology. Edited by HARRIET MONROE and ALICE CORBIN HENDERSON, Editors of Poetry. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.75.

Those who are eager to learn just what the "new poetry" is will find large quantities of it in this anthology, for more than a hundred authors are represented, and the best known free-verse writers receive the most space, while no poems published prior to 1900 are admitted. The new poetry, as described by one of the book's editors, is "less vague, less verbose, less eloquent than most poetry of the Victorian period and much work of earlier periods. It has set before itself an ideal of absolute simplicity and sincerity—an ideal which implies an individual, unstereotyped diction; and an individual, unstereotyped rhythm." That may be, but a perusal of this collection gives the lover of the "old ways" in poetry the impression that the average vers-librist does not work very hard at his lines. Poetry comes too easy to him, or, more often perhaps, to her. It is not difficult to prove, moreover, that the best poems in this anthology are those that rhyme. The following selections, which, taken in their order, are Conrad Aiken's "Music I Heard," Ralph Hodgson's "Stupidity Street," Alice Meynell's "Maternity," and Walter de la Mare's "An Epitaph," while quite "new" in style, are certainly superior to anything in free verse that the volume contains:

Music I heard with you was more than music,
And bread I broke with you was more than bread.
Now that I am without you, all is desolate,
All that was once so beautiful is dead . . .

Your hands once touched this table and this silver,
And I have seen your fingers hold this glass.
These things do not remember you, beloved;
And yet your touch upon them will not pass.

For it was in my heart you moved among them,
  And blessed them with your hands and with your eyes.
And in my heart they will remember always;
  They knew you once, O beautiful and wise!

I saw with open eyes
  Singing birds sweet
Sold in the shops
  For the people to eat,
Sold in the shops of Stupidity Street.

I saw in vision
  The worm in the wheat,
And in the shops nothing
  For people to eat;
Nothing for sale in Stupidity Street.

One wept whose only child was dead
  New-born, ten years ago.
"Weep not; he is in bliss," they said.
  She answered, "Even so.

"Ten years ago was born in pain
  A child not now forlorn.
But oh, ten years ago, in vain
  A mother, a mother was born."

Here lies a most beautiful lady;
Light of step and heart was she;
I think she was the most beautiful lady
That ever was in the West Country.
But beauty vanishes; beauty passes;
However rare—rare it be;
And when I crumble, who will remember
This lady of the West Country?

The foregoing poems, together with Rupert Brooke's five sonnets, entitled "Nineteen-Fourteen," which are also included in this volume, hardly seem to belong to an anthology that finds room for such worthless stuff as the following lines of Maxwell Bodenheim's "To a Discarded Steel Rail," or this admirable counsel to "A Parasite," by Alfred Kreymborg:

Straight strength pitched into the surliness of the ditch,
A soul you have—strength has always delicate, secret reasons,
Your soul is a dull question.
I do not care for your strength, but for your stiff smile at Time—
A smile which men call rust.

Good woman:
Don't love the man.
Love yourself,
As you have done so exquisitely before.
Like that tortoise-shell cat of yours
Washing away the flies; or are they fleas?
You've hurt him again?
Good!
Do it often.
No—
He'll love you the more—
Always.
Remember how he forgave you the last time,
And how he loved you in the forgiving.
Give him an adventure in godhood
And the higher moralities.
Hurt him again.
Fine!

If that is poetry, in the name of all the weeping Muses what is prose?

Six Lectures on Architecture. By RALPH ADAMS CRAM, THOMAS HASTINGS, and CLAUDE BRAGDON. Illustrated. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. $2.00.

This imperial octavo volume of 172 pages contains the eleventh series of lectures delivered at the Art Institute of Chicago on the Scammon Foundation. There are two lectures by each of the three authors, but it is chiefly the contribution of Mr. Cram, that ardent apostle of Gothic art, that claims widest attention. "The Beginning of Gothic Art" and "The Culmination of Gothic Architecture" should be of special interest to Catholic readers. These essays of his on the spirit of medievalism have already aroused criticism among reviewers who either cling to their old mumpsimus about the Middle Ages or, recognizing the worth of what Mr. Cram says, frankly combat it because it conflicts with their modern and too often decadent ideals. But those who are already under the magic spell that medieval times can throw over so many souls will find voiced eloquently and succinctly in these essays their own love for the Middle Ages and will be filled with enthusiasm to seek further information about those great centuries.

Mr. Cram, though not a Catholic, cannot conceal his admiration for the ages of Catholic faith and their manifold achievements. It is hard to believe at times that one is not reading the effusions of an enthusiastic convert or at least of an ardent devotee, so rapt is his worship of the medieval. Quotable passages are so numerous that a review might become a reprint. For example, he writes: "The three centuries from 1000 A. D. to 1300 A. D. were probably the most wholesomely organized and the most sanely balanced and the most physically and spiritually stimulating that Christian Europe has known." And monasticism receives particularly high praise.

There is little to criticize in the book. Perhaps one might ask why the source of medieval art must necessarily be classic or German. Did the Celtic genius that is behind all Western Europe do nothing to evolve that most characteristic achievement of the West? Is it not the very exuberance of the Celt, not the sober, measured thought of Roman or Teuton, that is expressed in the almost riotous yet chaste beauty of Gothic? And should not the "Monk Durandus in the eleventh century," who on page 15 is said to have all symbolism at his finger ends, be the great canonist and bishop of the thirteenth century?

The Shadow Line: a Confession. By JOSEPH CONRAD. $1.35.
A Diversity of Creatures. By RUDYARD KIPLING. $1.50. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co.

The renown these two authors have won now makes the first appearance of their books a notable literary event. There is no finer example of Joseph Conrad's manner and method than this young captain's own story of how he passed over "The Shadow Line" that divides youth from maturity. While quite as psychological as the author's other books, the novel under review is free from the indirect, roundabout kind of narration that sometimes makes his stories hard to follow. For here a young captain gives a straightforward account of how he received his first command and describes the mental and emotional reactions he experienced while his ship made a dreadful voyage from Bankok to Singapore. With a delirious mate, a fever-stricken crew, a breezeless sea, and hovering over the vessel the sinister influence of her former skipper who had died, hated by his men, the captain unquestionably had his hands full. The ship's cook, Ransome, a well-drawn figure, was his only standby, but owing to the courage and cool-headedness of these two men the vessel came safely to port at last. Novel readers who have not yet come under the spell of Conrad's artistry, should read "The Shadow Line." His countless admirers need no urging to do so.

"A Diversity of Creatures" is the first book of fiction the once-fertile Kipling has written for seven years. It is made up of fourteen short stories, the best of which are reminiscent of the author's work fifteen years ago, and the tales are interleaved with verses which, with the exception of "The Land" and "Jobson's Amen," are not up to his old standard. "Regulus" is a new "Stalky" story and gives a diverting description of the way Mr. King read Horace with the fifth-form boys at the military school. "The Edge of the Evening," though written in 1913, vividly tells of the tragic end of two German airmen who came spying over England; in "Swept and Garnished" the invasion of Belgium is the artistic background, and "Mary Postgate" is another striking war story. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Grapes of Thorns" (Benziger, $1.25), Mrs. Mary T. Waggaman's new book, is no faithless mirage, but a true oasis in a desert of stodgy and stupid novels. Catholics, especially about convention time, are accustomed to utter many fine phrases about the duty of supporting Catholic literature, and if promise were performance, Catholic authors would now be riding in limousines, instead of worrying about the rent. One practical method of transmuting these hopeful phrases into deeds, is to buy a copy of Mrs. Waggaman's book for a friend, and another for yourself. Clean, wholesome and interesting, qualities of which the modern novel is too often devoid, "Grapes of Thorns" is an excellent example of Mrs. Waggaman's best work. The heroine is called to face perils and difficulties of an unusual kind, but her Catholic faith, so well developed by a convent-school education, brings her to peace in the end, as it always does, and, as is frequently the case in novels and sometimes in real life, to a great deal of innocent human happiness as well.

The country is so occupied with other things that little attention has been paid here to the anti-Christian character of "The Persecutors' Constitution," promulgated at Querétaro last February. But the Mexican Hierarchy, now in exile, were not remiss in their duty. They drew up a strong protest against those articles of the new Constitution which are clearly meant to make the practice of Christianity impossible in Mexico. A translation of this important document is published in the current Catholic Mind. Then follows the American "Hierarchy's Call to Patriotism," which includes the letter written to President Wilson by the Archbishops, and the war-pastorals of Cardinals Gibbons, Farley and O'Connell. The third article in the number is Father Patrick H. Casey's excellent sermon on "The Catholic's Duty in War-Time," in which he explains what "loyalty" and "allegiance" mean and proves that the consistent Catholic must be a better patriot than any one else.

"Jan and Her Job" (Scribners, $1.50), by L. Allen Harker, is a good story, well told. Jan, an English girl, is called to India in time to assist at her sister's deathbed, and finds herself encumbered with two children deserted by their father, a worthless spendthrift. Fortunately there is a worthy English officer, who helps her in her difficulties. Jan returns to England and undertakes to bring up the children, one of whom is a self-willed, but interesting little miss. Jan is in a fair way to succeed in her task, though she finds her hands full, when the lieutenant turns up and both complicates and simplifies her "job" by insisting that he be taken as a part of it. ——Mr. Ernest Thompson Seton's first venture in the field of novel-writing is by no means up to the standard reached in his nature-books. "The Preacher of Great Mountain" (Doubleday, $1.35) is loosely constructed, the hero is quite impossible as a preacher, his method of evangelization by means of boxing contests and fights will not commend itself to the general reader, and the unorthodoxy of his religious views will not find favor, of course, with Catholics. If the story were less patently "uplifting" in purpose, it would be much improved.——In many respects "The Man Thou Gavest," by Harriet T. Comstock (Doubleday, $1.35), recalls the primitive melodrama which thirty years ago was wont to set the boyish heart agog, and diffuse a moisture over the girlish eye. But it lacks the vigor and directness of that once popular form of amusement, and is, on the whole, a disappointing book.

"Pax" (Volksvereins-Verlag, M. Gladbach, 1.20 mk.), written by the Benedictines of the Abbey of Maria Laach, tells of the peace of Christ, the pax Benedictina, the blending of strength with tenderness, the union of the true, the good and the beautiful, the harmony of all that is noblest in the character of man. The great personality of St. Benedict is unfolded in the opening chapter by Abbot Ildefons Herwegen, and the real meaning of "Personality" is deeply probed by the Prior Albert Hammenstede. The Nietzschean school is passed over as a bygone fashion, but special consideration is given to the Kantian personality, the Goethe ideal and the socialistic type. False as these three are, the author finds in each some good, which when brought together and set into full accord with the doctrines of the Church gives us the Catholic saint. For that reason, he says, our forefathers in the Faith spoke not of personalities, but of saints.——"The Social Principles of Jesus" (New York: Association Press, $0.50), by Walter Rauschenbusch, a thoroughly useless book and wholly in keeping with the unchristian philosophy of the day, is an attempt to set forth the teachings of Jesus Christ on "the duties of men." The book's scientific and religious value may be judged from the fact that Christ's claim to Divinity is not deemed worthy of consideration, nor does the supernatural character of Our Lord's mission seem to enter the considerations of this professor of church history in a Protestant theological seminary. The book was written under the direction of a number of committees, one of which represented the Y. M. C. A. Perhaps this Association should drop its third initial.

"Doubtless the devil could contrive some worse impediment to the mobilization of public opinion than a censorship of the press, but I doubt if he ever did," is the opinion of Arthur Bullard, who has written a stirring little war-book called "Mobilizing America" (Macmillan, $0.50). Drawing on observations made during his residence in France and England during the past two years, the author gives practical suggestions about how to avoid the mistakes made by the Allies, warns us earnestly against preparing for only a "short war," and urges that men, industry and public opinion should now be made ready for a long conflict. Then if victory comes soon, our strength will give us a commanding voice in the ensuing peace conference. It is to be regretted that Mr. Bullard goes out of his way in one place to speak slightingly of the French clergy and of Joan of Arc.

"In the Claws of the German Eagle" (Dutton, $1.50) Albert Rhys Williams tells a good story of his experiences in Belgium, Holland and France during the early period of the present war. As special correspondent for the Outlook, Mr. Williams personally felt the weight of Prussian "efficiency" in the German invasion of Belgium. Particularly vivid is the account of his arrest in Brussels and the attempt of his German captors to involve him as a spy in the employ of the British Government. The author believes "That in the new internationalism mankind will lay low the military Frankenstein that he has created, and realize the triumphant brotherhood of all human souls."——"Letters from a French Hospital" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.00) were written to her uncle, with no thought of future publication, by an English girl who devoted herself unweariedly to the care of her blessés. With a vivid, sympathetic pen the author paints what modern warfare does to soldiers' bodies, tells how grateful the brave wounded are for every little attention, and describes the routine of a French war-hospital. There is an amusing story about a dying Highlander, whose last request was that he might hear his native music once more. So a piper was brought and the noise so cheered the wounded Scot that he recovered. But the rest of the ward died.

EDUCATION

Arithmetic in the Grades

SOME time ago, or to be more accurate, since we are concerned with one of the exact sciences, toward the end of January, a class about to take final examinations for "graduation" from the elementary schools was asked: "Which examination do you fear most during the next few days?" From all came the answer, "arithmetic." Nor is this timidity, dislike, fear of failure, confined to one particular class or school. It is true of the majority. Why should an arithmetic examination prove a greater bugbear to the average child than history or geography or spelling? Is it a subject that is neglected in the elementary schools? We think not. One hour a day, or thereabout, is devoted most conscientiously to this subject and teachers generally find this time far too short; yet it is difficult to get a respectable class average in this subject.

The answer may be found in one of the following causes.

(1) In the above-named subjects, text-books are provided from which children may commit to memory the facts, and, given sufficient time and earnestness on the part of the pupil, all may reasonably hope to attain the required average. Arithmetic, on the other hand, requires what a text-book cannot give, the exercise of the reasoning powers, in a more marked degree, and the swift application of rules and processes to given conditions and varying problems. (2) Children are not sure of their subject, for if they were, they would not hesitate to embark upon the uncertain sea of examinations. Those who ought to be most confident, are least so. Here it is a case of, "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." What teacher has not been amused to find little ones return to school after a prolonged absence just in time to be present at the weekly or monthly "test."

Place and Purpose

WE do not agree with those who hold that arithmetic is the most important subject in the elementary schools. English is more important and quite as difficult. Yet, as it is one of the three great "R's," a knowledge of which is essential in every-day life, it cannot be denied that the place of arithmetic in the curriculum is indeed very important. By reason of the mental discipline it affords to the undeveloped mind, it is without a parallel. It teaches children to think logically, to reason from the known to the unknown, from the concrete to the abstract. It exercises and trains the judgment by requiring the pupil to choose from a host of formulas and rules, the particular one applicable to the problem in hand. Again, it is a very practical study, making the mind precise and accurate in its statements, thus giving it an orderly turn; finally it is indispensable in every-day life.

Arithmetic is a subject that requires the pupils to be wide awake. It should, therefore, be given during the first period in the morning, or as soon after as possible. Beginning with simple numbers in the first grade, the work should proceed very gradually, special attention being paid to accuracy and the advantage of cancellation. In the upper grades, an hour's lesson might be divided as follows: Five minutes' mental drill; five minutes' rapid calculation; five minutes' recitation in concert (storm of protest from educators!) of weights and measures, tables, formulas, rules, etc.; ten minutes' oral review of problems previously taught; the remainder of the time to be spent in teaching, or working out new matter. Sometimes young teachers make the mistake of thinking that every problem in every case must be worked out by every child; whereas "talking over" ten examples, and working two would be sufficient. Too much "working-out" is hurtful rather than superfluous.

Short Methods

INEFFICIENCY in this branch is often due to the fact that too many rules are given. Very often the work of both teacher and pupil might be simplified by the adoption of one rule, to be extended as the lesson advances. To illustrate. Suppose the children are being taught the circle and its applications. Instead of teaching one rule to find the circumference, then another, worded very differently, to find the area, while still a third is used for the contents of a cylinder, it would be better to adopt the following:

$$\text{Diameter} \times \frac{22}{7} = \text{circumference}$$

$$\text{Diameter} \times \frac{22}{7} \times \frac{\text{Diam.}}{4} = \text{area of circle}$$

$$\text{Diameter} \times \frac{22}{7} \times \frac{\text{Diam.}}{4} \times \text{altitude} = \text{contents of cylinder.}$$

Here the steps are very gradual, and can be mastered by even the dullest child. Now the question may be asked: "Why use the diameter in each of the above formulas?" The reply is, that the diameter is furnished in the majority of problems of this kind; consequently it need only be transferred from the arithmetic to the child's paper. Again in interest, a very simple rule is, that

from which it follows that $\frac{\text{interest}}{\text{principal} \times \text{time}} = \text{rate}$ varying the words in the denominator according to the conditions of the problem.

Neatness, Illustrations, Homework

TOO much attention cannot be paid to neatness and method in the written work. Many incorrect answers and low marks are due to neglect in these matters. Children try to carry too much in their heads. Sometimes, in the course of a problem, it is necessary to refer to work done at an earlier stage, and if there is a confused jumble of figures on the paper, pupils are apt to select the wrong ones, with the result that their answers are very wide of the mark. This could be avoided in some measure if children were taught to "label" each successive step of the work. Diagrams should be used whenever possible, and in practical measurements should never be omitted. Besides being a great aid to the children in visualizing the problem, the appearance of the paper is materially improved by neat drawings of uniform dimensions throughout the class. Without many practical illustrations, arithmetic becomes a very dry subject indeed. The average child does not care in the least for insurance, bank discount and many other matters considered a necessary part of a grammar-school education. But let the teacher begin a lesson on insurance by a vivid picture of a building on fire just opposite the school-house, the attention of the class will be fixed at once, and before long questions will be forthcoming about the loss sustained, the practical value of insurance, and others, which pave the way for the introduction and definition of the special terms applicable to this branch of percentage.

A word with regard to home-work in this subject may be apt. It seems both unwise and unfair to assign a home-lesson that has not been most carefully prepared, for the reason that overfond parents are only too ready to do the work for the children, forgetful of the fact that they are injuring rather than helping the child. If children are denied the use of paper and pencil during the teacher's exposition of the lesson, and if they realize that the very problems which are being explained and if necessary, worked out on the board before them in the morning, must be done at home in the evening, a two-fold good will be secured: (1) They will pay far greater attention to the morning's lesson, thus forming a habit of concentration; (2) The evening's repetition will impress the work more firmly on the mind.

Preparation of Lessons

SO far we have spoken of ways and means to benefit the child. To the teacher, we would say that there is no royal road by which we may hope to reach results in this subject, except that of daily, conscientious, preparation of lessons. Experience can never dispense a teacher in this matter. Even though the same subject has been taught for ten or fifteen years consecutively, the wide-awake teacher will find something to improve each year. Infinite patience and tireless energy are requisite for successful teaching in this as well as in every other subject. Make use of illustrations, objects, events, everything that can awaken interest or rouse enthusiasm. Let the children feel that you will leave no stone unturned to make the rough path of arithmetic smoother for them.

Finally we must not neglect that most effective of all methods, prayer. The teacher may well make her own the principle of St. Ignatius, to work as though all depended on himself to pray as though all depended on God.

SOCIOLOGY

Saving the Home

A VERY crowded court room and a rather gloomy day. The officer demanded silence, and got it. Then the case was called. "Amelia Jones against John Jones."

"John Jones, you are charged by your wife with non-support. She says you gave her no money last week. Is it true?"

"Yes, your Honor."

"How much are you making a week?"

"Between eighteen and twenty-five dollars. I did not give her anything last week because she did not ask for it."

"How long are you married?"

"Four years."

"How many children have you?"

"We have no children."

"No great wonder then you have both grown apart. If you had children there would be a bond of love stronger than mere passion, and you would not have grown so detestably selfish. Tell the probation officer to come here."

The Probation Officer

THE case in question was one of many coming under the jurisdiction of the Domestic Relations Court. In modern criminology, the function of the Domestic Relations Court is really to save the home. There is no fancy theorizing about crime, but concrete handling of a problem that may spell ruin to many souls if action is not taken at once. The process is as follows: Amelia Jones makes a complaint to the Bureau of Domestic Relations. If, upon investigation, the facts warrant it, a requisition is drawn upon the court that John Jones may be apprehended, and dealt with according to law. This affidavit is sworn to by the complainant, and a warrant or summons issued. John Jones is brought to court and examined. If at all amenable to reason, he is placed under probationary oversight for a year. This means that he signs his name to an agreement to provide for his family. If he is separated from his family, he agrees to pay a given amount in court each week. All is under the care of the probation officer.

But how save the home in case of antecedent separation? Here is the occasion for the human touch, and Magistrate Edward J. Dooley has that and he uses it in this wise: Monday evenings he fixes as the best time for the payment in separation cases. When husband and wife appear the Magistrate offers a hint that maybe they could get on better together now. The children are growing up, he will suggest, separation is an abnormal state, and with a kindness all his own, he often succeeds in uniting husband and wife. The Monday evening method is distinctively his own. His coworkers appear voluntarily, and receive no extra compensation for the extra time spent in the service of the city. Laying aside all the majesty of the law, he and his court officers work to do good to the unfortunates who have lost their sense of the sacredness of the home. In many cases they succeed. Their work is very little known, possibly, because there is so little sensationalism connected with the quiet good effected that it would make poor copy for the press. Or, maybe, because it is not sponsored by million-dollar Foundations, that can command space in the metropolitan press. Who knows?

In the process as briefly outlined, there is no conviction to mar the reputation of the man under probationary supervision, but he is held to live up to his family obligations. He settles the case himself by regular payment. In the event of his failure to contribute, according to signed agreement, to the support of his family, he is brought to court by the probation officer, and is placed on trial. On conviction, he is put on probation for a year, and enjoined to pay a definite amount each week according to his salary. Should he fail to acquit himself of this obligation, the probation officer brings him back to court on a revocation of probation, and he is put under a bond to guarantee his payment for the family support. If unable to furnish this bond he is sent to the workhouse for six months, and at the expiration of his sentence the law allows him six months more before holding him to contribute to the support of his family. Of course another agency, the Department of Charities should be looking after his family. But that is another tale. "The work of the probation officer," as Mr. Hodge of the Myrtle Avenue Court, Brooklyn, put it, "is to build up the family."

Getting at Causes

IN the Magistrate's office, at the conclusion of the morning session, it was interesting to get at the views held by a man who has specialized in this phase of our court system.

"Magistrate Dooley, what are the causes that are back of the cases that come before you here day after day?"

"I will tell you what I think, Father, and you have full liberty to quote me. Here are the causes as I would put them:

First, lack of employment caused by the economic conditions that surround the delinquents in this class. Among those conditions may be mentioned the introduction of new machinery which often brings about the displacement of workingmen who cannot keep pace with this new environment. Strikes and lockouts frequently cause unemployment of the surplus of unskilled laborers. A large percentage of the delinquents belong to the class of unskilled laborers.

Second, intemperance. The observant individual in the business world sees that the habit of indulging in alcoholic stimulants, so characteristic of the last decade, is fast disappearing. To a large number of the laboring men, and particularly the unskilled laborers who compose the largest class, who are summoned to this court, this trend of the day has apparently not yet reached, for at least twenty per cent of the broken homes are caused by the inordinate use of intoxicating liquors.

Third, want of education, generally and specifically on the duties imposed by the marital and parental obligations. If these duties were better understood before marriage, if fathers and mothers would throw aside that false delicacy which surrounds them on this subject, and instruct their sons and daughters of marital age on these duties, less misery would ensue in the married life of these untaught sons and daughters, and the issue of those marriages would have less cause to seek the portals of the Domestic Relations Court.

Fourth, the tendency to treat the marriage tie not as a sacred obligation, but as a contract loosely entered into and just as loosely broken. I think, with Professor Thwing, that the growth of atheistic and socialistic principles in society has weakened in the popular mind the conception of marriage as a Divine ordinance and therefore as a tie of binding force. To those who eliminate God from the world it becomes an easy task to rob marriage of its sacred character. The institution of marriage rests upon a triangular base. It is founded upon the interest of the individual, upon the interest of the State and upon Divine ordinance. To weaken this foundation upon any side causes the structure to totter.

Parental Responsibilities

UPON the husband and father are cast the burden and obligation of maintaining the home and educating all the children. He is therefore entitled to be the directing force in the household so long as what he does conduces to the betterment of the family.

The wife, as Schouler in his work on domestic relations says, is expected to conform to his habits, tastes and even his eccentricities, provided her health is not seriously endangered by so doing. The wife is entitled to the support, love and unselfish affection of the husband. Incompatibility is usually a mild name for niggardly practices in the household. The wife is entitled to be treated as an equal by the husband and not as a chattel. She and the children of the family are entitled to be secured, so far as lies in the power of the husband and father, from the heat of the summer and the blasts of winter. With self-abnegation on the part of husband and wife a happy home should be the result."

Light and Shadow

AS case after case came up on this spring day, there was much to make one think that after all human nature is a weird thing. Was it all as the pessimists say? All shadow? Hardly. The morning calendar was nearly finished, and the voices of the schoolchildren rushing home for lunch, came echoing in through the open windows. There were children's voices in the courtroom too, but they did not sound merry. However, now and then a child that had been taken from school and put to work by greedy or needy parents before the time allowed by law, would answer the magistrate with charming simplicity and not a little humor. Even the non-support cases had their humorous side, as the stock excuse, "just about to take a position" was more than a twice-told tale. In fact Magistrate Dooley made the remark that the Court was really a failure as nearly all the men charged with non-support were "just going to work" when arrested.

The Aim of the Court

BRIEFLY the aim of the Domestic Relations Court is to keep the home as it should be, to take action before the crash comes, and, after trouble has broken out, to deal justly and at the same time sympathetically with the offender. While removing the women and children from the environment of a police court, which is hardly ever uplifting in the real sense of the word, the Domestic Relations Court promptly compels delinquent deserters to do their duty by wife and children. It is an established fact that the majority of the children in the reformatories come from disrupted homes. Demoralized homes and incipient criminality go hand in hand. To be a preventive agency against disruption, where calm treatment of each case may soften and not harden hearts gone wrong, is the function of the Domestic Relations Court. All its machinery is directed toward maintaining the basic foundation of the State, the family unit. To save the home is to save the nation. Has any court in all our judicial system a higher function?

NOTE AND COMMENT

Catholic Patriotism

THE great American dreadnaught, New Mexico, recently launched at New York, was christened by a Catholic, Miss Margaret De Baca, daughter of the late Governor De Baca, of New Mexico. The Governor, according to the Denver Catholic Register, had been a devout Catholic. The same paper also calls attention to the graduation of Daniel Noce from West Point Military Academy. He is the son of a local Catholic family, who ranked seventh in a class of 139 at West Point. There were about thirty Catholics among the graduates, showing the generous response Catholics are giving to the call of patriotism. No doubt it will be found that among the privates who have volunteered the number of Catholics will be no less remarkable. It is foolish, however, to think that this will put more than a temporary quietus upon the noble Guardians of Liberty.

Written Engagement Contracts

ACCORDING to a bill introduced into the Michigan Legislature suits for breach of promise to marry will hereafter be impossible unless the persons concerned publicly recorded their engagement. This is another acknowledgment of the wisdom of the Church in her legislation. In proposing the bill the Hon. Charles W. Clark said:

> In business deals almost every business man insists on a written memorandum. If the terms of such relatively minor matters are placed in writing, why should not the most important transaction one can possibly make be reduced to writing? The vast majority of partnership agreements are in writing, why not the partnership for life?

These words recall the positive legislation of Pope Pius X. for all Catholics:

> Only those matrimonial engagements are considered valid and beget canonical effects which have been made in writing, signed by both parties, and by either the parish priest or the Ordinary of the place, or at least by two witnesses.

It is notable that the Michigan bill also provides that ministers or magistrates shall not perform marriage ceremonies within fifteen days after a license has been issued. "On-the-spur-of-the-moment marriages rarely result in lasting relations." The Church has again made even wiser provisions in her proclamation of the bans on successive Sundays before the marriage takes place.

"The Twilight of the Holy Synod"

IN an article on the Russian revolution, published in the Catholic World, the writer says that the Russian Church is threatened at present with an anarchical régime. It is a body left without a head, either lay or ecclesiastical, and such a body is not able to direct its movements and energies. A resurrection of the Russian Patriarchate he considers to be impossible, and would therefore recall to the minds of the Russian leaders the timely words of Vladimir Solovyev:

> Throughout the Christian world only the Bishops of Rome have claimed for their own see supremacy over the whole Church. The rivals of Rome, even when opposing the claims of Papacy, dared not demand for themselves the same prerogatives. There is, then, in the Church of Christ, an historical center of religious unity, a center which has never existed, either in Jerusalem, or Constantinople, or Moscow. He who disowns that center of unity is logically forced to admit that either the Church is headless in her earthly life, or that her supreme government must rest in the civil power. In the first case, we would infer that Jesus Christ believed religious anarchy to be the best means of perpetuating His work amongst men; in the second, the > Church would no longer be the universal society of the Faithful, but a political tool, a department of a civil bureaucracy, suffering all the changes and vicissitudes of human policy and of human uncertainty.

In this "twilight of the Holy Synod" there may indeed be a number who will ponder such thoughts, if they can be properly proposed to them, and so will be led back to Catholic unity.

Billy Sunday on the Catholic School

BILLY SUNDAY is quoted in the New York press as having paid the following "tribute" to the Catholic Church in his "Mothers' Sermon":

> The Catholics are right when they say, "Give us the children until they are ten years old and we don't care who has them after that." The Catholics are not losing any sleep over the loss of men and women from their church membership. It is the only Church that ever showed us the sensible way to reach the masses: by getting hold of the children.

It is not precisely true that Catholics are content with having the children merely until the tenth year. There are dangers in the non-Catholic university no less than in the primary school, and we rightly insist upon an education that is soundly Catholic from first to last. But there is no doubt about the main fact, that the natural means Divine Providence intends us to use for the preservation of the Faith is the Catholic school.

A Non-Catholic Governor and New York "Nun-Chasers"

THE following sincere and highly appreciative words, sent to the editor of the Catholic Northwest Progress, by the Governor of the State of Idaho, might well be taken to heart by the New York politicians who were lately greeted in a public assemblage with the very descriptive, if not most elegant soubriquet of "nun-chasers." Governor M. Alexander wrote:

> I am not a Catholic and I know very little about the Catholic religion, but I can tell you that I live across the street from a Catholic school for girls in Boise, and 300 feet from a Catholic hospital, both institutions being in charge of a Catholic Order of Sisters, and they are the best neighbors I have ever had, and I have backed up my belief in the Sisters by sending my own children to their school, for I believe their teaching and example inspire the highest ideals of womanhood of any school of our land.

This is clearly no mere political document, for the writer's convictions are backed by his actions. So too a New York non-Catholic, residing close to an orphanage which has been made the victim of systematic persecution, aimed at its complete extinction, remarked that from all that he had seen he would be happy to have his own children in the tender and intelligent care of the Sisters. But of what concern is the happiness of the children or the salvation of their immortal souls to the men who are the instigators of this conspiracy against the Sisterhoods, or to the mercenary tools whom they employ?

Mammoth Earnings

THE enormous profits of American monopolies were again made evident when the Federal Trade Commission's investigation into the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey revealed that the annual earnings of this section alone were $51,591,569 for the year 1915. These figures do not represent the present earning power of the company, which has vastly increased in the interval. Yet the net earnings of the New Jersey company, which represent 20.6 per cent of the net investment, are not so remarkable as the records of some other companies. Thus the percentage of net earnings on investment for the Standard of Indiana, was 36; for the Standard of Ohio, 23; for the Standard of Nebraska, 37.5; for the Standard of Kentucky, 22.8, and for the Continental, 34. In fact, of the ten companies listed by the Federal Trade Commission, three only fall beneath the percentage of the net earnings of the Standard of New Jersey. The parent company, before dissolution, is said to have paid dividends ranging from 30 per cent., in 1898, to 48 in 1900 and 1901. There was a drop of from 10 to 30 per cent during the last year of its existence. Another instance of enormous earnings was recently revealed when the Superior Steel Company, of Carnegie, Pa., which had been capitalized at only $500,000, was sold to Eastern capitalists for $11,500,000. Yet not even all of its stock of $500,000 had been issued, nor did the company owe its tremendous prosperity to war orders.

Prohibitionist Fanaticism

IN its editorial comments the American Church Monthly calls attention to the religious persecution which has been politically organized in the name of Prohibition. The prevention of the use of wine for sacramental purposes is one of the avowed objects of many of its leading agitators and spokesmen:

> It is not drunkenness alone that they wish abolished, but the use of alcohol in any form or amount, for they are teaching that the reception of even a drop of alcohol damns a man to hell. There are few men who would not desire drunkenness to be abolished, but can churchmen go to such extremes with the rabid prohibitionists? With all the trickery of interpretation possible, it cannot be shown that the Lord used grape juice when He instituted the Sacrament of His Body and Blood. The Protestant prohibitionist, to win us and our aid, is willing for the time to have an exception made by which alcohol can be used in the Sacrament, but to him this is only temporary. The citadel, the seat of all evil, is the use of alcohol in any shape or for any purpose. It is not reasonable to think that he will ever rest until he makes it impossible to get alcohol in any shape and for any use. In the "dry" States where Protestantism is rampant, there is yearly an attack made upon the exceptions, and it is yearly becoming more difficult to withstand the assault upon the Sacrament.

Writing from the Anglican point of view the Monthly points out the inroads which Prohibition has made even on the Anglican ministry: "There are priests in the Church who are violating their ordination vows by using grape juice in the Sacrament. It should be the duty of every bishop to ascertain how many of his clergy are invalidating the Holy Communion by using what the Lord did not use and what the Church has forbidden." There has, of course, been no question of any Catholic priest attempting such an act which would be visited by instant punishment. "There is every reason to believe," the editorial concludes, "that the Church must undergo a persecution for the Kingdom of God's sake or basely yield to fanatic clamor." The new Prohibition law of Iowa lends color to this judgment. The following are the terms under which altar wine must be purchased by the clergy:

> Persons holding permits may sell and dispense intoxicating liquors, not including malt liquors, for pharmaceutical and medical purposes and to permit holders for use and resale by them only for the purpose authorized in this chapter: they may also sell and dispense alcohol for specified chemical and mechanical purposes and wine for sacramental uses.

In interpreting this law the Attorney General, according to the Western World, holds that clergymen may buy their altar wine from permit holders in their neighborhood, but that they must themselves remove it. Delivery by an expressman, according to a recent law, constitutes a sale in Iowa, and would make the action illegal.

The Hierarchy's Call to Patriotism

The Persecutors' Constitution

The Catholic's Duty in War-Time

A great service to the general Catholic public is done in this issue of the CATHOLIC MIND in placing in handy form for reference the patriotic utterances of the Hierarchy of the United States in regard to the war, and Father Casey's discourse on loyalty and allegiance makes a most appropriate supplement to this compilation. The sham called "liberty" in Mexico, and the anti-Christian Constitution foisted on that unfortunate republic, are thoroughly exposed in another paper, which is a translation of the Mexican Bishops' protest.

You cannot afford to be without these useful little pamphlets.

Chronicle

The War.—During the week the British have taken most of Roeux and all of Bullecourt. The Germans have made repeated counter-attacks of great violence, but have not regained any territory. Against the French the Germans have taken the offensive at a number of points between Laffaux and Auberive, but have nowhere advanced. In the Goritz region the Italians have crossed the Isonzo north of Goritz, taken the town of Bombruz and stormed Monte Cuccio, part of Monte Vodice and Hill 174. In Macedonia French attacks near Monastir have failed; further east the British have captured Kjupri, and southwest of Krastali they have advanced about a third of a mile on a front of three miles. In Volhynia there has been a renewal of activity, with the Germans on the offensive.

Bulletin, May 14, p.m.-May 21, a.m.

As finally reported to Congress by the conferees, the Army bill contained only one minor change not already accepted by both Houses. This provision raised the pay of both army and navy fifteen dollars a month. The bill in its last revised form passed the House unanimously and the Senate by a vote of sixty-five to eight. The President signed it on May 18 and it thereby became a law.

The Army Bill

On May 17 by an amendment to the Army and Navy Deficiency bill, the Senate voted to limit the period for conscription. By the amendment, which was offered by Senators Smith and Keller, the President is directed to issue a proclamation, as soon as war shall have ceased, to the effect that peace has been concluded. Four months after the issuance of the proclamation, the selective conscription section of the Army bill will cease to be in force and effect. This measure Senator Smith tried but failed to have incorporated in the Army bill.

On May 18 the President issued a proclamation calling the nation to arms. It was the first step towards carrying out the important enactment of compulsory military service. After citing the section of the Army bill by which, except those exempted, all males of the United States, between the ages of twenty-one and thirty inclusive are rendered liable to combative service in the army and are declared guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to punishment if they fail or refuse to present themselves for registration, and the other section by which the President is authorized to put into execution the aforesaid section, Mr. Wilson calls upon the officials to whom the registration had been intrusted to carry out the instructions already communicated to them. The part of the proclamation which especially concerns the general public is as follows:

The President's Proclamation

> I do further proclaim and give notice to all persons subject to registration in the several States and in the District of Columbia in accordance with the above law that the time and place of such registration shall be between 7 a. m. and 7 p. m. on the fifth day of June, 1917, at the registration place in the precinct wherein they have their permanent homes. Those who shall have attained their twenty-first birthday and who shall not have attained their thirty-first birthday on or before the day here named are required to register, excepting only officers and enlisted men of the regular army, the navy, the Marine Corps and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, and the officers in the Officers' Reserve Corps and enlisted men in the enlisted reserve corps while in active service. In the Territories of Alaska, Hawaii and Porto Rico a day for registration will be named in a later proclamation.

Those who through sickness or absence shall be unable to present themselves at the registration place in the precinct in which they have their permanent homes must register by agent or by mail. After the registration is completed, the first army of 500,000 men will be selected, by a method not yet made public, from those on the list who are not exempted by a section of the bill not cited in the proclamation.

The President went on to say that it is not merely the army which must be trained for war; the whole nation must be mobilized with the single purpose of offering one compact front against a common foe; in consequence, "Congress has provided that the nation shall be organized for war by selection and that each man shall be classified for service in the place to which it shall best serve the general good to call him." He lays stress on the fact that what the Government contemplates "is in no sense a conscription of the unwilling; it is, rather, selection from a nation which has volunteered in mass."

It is estimated that the registration of the 10,200,000 men included in the bill will be completed in about five days, and that the call to the colors of those selected will be issued for September 1. Thirty-two divisional camps will be established for the training of the National Guard and the first selected army of 500,000. Commissioned and non-commissioned officers will be appointed to supervise the training, and they will be chosen from the members of the officers' camps, like that at Plattsburg, and from all ranks and grades of the regulars and guardsmen.

War Measures

All existing regiments of the National Guard, which are to be recruited to their full war strength of 329,954 men and 9,847 officers as soon as possible, will be conscripted into the Federal service in three consignments on July 15, July 25 and August 5, and so will be freed from the limitations of place and service which affect the militia. On the last-named date they will report for service, and after intensive training for some weeks, will, it is said, be transported to Europe to receive their final training near the battle-lines. The regulars are to be recruited up to their war strength of 293,000.

The advance guard of the army, which the United States will send to Europe, will set sail for France at an early date. Announcement was made to this effect in the following official notice:

> The President has directed an expeditionary force of approximately one division of regular troops under command of Gen. John J. Pershing to proceed to France at as early a date as practicable. Gen. Pershing and staff will precede the troops abroad. It is requested that no details or speculations with regard to the mobilization of this command, dates of departure, composition or other items be carried by the press other than the official bulletins given out by the War Department relating thereto.

The departure of this force, which is to be augmented by a regiment of marines and will probably be about 40,000 strong, is in accordance with the advice and request of Marshal Joffre. It is said that after having taken part in fighting at the front they will return to the United States with knowledge of actual conditions on the battle-line and thus be in a position to give expert training to our troops, especially of the later increments of 500,000, to be raised as soon as it is necessary and possible to do so. British and French officers are also expected, so it is said, to lend the aid of their experience in present method of warfare to the training of our soldiers.

The President has made it known that he will not avail himself for the present of the authority given him by Congress to organize volunteer divisions, to be put under the command of Col. Roosevelt. His decision, he said, was based on expert and professional advice on both sides of the Atlantic. Such divisions would interfere with the prompt creation and early use of an effective army, and would contribute practically nothing to the effective strength of the armies now engaged against Germany. The officers, in particular, which Mr. Roosevelt had requested should be associated with him, could not possibly be spared at present.

The Roosevelt Volunteer Army

> It would be very agreeable to me to pay Mr. Roosevelt this compliment and the Allies the compliment of sending to their aid one of our most distinguished public men, an ex-President who has rendered many conspicuous public services and proved his gallantry in many striking ways. Politically, too, it would no doubt have a very fine effect and make a profound impression. But this is not the time or the occasion for compliment or for any action not calculated to contribute to the immediate success of the war. The business now in hand is undramatic, practical and of scientific definiteness and precision. I shall act with regard to it at every step and in every particular under expert and professional advice from both sides of the water.

The President declared that the responsibility for the successful conduct of the war rested on himself, and that the issues involved were too immense for him to take into consideration anything whatever "except the best, most effective, most immediate means of military action."

The Espionage bill has gone to conference, principally for the consideration of the embargo and censorship sections. Just before the Senate voted on the bill, Senator Overman moved that the censorship section be reincorporated into the bill. His motion was defeated by a vote of forty-eight to thirty-four. The Senate subsequently passed the entire bill, with the omission of the censorship section, by a vote of seventy-six to six. The House, on the other hand, has retained the censorship section. The matter will be settled by conferees from both Houses.

Other Bills

The War Revenue bill, although it has been discussed in hearings before the Senate Financial Committee and in the House, has not made much progress. A number of amendments have been accepted by the House, aimed for the most part at making the rich bear a larger proportion of the burden of the war. Senator Simmons, Chairman of the Senate Financial Committee, is reported to have said that the bill will be rewritten before reaching the Senate. The President is opposed to it in its present form.

The Deficiency bill, popularly known as the war budget, which carries an appropriation of approximately three and a half billion dollars, passed the Senate on May 19. It contains an important amendment not included in the bill as passed by the House. This amendment authorizes the President to commandeer the entire shipping and shipbuilding interests of the United States. To facilitate the construction and purchase of shipping, including foreign shipping and presumably the 1,024,000 tons now in course of construction in the United States for British interests, which Great Britain has agreed to turn over to us, the Senate added $750,000,000 to the war appropriation of approximately $2,800,000,000 authorized by the House. The bill has been referred to conference.

The agitation for a more authoritative food control, aimed at an efficient and equitable distribution to the United States and the Allies, has eventuated in a request made to Congress by President Wilson for legislation providing for the establishment of a food commission with Mr. Herbert C. Hoover at its head. It is not proposed to interfere with the normal activities of the Department of Agriculture, but to provide for the emergency activities necessitated by the war. According to the President

Proposed Food Commission

> The objects sought to be solved by the legislation asked for are: Full inquiry into the existing available stocks of foodstuffs and into the costs and practices of the various food producing and distributing trades; the prevention of all unwarranted hoarding of every kind and of the control of foodstuffs by persons who are not in any legitimate sense producers, dealers or traders; the requisitioning, when necessary for the public use, of food supplies and of the equipment necessary for handling them properly; the licensing of wholesome and legitimate mixtures and milling percentages and the prohibition of the unnecessary or wasteful use of foods. Authority is asked also to establish prices—not in order to limit the profits of the farmers, but only to guarantee to them when necessary a minimum price which will insure them a profit where they are asked to attempt new crops, and to secure the consumer against extortion by breaking up corners and attempts at speculation when they occur by fixing temporarily a reasonable price at which middlemen must sell.

Control of imports and exports is also contemplated. Mr. Hoover has outlined the five cardinal principles of the food administration with which Congress has been asked to confer on him, as follows:

> (1) That the food problem is one of wise administration and not expressed by the words "dictator" or "controller," but "food administrator." (2) That this administration can be largely carried out through the coordination and regulation of the existing legitimate distributative agencies, supplemented by certain emergency bodies composed of representatives of the producers, distributors and consumers. (3) The organization of the community for voluntary conservation of foodstuffs. (4) That all important positions, so far as they may be, shall be filled with volunteers. (5) The independent responsibility of the food administration directly under the President, with the cooperation of the great and admirable organizations of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, the Federal Trade Commission and the railroad executives.

Mr. Hoover said that the administration of food would involve the establishment of executive bodies, the cooperation of Governors and State food administrations, general domestic economy, and cooperation with the Allies concerning exports and imports, and the purchasing of food both for the United States and the Allies so as to eliminate competition.

The German Reichstag, which convened after the Easter recess with the intention of hastening constitutional reforms adjourned for two months on May 17 without having made any progress.

Other Items

The adjournment was taken by action of the Reichstag itself, but it is said that the Government had intimated that it would invoke its power to close the session by imperial decree if this step were not taken. The reason for the abrupt termination of the session is reported to have been the desire of the Government to have its hands free from Parliamentary embarrassment to deal with the Russian situation and to prosecute the war with undiminished vigor.

The United States Government has informed the revolutionists in Cuba that they will be dealt with as enemies of the United States unless they return at once to their allegiance. Forty-eight United States destroyers reported on May 6 at Queenstown for cooperation with the Allies in fighting the submarines. Almost immediately after their arrival they left for active service in patrolling the sea lanes of mercantile traffic. Dr. Paul Ritter, former Swiss Minister to the United States, has been transferred to the Hague. The reason for the change is stated in diplomatic circles to be the desire of Switzerland to have at Washington a representative more thoroughly in sympathy with the ideals of the United States and the Allies. M. Hans Sulser has been nominated as his successor, but his appointment will depend on his being acceptable to Washington.

Canada seems likely to resort to conscription. On May 18 Sir Robert Borden, Premier, announced in the Canadian Parliament that a bill would be introduced providing for compulsory military enlistment on a selective basis of not less than 50,000 men and possibly of 100,000 men. Nicaragua has severed diplomatic relations with Germany.

Ireland.—On May 16 Lloyd George, the British Prime Minister, sent John Redmond a letter outlining the Government's project to effect an immediate settlement, conceding the largest possible measure of Home Rule which can be secured by agreement at this moment, without prejudice to the undertaking of Parliament of a further and final settlement of the questions most in dispute, after the war." The plan was as follows:

A New Scheme for Home Rule

> (1) They (the Government) would introduce a bill for the immediate application of the Home Rule act to Ireland, but excluding therefrom the six northeast counties of Ulster, such exclusion to be subject to reconsideration by Parliament at the end of five years, unless it is previously terminated by the action of the Council of Ireland, to be set up as hereinafter described. (2) With a view to securing the largest possible measure of common action for the whole of Ireland the bill would provide for a Council of Ireland, to be composed of two delegations, consisting on the one hand of all members returned to Westminster from the excluded area, and on the other of a delegation equal in numbers from the Irish Parliament, this council to be summoned on the initiative of any six members. It would be empowered by a majority of the votes of each of the delegations to pass private bill legislation affecting both the included and excluded areas; to recommend to the Crown the extension to the excluded area by an Order in Council of any act of the Irish Parliament; to agree to the inclusion under the Home Rule act of the whole of Ireland, subject to the assent of a majority of the voters in the excluded area, the powers to be vested in the Crown in that case to extend the act to all of Ireland by an Order in Council, to make recommendations on its own initiative upon the Irish question, including the amendment of the Home Rule act as finally passed. The President of this Council of Ireland would be elected by agreement between the delegations, or in default of agreement would be nominated by the Crown. (3) The letter says that the financial proposals of the Home Rule bill are unsatisfactory and should be reconsidered. Important objects, such as the development of Irish industries, improvement in town housing and the furtherance of education, with increased pay for teachers, owing to the war conditions, it declares, cannot be dealt with under the bill without undue burden on the Irish taxpayers. (4) The Government would recommend that after the second reading of the bill embodying the above proposals, together with the Home Rule act, it should forthwith be considered by a conference to be constituted on the lines of the Speaker's conference on electoral reform, though not consisting exclusively of members of Parliament, and meeting under the chairmanship of some one commanding the same general confidence in his impartiality and judgment as Mr. Speaker himself.

The Premier suggested as an alternative to this project "a convention of Irishmen of all parties for the purpose of producing a scheme of Irish self-government."

As was to be expected, the new plan for Home Rule proved unsatisfactory, for different reasons, not only to the Nationalists but to the Sinn Feiners and to the Unionists besides. Mr. Redmond repudiated it and accepted the alternative in these words:

> The second alternative, "the assembling of a convention of Irishmen of all parties for the purpose of producing a scheme of Irish self-government," has much to recommend it. You ask: "Would it be too much to hope that Irishmen of all creeds and parties might meet in convention for the purpose of drafting a constitution which will secure a just balance of all opposing interests, and finally compose the unhappy discords which so long have distracted Ireland and impeded its harmonious development?" This is the great ideal, and I trust it may be found possible of realization. My colleagues and I, at all events, will place no obstacle in the way, and we are prepared to recommend this proposal most earnestly to our countrymen on condition that the basis on which the convention is to be called is such as to secure that it will be fully and fairly representative of Irishmen of all creeds, interests and parties, and secondly, that the convention be summoned without delay. If this proposal is put into operation I can assure you that no effort on the part of my colleagues and myself will be spared to realize the high and blessed ideal pointed to in the concluding paragraph of your letter.

According to press dispatches, the convention will be opposed by the Unionists, although it is felt by some that Carson was a party to the convention idea. Apparently the division of Irish opinion is so great that there is little hope of a satisfactory convention.

Russia.—The situation in Russia, which at the beginning of last week was very dark, improved during the next eight days. On May 14 General Guchkoff, Minister of War for the Provisional Government, resigned his office. The interference of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates in military affairs, which threatened, he said, "to have consequences fatal to the defense, the liberty and even the existence of Russia," forced him to resign. General Brussiloff, commander-in-chief of the Russian armies on the southwestern front, and General Gurko, the commander on the western front, also asked to be relieved of their commands; and A. F. Kerensky, the Socialist Minister of Justice, announced that "as affairs are going now it will be impossible to save the country." Moreover the reported fraternizing of German and Russian troops was undermining the morale of the army. On Gen. Guchkoff's resignation the Workmen's and Soldiers' Council sent a proclamation to the army urging the troops to defend revolutionary Russia with all their power, not to renounce the offensive, to cease fraternizing with "officers of the enemy's General Staff, disguised as common soldiers" and "to reject everything which weakens your military power, which distracts the army and lowers its morale."

Last Week's Situation

On May 16 came the news that Paul N. Milyukoff, Minister of Foreign Affairs, had also resigned from the Cabinet. During the subsequent reorganization of the Ministry, the Provisional Government discussed the terms under which the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates would enter the Cabinet but could not accept the latter's policy of striving for a general peace as soon as possible, without annexations and indemnities. A new Cabinet, however, was eventually formed which is made up as follows: Premier and Minister of the Interior, Prince Lvoff; Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Tereschtenko; Minister of Commerce and Industry, M. Konovaloff; State Controller, M. Godneff, Socialist; Minister of Labor, M. Skobeleff; Minister of Justice, M. Pereveiezeff; Minister of Food and Supplies, M. Pieschehonoff, Socialist; Minister of War and Marine, M. Kerensky; Minister of Finance, M. Shingaroff; Minister of Posts and Telegraphs, M. Tseretelli; Minister of Ways and Communications, M. Nekrasoff, and Minister of Education, M. Manuiloff.

The New Cabinet

The Provisional Government, the Executive Committee of the Duma, and the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates agreed on these three cardinal points: "The unity of the allied fronts. The fullest confidence of the revolutionary democracy in the reconstructed Cabinet. A plenitude of powers for the Government." The new Cabinet then issued an announcement that they were opposed to the acceptance of a separate peace for Russia and M. Kerensky, the Minister of War, says he is determined to restore discipline to the army and is going to the fighting line to see that the troops do their duty.

Mr. Balfour and Ireland

WILLIAM J. M. A. MALONEY, M.D.

ACCORDING to a recent Washington dispatch an American deputation called Mr. Balfour's attention to the favorable impression a solution of the Irish question would create in this country. In answer Mr. Balfour stated that though he had no power to speak for the Government he could say that everything possible was being done to bring the various Irish elements together, and that the British Parliament stood ready to agree to any solution which the Irish themselves found acceptable. Furthermore, he promised to report the meeting fully to his Government.

This reply must be weighed with due allowance for Balfour's desire to distinguish between two main classes of issues involved in the Irish question. The first class includes such issues as the right of small nations to self-government, democracy's aim in the war, the expediency of a settlement as an incentive to full American participation in the fray, and other problems less important. The second class includes issues vital to the immediate or remote future of English politics, namely, class-rule versus democracy in England, and the personal conflict between Mr. Balfour and Lord Northcliffe.

Lord Northcliffe's open quarrel with Mr. Balfour dates from the former's successful efforts to destroy the Coalition Cabinet which he accused of incompetency. Two of the main targets of his attack were Mr. Balfour, then First Lord of the Admiralty, and Lord Robert Cecil, in charge of the blockade as a subordinate to Viscount Grey. But Mr. Balfour's position as the real chief of the ruling classes was so impregnable that he passed tranquilly from the Admiralty to the Foreign Office, in the new Administration, and was powerful enough to protect his cousin, Lord Robert, and to secure his continuance in charge of the blockade with the added prestige of full ministerial rank. The vehement Northcliffe denunciation of these appointments did not in the least affect the security of their tenure.

When Mr. Balfour reached this country, Lord Northcliffe cabled that the former could, if he would, settle the Irish problem; and at the same time he caused to be canvassed the opinions of such distinguished American statesmen as ex-President Roosevelt and ex-President Taft who advocated that the government of Ireland by the Irish should be instituted at once. Their advocacy was cabled to the Times and published in that paper on Thursday, April 25, a day which had been set for a statement of the Cabinet's intentions regarding Ireland. The statement however was postponed. The government of Ireland is obviously a Northcliffe-versus-Balfour issue and the latter's reply to the American deputation was in reality a thrust at Northcliffe, and nothing else.

Class-rule it will be remembered, suffered an eclipse under Mr. Balfour owing to the aftermath of the Boer War and the proposals to abolish free trade. He clung to office, contrary to precedent, after suffering defeat in the House of Commons, but ultimately he was driven from power and was succeeded by Mr. Bonar Law. However the present war has given him an opportunity to return from this oblivion. Meanwhile, a Liberal-Labor-Nationalist Coalition introduced many wholesome laws, the object of which was to confer old-age pensions and government insurance upon the working classes, to reenforce the power of the labor unions, to begin the reclamation of feudal estates by the English people, to disestablish the State church in Wales, to give Home Rule to Ireland and to consecrate the democratic principle of one man, one vote. To accomplish this progressive program, another reform, more difficult of achievement than any of the others, was found necessary: the House of Lords blocked the way of reform, so that body had to be deprived of the summary exercise of its veto power. By the harmonious cooperation of the Liberal, Labor, and Irish Nationalist Members, this was done. Having lost the power to veto the will of the people, the English reactionaries had still these three main lines of defense against the march of democracy: the army, Ulster, and the State Church in England. As a measure designed to arrest the progress of reform, the first and second of these were combined to oppose the Home Rule act.

When it became evident that the Home Rule bill would pass, senior officers of the English army, as age retired them from service, were hired to drill the Ulsterites. A former colonel of the regiment to which I was attached, was one of those engaged. I well remember our amusement when on revisiting his old regiment he told us that the morning duties of himself and his brother-officers were to give the command "Form fours" and throughout the rest of the day to strive to disentangle his volunteers. The officers at the Curragh, under Sir John French, refused to march against their former associates who were leading the Ulsterites in rebellion. At that time the government of Ireland was an issue of such importance to the ruling class in England, that to prevent Home Rule in Ireland they were willing to risk plunging into civil war in Ireland.

Such was the political condition of Great Britain when Germany decided to invade Belgium. During the last week in July, 1914, the Liberal Cabinet was known to be divided on the question of entering the war. What turned the scale, and resulted in the resignation of Lord Morley, Mr. Burns and Mr. Trevelyan, was a private call made by Mr. Balfour upon Mr. Asquith on the memorable first Sunday of August. At this meeting the latter was assured of the support of the Conservative party if he went to war and he was faced with the prospect of being forced to an election if he did not. Although Mr. Balfour was not the titular party leader, Mr. Asquith accepted his proffer of support and England entered the war. The disappointments of the first year of the war placed the Asquith Liberal Cabinet in the position of a merely nominal government, receiving and executing the orders of Mr. Balfour and his supporters.

Under the Coalition, the reestablishment of the Cecil family as the hereditary trustee of the English ruling classes was quickly effected. Mr. Balfour himself became head of the Admiralty, Lord Robert Cecil entered the foreign office in charge of the blockade, Lord Edward Cecil remained as financial adviser to the Egyptian Government, the Rev. Lord William Cecil was translated from the obscurity of the Cecil family church at Hatfield to the bishopric of Exeter, and Lord Hugh Cecil, in a letter to the Times, discussed with perfect candor the conditions under which it would be convenient to dispense with the assistance of Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister. After the Rumanian reverse it was convenient and the Prime Minister disappeared. The Northcliffe press was of great assistance in bringing about the overthrow of the Coalition. Of the Ministers of that Coalition whom it attacked on the ground of incompetency the only survivors are Mr. Balfour and his cousin Lord Robert. Moreover, there is practically no one formerly conspicuous as a supporter of Mr. Balfour who is not now with him in the Ministry. Hence, when Mr. Balfour promised, as he is alleged to have promised the Irish-American deputation, "to report the meeting fully to his Government" in thus qualifying the Government as "his" he spoke literally. Lord Northcliffe was painfully aware of Mr. Balfour's supreme power in England when he cabled that the settlement of the Irish question lay at Washington in Mr. Balfour's hands.

Even from the foregoing cursory survey of Mr. Balfour's past and present status, it is obvious that he has the power to settle the Irish question if he deems it expedient to do so. But is he minded to dispose of the question either with an eye to the welfare of Ireland or with the desire to make a concession to American wishes? An obviously inspired dispatch in the New York Times, May 7, a dispatch which is headed "Home Rule Outside Balfour's Mission." states that "His associates on the commission have made it plain that the Irish question is outside the bounds of their program in coming to this country." We know that his mission here is not to decide class-versus-popular rule in England; we know that his mission here is not to decide the Balfour-versus-Northcliffe issue. Having enjoyed the benefit of the pro-English sentiment which the alleged imminence of the grant of self-government to Ireland has stimulated in America, Mr. Balfour might, in courtesy to his hosts, frankly explain his position and the bearing of Ireland upon it, instead of advancing the old equivocations of Irish disagreement and pro-German influences.

What will Mr. Balfour do? He has one immediate issue, the Northcliffe-versus-Balfour issue, in which his class or caste is threatened. If this attack proceeds, Mr. Balfour's reaction to it will probably be a general election. Such a reaction is an unanswerable response to alien democratic pressure, a response directly from the electorate. It is also a challenge with loaded dice to Lord Northcliffe. If that publisher wishes to evade the issue he will retire, while there is yet time, by urging a partition of Ireland, and his discreet withdrawal may be spared the appearance of lack of valor by the inclusion of Tyrone and Fermanagh in the Nationalist share of Ireland. If Lord Northcliffe gives battle the decision will be delayed for a period valuable to the British Commission in America. It will certainly be delayed until the Balfour Mission returns home.

In spite of the Northcliffe attack, through Carson, on the competency of the present régime, in spite of Neville Chamberlain's maladroit drafting of labor, in spite of attempts now proceeding to nullify the disestablishment of the Church in Wales, in spite of the political chicanery involved in the abolition of free trade now, and in spite of the vexatious military control of civil life, the people of England, desiring only to end the war soon and victoriously, cannot at this time revert to Liberal government, which they have been taught to condemn as inefficient, because of such a purely adventitious issue as Home Rule.

Mr. Asquith has already recoiled visibly when threatened by Mr. Bonar Law with a general election. Mr. Lloyd George having failed in his project to create a personal machine under the direction of Lord Rosebery's son, has much to lose and little to gain by having his position defined and emphasized by the electorate. Lord Northcliffe's stakes, and his power to defend them, he alone knows. By an election Mr. Redmond's forces in Parliament would be inevitably and greatly reduced. The seats gained from him by the Irish Republicans would be filled by members pledged to absent themselves from the English House of Commons. There might be bloodshed at the Irish elections which would or would not be satisfactory to the enemies of Ireland. Messrs. Myles-Hogge, Ponsonby, Pringle, Whitehouse, Trevelyan and other critical British Radicals would lose parliamentary immunity and would be heard only by censors or by turnkeys. A parliament chiefly composed of Major Newmans would be triumphantly elected. Then the Home Rule act could be repealed either immediately, or less urgently through the creation of a more divided Ireland. The trade war after the war would be assured. The process of Ireland rising, instead of federating the colonies under the ægis of a British Empire, could proceed smoothly. The League to Enforce Peace would, as Sir John Pollick recommends (Atlantic Monthly, May, 1917) become a League to Enforce Peace against Germany. In fact, all that Mr. Balfour and his Cecil relatives piously and sincerely believe to be essential to the future of the English race, would be in a fair way to come to pass. And all in the course of an election on Home Rule for Ireland. Yet Mr. Balfour blandly assured the Irish-American deputation that the Irish must compose their difficulties and that the Government, which he constitutes, is ready to agree to anything acceptable to the Irish people. The truth is the majority of the Irish are anxious for a reasonable solution. But the dominant English issues in the government of Ireland are neither Irish welfare nor American nor any other sentiment but class-rule versus democracy in England, and Lord Northcliffe's challenge to Mr. Balfour as the head of the house of Cecil—whose members are the hereditary trustees of the English ruling class—to joust for complete supremacy in England.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

LUTHER has often been hailed as the champion of freedom of thought. Men were "emancipated" by him from the spiritual authority of the Pope to whom Christ had committed the keys of His Kingdom and the care of His flock. But for the authority of the Sovereign Pontiff, the successor of St. Peter, Luther substituted his own authority which brooked no rivalry or contradiction. "We believed," wrote the Protestant theologian Braun in the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung for March 30, 1913, "that we owed to him the spirit of toleration and liberty of conscience. Yet there is not a shadow of truth to this." Discerning Protestant critics admit it was never Luther's wish that there should be religious toleration for anyone except himself. "In speaking of Luther," says the Protestant historian Walter Köhler, "there can be absolutely no question of liberty of conscience or freedom of religion." ("Reformation und Ketzerprocess.")

It is true that at times Luther apparently preached a doctrine of toleration, as when he said that neither Pope, nor angel nor man is to rob the Faithful of their liberty; but that liberty, as will be made clear, was to consist in forced conformity with every article of his creed, even the least. In the beginning of his career the Reformer demanded full freedom for the preaching of his doctrine which stood in such startling opposition to the Faith of fifteen centuries of Christianity. "As for combating heretics," he declared, "let the Bishops see to that. It is their function, not the office of princes; for heretics can never be combated by force. . . . Here the Word of God must do battle." (M. Luther's "Sämtliche Werke." Erlangen Edition, Vol. XXII., p. 90.) Yet no one ever more studiously urged the princes to apply force when there was question of advancing his own doctrine and prohibiting every other. Therefore the words quoted, though often cited by his eulogists, are not meant to convey principle of any general religious toleration.

To establish this thesis it will be sufficient to consider the Reformer's attitude towards his fellow-Protestants. His intolerance of Catholics and their doctrines is too patent to call for proof. In his final work, "The Papacy an Institution of the Devil," the last will and testament of a hatred that verged upon insanity, he wrote: "Hang up the Pope, the Cardinals, and all the Papal rabble. Tear out their blaspheming tongues, and fix them on a gibbet, as they clap their seals to their Bulls." As for the Jews, he demanded in his work, "About the Jews and Their Lies" (Edition 1543), that their synagogues be burned, their houses broken down and destroyed and their rabbis forbidden to teach under pain of death. "Force them to work," he exclaims, "and treat them with every kind of severity, as Moses did in the desert and slew 3,000." Further illustrations would be superfluous.

In vain did his fellow-sectaries, to whom he had given the example of separation from the Mother Church, claim for themselves the privilege of private interpretation of the Scriptures. They might indeed have it, he said imperiously, but they must in that case agree with him on every point of his new doctrine, for "On the foundation of the Holy Scriptures I have overwhelmed and overcome all my opponents." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. LVIII., p. 6.) To disagree with him was dishonesty which deserved punishment. Writing to the Elector, John of Saxony, February 9, 1526, Luther urged him, in the name of law and order, to permit no other doctrine besides his own: "In one place there should be one kind of sermon only."

Luther's proposed methods of dealing with those who ventured in any way to differ from him in religious belief is fully set forth in his explanation of Psalm 82. He distinguishes two classes of heretics. The first embraces all those who without authoritative commission from the Lutheran princes thrust themselves into the office of preaching. Such men he regarded not merely as a source of spiritual danger but as a possible cause of public disorder in a town where no Scripture interpretation except that of Luther was to be permitted by the public authorities. Any citizen who hears such a one is under obligation, by his oath as a citizen, Luther says, to denounce him to the city officials. "If he does not desist, the authorities will commend such a fellow to the proper master, the Master Executioner." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XXXIX., pp. 250-254.) The popular name given to the latter was "Meister Hans." Luther's frequent allusions to him are to be taken seriously, for they were acted upon by the local princes and brought many a poor fellow to the block or to the stake. In the year 1527 alone twelve men and one woman were executed by the Elector John, Luther's special favorite at this time. (Grisar, Vol. III., p. 735.)

It is true that in the case of the Anabaptists there had been considerable disorder. Yet perfectly peaceful citizens were executed for their religious beliefs only. "It is characteristic of the want of information concerning the real happenings of the epoch," writes the Protestant historian of the Reformation, L. Keller, "that very many even at the present day proceed on the supposition that the executions and persecutions of the Anabaptists took place merely because of public disturbances, and that the Reformers had no part in them." (Grisar, Vol. III., p. 747.) Of these same executions, which form but one phase of Luther's "mania for persecution," as a Protestant historian calls it, P. Wappler, likewise a Protestant author says:

> The numerous executions of such Anabaptists too who, according to evidence, were no disturbers of the peace, yet who were killed in precise conformity with the directive explanations of the Wittenberg theologians, give too plain a testimony against all attempts of writers who would still deny the clear fact that Luther approved of the death penalty inflicted for the exclusive reason of heresy. ("Die Stellung Kursachsens, etc.," p. 125.)

The second class of heretics, according to Luther's category, includes those who are entirely peaceful but presume "to preach publicly against an article of faith." They do not fare at his hands much better than the first class, and in practice, as we have seen, were often made to suffer the death-penalty. "These too are not to be suffered," Luther says of them, "but are to be punished as public blasphemers." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XXXIX., pp. 250-254.)

Luther did not give vent to his "mania for persecution" all at once. As late as 1528 he had not advocated the death-penalty for Anabaptists, but was content with approving the edict which interdicted their writings and those of other heretics. In 1530, however, he wrote the plain words quoted above in which Anabaptists and all other heretics were, under the given circumstances, commended to the tender mercies of the Master Executioner. In one word, as the Protestant historian, H. Barge, admits in his work, "Andreas Bodenstein," Luther's method of preserving the purity of his doctrine was "to mobilize the police." His last argument was the hangman.

In defending his actions Luther constantly writes that he does not in reality force men to believe against their consciences, but that he merely makes them conform outwardly, by forcing them to attend Lutheran instructions, build Lutheran schools and churches, and support the men who preach his doctrine. It is difficult to see how any further compulsion could possibly be exercised. "They must be forced to hear the sermons, whether or not they believe the Gospel," he wrote to Pastor Thomas Löscher regarding those who opposed his new doctrines. "If they would live among the people they should learn the law of the same people, even though unwilling." ("Briefwechsel," Vol. VII., p. 151.) The law in question was the religious creed laid down according to Luther's interpretation of the Scripture. "For the sake of the Ten Commandments," he wrote to Joseph Levin Metzsch, "let the people be driven to the sermon that they may at least learn the external works of obedience." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. LIV., p. 67.)

In the case of preachers who differed from him Luther insisted that there was no need of any nice hearing of testimony. Local authorities, in punishing them, might dispense with it entirely. Least of all was there to be any discussion with such men, he told the Landgrave Philip of Hesse. But the climax was reached when Luther signed Melanchthon's document. It is a defense of the death-penalty not only for the "blasphemers" who maintained that "men could become holy without sermons or church service," but also for their adherents and deceivers who persist in saying that "Our Baptism and sermon are not Christian, and our Church is not the Church of Christ." This magna charta of religious intolerance, directed mainly against the Anabaptists, was signed by Luther with the words: "It pleases me, M. Luther." (Grisar, Vol. III., p. 732.)

By Luther's principles, wrote the Protestant Church historian, Neander, "All oppressive domination of a State religion, and all tyranny over the conscience of men could be sanctioned. His views were the same as those on which the Roman Emperors had acted in persecuting the Christians." ("Das Eine und Manigfaltige des Christlichen Lebens," p. 224.)

It is claimed that the Reformer moderated his mania for religious persecution during his last days, but the evidence is far from convincing. A sermon preached at Eisleben, February 7, 1546, is quoted in this connection. It is an explanation of the parable of the cockle, and Luther points the obvious moral that "with human force and power we cannot extirpate (heretics) nor change them." Without any reference to the duties of princes he tells his ordinary hearers that they are to see to it that heretics are not permitted to rule among them, to enter the pulpit or approach the altar. Luther's principles always turned upon expediency, and the key to this modification of his extreme intolerance may be found in his cautious remark that an attempt to extirpate the cockle by force might make it worse. There were not a few "unbelievers" in Eisleben who had probably to be reckoned with.

Little of the spirit of even this modified and questionable toleration is shown, as Grisar points out, in the sermon immediately preceding and the one immediately following it, the last of Luther's life. In the former he demands of the citizens of Halle that the "scabby, shabby, lousy monks," who still remained there, be thrown out of their town. In the latter he insists that the Jews "be not suffered nor tolerated." They are all to be instantly banished. It cannot be doubted that he could still have expressed himself as no less sincerely "delighted" at the murder of heretics as when, on receiving the premature announcement of the execution for heresy of John Campanus, he wrote to Justus Jonas, August 3, 1530, "Laetus audivi:" "I was delighted to hear of it." ("Briefwechsel," Vol. VIII., p. 163.)

Have non-Lutherans who are now lauding Luther as the apostle of freedom of thought ever considered what would have become of them had they expressed their religious convictions in Luther's favorite Saxony or in any State where he held sway? Had they dared to disagree with the Reformer, in all probability they would have been clapped into prison and possibly executed without much ceremony. And even if a more lenient course were followed, they certainly would have been silenced at once. If they disobeyed the order, however, and continued to preach their doctrine, there is little doubt that they would have been banished with threats of dire happenings should they ever presume to return. Lastly, did they persist in their obstinacy, they would have been commended to Meister Hans, the executioner. "Those who come without official position or commission," Luther wrote, "are not good enough to be called false prophets, but tramps and rogues, who should be handed over to Meister Hans." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XLIII., p. 313.) What would have become of Luther if Catholic princes had acted upon this principle in his regard? At least one apostle of brutal coercion would have been silenced effectively.

A Day on a Man-of-War

ROBERT CONROY.

REVEILLE sounded at 4:00 a.m. With sighs and yawns from their late occupants, hammocks were lashed up and stowed away, folding tables and benches were taken down, plates and other mess gear hastily set out, the food hurriedly fetched from the galley by the mess men, and in exactly half an hour after rising the sailors sat themselves down to an early breakfast. The main or upper deck, owing to the efforts of the previous day, looked very little like the trim deck of a man-of-war; stanchions and life-line had disappeared; bags, shovels, and coaling trucks were strewn around; and the winches or "niggerheads" were rotating merrily in response to the working of the coal engine down below. Coaling booms were swinging at different points along the ship's side, and, to the initiated, the whole atmosphere was permeated with the feeling of battles to be fought, and work to be done.

At 5:00 a.m. the bugles sounded "Commence firing," the boatswain's mates passed the word, "All hands coal ship," and each man took his station, some going to shoveling in the lighter, others holding trucks in readiness to carry the full bags to the open bunkers. Scarcely had the work commenced when the band stationed itself a few steps aft of the coaling operations and struck up a lively air, which brought such rhythm into the movements of all hands that each man seemed to be performing his task by note. Slowly at first but with increasing rapidity the coal came aboard. During the first hour 195 tons were deposited in the bunkers and the second showed an increase of twenty-seven tons, making a total of 417. The third hour's total made the captain smile, for the sister ship of the vessel he commanded was also coaling on the other side of the same dock, and he was eager "to hang up" a record for her crew to aim at. From 8:00 o'clock to 9:00 the enthusiasm became so great that the figures showed a high mark of 398 tons for the hour. Meanwhile down in the bunkers the engineers' force was leveling off the coal as it descended, making sure that every possible square foot of stowing-space was utilized. Light and air being scant in the bowels of the ship, short spells are necessary for the maintenance of the ship's high standard of efficiency, and after each relief the firemen and coal-passers come on deck to enjoy a brief rest in the open air.

From 9:00 to 10:00 the work continued without cessation but there was a slight slackening up on the part of the working men and the high mark of the preceding hour was not duplicated. When men have worked their hardest in the cool of the morning they are expected to slow down when the sun is high in the heavens; therefore it was with relief that all hands heard "Cease firing" sounded and dropped their work to partake of a lunch of sandwiches and coffee. The rest was a brief one; barely fifteen minutes elapsed before work was resumed with renewed vigor. The men attacked the coal as if it were a living enemy to be torn apart and vanquished. The coal engine hummed merrily and the human dumping-bags took their stations.

Let us look around now and see whom we have with us. That tall, sprightly young fellow, red-haired, freckled and entirely unromantic looking, holds the Congressional Gold Medal of Honor. Here's the story: During the early part of 1909 some of the oil works at Coquimbo, Chile, took fire, and for a time threatened to defy all efforts to extinguish it. Adjoining the works was a hotel with a large water-tank on the roof, and should the fire win its way past that a miracle alone could save the town from destruction. A report having spread that the tank really contained oil it was impossible to induce any of the natives to go near it, and so, when the fire reached the hotel the officials were in despair. At this point a party of American blue-jackets, of whom our friend was one, came on the scene and taking in the situation at a glance, he climbed to the roof, and with an axe demolished the covering of the tank, and with the water it contained succeeded in keeping the fire from going further. Should you try to get him to tell you some of the details of his adventure, he will smile quietly and remain silent.

That other man nearby is a hero of the Merrimac and one of the most popular officers in the service. With him is an executive officer who is equally popular and beloved by the crew. And see the medium-sized man in dungarees—be sure to look up that word!—with leather gloves reaching almost to his elbows and the insignia on his hat showing him to be a commissioned officer. Notice the kindly smile, the deep blue eyes and the fearless glance. How cheerfully he wields a shovel or pulls a truck side-by-side with some ordinary seaman, and how skilfully he can soothe the momentary grievances of the boys around him. His presence here is the most effective argument possible against all socialistic theories regarding the antagonism of the classes and the masses, for he is the Catholic chaplain.

To every complement of 1,250 men one chaplain was assigned by law. When I was in the navy, six of the chaplains were priests, and the good they do is inestimable. They are commissioned officers, yet they are in close touch with the men, sharing their interests, guiding them in times of trouble, and mixing with the "jackies" as no other officers could do, and that, because of their priesthood, which always secures them the respect of every class, and the reverence and love of the Catholic sailor. The men of the old navy never weary of speaking of the awful night in Havana harbor when the Maine blew up, and the noble part played by the chaplain of the ship, Mgr. Chidwick.

The work has meanwhile been going on ceaselessly and mercilessly. The blue-jackets are attacking the coal with all the grim determination of a conquering army of invasion. As though incited by the deadliest rancor and hatred, they have trod on it, annihilated its center and wiped out completely its outposts and pickets; nothing, however, will satisfy them except the complete extermination of the enemy. And the foe, dusky and strong, has not been idle; in suffocating dust-clouds, he has sent forth his minions to harass the eyes, nostrils, throats, and lungs of the invader, and in tiny morsels he has sought out every vulnerable spot. From 10:15 to 11:00 o'clock the blue-jackets added nearly 300 tons to their store. Perspiration streamed from their brows and combined with the dust to torture their already inflamed eyeballs; but they clung to their tasks like the old man of the sea. About 11:00 o'clock it might be noticed that short snatches of conversation became general; something of interest was evidently being whispered. Yes, it was true no doubt, for the boatswain's mate heard the commander tell the ship's writer. Of course it was not wholly unexpected, but its confirmation was nevertheless pleasant enough to draw a cheer from the men. It was reported that the liberty party would "shove off" as soon as the ship was cleaned up.

As the figures for the hour were placed in view on the turret showing that their total tonnage taken aboard nearly doubled that of their sister ship, a mighty cheer, such as is known only to sailors, arose from the lighters and the main deck of the vessel. Then with new energy, faster and faster flew the shovels. Seven bells (11:30) sounded and still no cessation. At 11:45 the bugles sounded "Mess gear" but the men never paused in their labors; five minutes to twelve and still the fuel poured raspingly into the bunkers; two minutes more of herioc battling, then eight bells clanged, the bugler sounded "Cease firing"; the men in the lighters started to come out and the boatswains piped to dinner. The officers and the men who were tallying, gathered around and the amount taken on was quickly figured. From eleven to twelve they had taken aboard 405 tons, making a total of 2,140 tons in less than seven hours. As the yeoman chalked the figures on the turret the loudest and mightiest cheer of the morning rang through the navy yard and the captain's face wore its gentlest smile as he said: "Commander, let them cheer all they want to, but let nothing be said to hurt the feelings of those across the way."

When, a few hours later, the ship had been cleaned, the gear all stowed away and the liberty party mustered on the dock, even a close observer would have difficulty in believing that these men had spent the morning coaling ship. Laughing, joking and casting a look of pity at the men of their sister ship who were still coaling, they showed none of the weariness of toil. They bent their steps townward with the gaiety of schoolboys, as though they had no care in the world. Such are the men of our navy, men eager to die for the country in this critical hour.

Seventy-five Years of Notre Dame

CHARLES L. O'DONNELL, C.S.C.

THE University of Notre Dame was founded in 1842 by Father Edward Sorin, of the Congregation of the Holy Cross, with whom were associated six Brothers of the same Institute. Notre Dame is accordingly keeping this year its seventy-fifth anniversary. Looking back over that three-quarters of a century, the historian has it brought home to him how much the life of a university is an inner life, how essentially the work of education is a dealing in mind and spirit.

A university is, of course, an objective fact, and of its growth and development there are ready external measures. For example, on the campus at Notre Dame, side by side stand the oldest college building and the newest. The one, a little, plain, square, brick structure, was for some years all of Notre Dame there was. The other, its new neighbor, itself only one of some thirty college buildings which go to make make up the Notre Dame of today, is the university library, built of stone, by a famous architect, at the cost of a quarter of a million dollars, stored with a priceless collection of books, works of art and antiquities. The original "main building" would be lost in a corner of the basement of the new library. Thus, the concrete fact of growth and development forces itself on the least observant, but even the most observant will fail to gather in this way what manner of school this is, and miss the real meaning of its development.

The same is true for those events which make the substance of historical record. They are few, and, though significant, they are not the history, they are not the life of Notre Dame. That the University in its religious founders came from France, crossing the ocean in the steerage; that it was established at a spot sanctified by memories of the early missionaries, for the Jesuit Fathers Marquette and Dablon and Allouez, the Recollect friars Hennepin, Rebourde and Membre, the secular priests Badin, De Seille and Petit, passed and repassed and rested here, and worked from this as a missionary center among the Pottawatomies and the Miamis; that the school thus founded grew up in poverty and opposition, and once the cholera almost swept it into the grave; that in the thirty-eighth year of its establishment fire burnt it to the ground: these facts, outstanding and arresting as they are, potent as they were in shaping destiny, still leave the very life and genius of the place quite unrevealed.

Nor do the natural surroundings explain much, albeit many years ago a local poet wrote: "This might be Athens, here might Athens be." A wealth of woods, with two small lakes, many acres of playing fields and hundreds of acres of tilled soil, a splendid river rushing up, for we are just at the water-shed of the continent, to the neighboring Lake Michigan; these, while they count for the creation of atmosphere, while they form a distinctive background, are not themselves the Notre Dame scene. What that essence is, may be difficult to define. But certain it is, the place has that character which is vainly described as a "spell," a spirit of place which even the most casual visitors seldom fail to note. Perhaps we approximate explanation when we say that Notre Dame appears a personality with a life all its own; that this is of course a school-life, and hence the fewness of spectacular events. It is a life of mind and spirit, which has passed within these walls and upon these fields. This place, itself a great activity, is yet chiefly but the nursery of activities to be elsewhere exhibited. Moreover, while collectively it has been a fairly long life and one of multiple organization, it has been a life individuated by school years. Sufficient to this life are the students of its one year. It is a life annually renewed yet characteristically the same, and it is perennially young.

Now, of course, much of this is true of all colleges. But there are differentiations. Always a boarding-school, Notre Dame has had the home ties of hearth and family table. Also, keeping as it has done, under broadest university development, the old French foundation of grammar school (minim department) and high school (preparatory department), it has had the further family likeness of rearing children young and old. An interesting solidarity, sometimes amusing, results. This family character in the school as a whole, appears as democracy in the college. Divisions here there must be, but they are created rather by the accident of hall residence than by differences in departments, courses, talents, age, wealth, social position or athletic prestige, no negligible factor in determining standing in some schools. At Notre Dame, the freshman and the senior, the varsity athlete and the varsity debater, for sometimes he is one and the same person, the lawyer and the "premedic," the engineer and the student for the priesthood, the architect and the economist, the son of wealthy parents and the boy who is working his way, meet and mingle on even planes. A college commonalty results whose sufficient bond is studentship at Notre Dame.

Another feature of this association remains to be correlated. It is the comparative intimacy which exists between faculty and students, the family ideal again. The thing is full of peril to dignity and discipline except it overcome these difficulties. And it simply does. Priests and Brothers and lay professors live and move among the students in a tacit understanding of respective positions which, far from impeding, seems rather to promote agreeable association. This is of further value when it is understood that Notre Dame has always been rather a school for the Catholic young who are to be the Catholic laity. The oldest and most honored and, no doubt, most arduous course in the curriculum is that leading to the degree of Bachelor of Arts, the course commonly followed by students for the priesthood. From high school to graduation it requires eight years, and Notre Dame's tuition is rated as high. For obvious reasons, few of the diocesan clergy are educated here. So that the general body of the students are men trained for the secular professions, for life in the world, though among even these, apart from the classical students, vocations to the priesthood are becoming increasingly common. Their training here aims to fit them for their proper place in Catholic parochial life, and not the least valuable element in that equipment, the result of four years' rather intimate acquaintance with their superiors, is the ability to maintain such human intimacy and at the same time cherish the highest respect for spiritual authority. There is a seminary here, its membership made up of candidates for the Congregation of the Holy Cross. There the atmosphere is quite different from that of the college, though the general frequency of Holy Communion has removed, one likes to believe, all radical differences. For the college boys, especially at certain seasons of the year, go to Holy Communion, altogether voluntarily, six or seven hundred strong every day. Non-Catholics are admitted to Notre Dame, the proportion being, in the college, about one to twenty. Conversions are not uncommon.

On the academic side, a marked characteristic of the school is its literary tradition. A college journal has been published weekly for fifty years. An early professor was a friend of Lowell's, another an intimate of Longfellow's, while their first professorship in literature was that which Charles Warren Stoddard and Maurice Francis Egan enjoyed at Notre Dame. A collection of poetry from the college magazine has just been published, the only book of its kind, so far as is known, to emanate from a Catholic college in this country. It makes an excellent Jubilee volume.

Finally, in this day of war it is fitting to record the soldierly tradition of Notre Dame. Two of the most famous chaplains of the Civil War were Notre Dame men, Father Corby and Father Cooney, and there were others. There was at least one student company in the army of the North. There is at the University a Grand Army Post composed exclusively of priests and Brothers and professors who took part in that conflict, a unique roll-call. A Notre Dame student was a member of the crew of the Maine. Military drill conducted by army officers has been for some years compulsory on all students under junior college standing, and now these latter, with the seniors, have voluntarily formed into companies which several of the lay professors have also joined. Daily there are departures due to enlistment, or the examinations appertaining thereto. It is expected, however, that the Diamond Jubilee exercises will be held as planned, early in June. The program involves a worthy commemoration of an anniversary rich in local significance and one not without meaning in the life of the Church, and particularly in the history of Catholic education, in America.

"Sursum Corda"

BLANCHE M. KELLY.

THE "green lady," spring, is abroad, and the thrill which stirs the earth at the touch of her magic foot makes itself felt even through granite pavements, so that the winter-weary, house-bound hearts of city-dwellers expand and thrill responsively, remembering that there are places where at this season the eye may view unobstructed all the stages of the hexaemeron. Things must be done seasonably, however, and to most dwellers in cities it is far too early to migrate to the country. Their well-ordered minds are repelled by the spectacle of a world in the making, nor are they attracted by "the silence of unlabored fields." Moreover, our geography appears to be undergoing a transformation. The country is fast disappearing, and the dry land will soon consist wholly of cities and summer resorts. Now the modern apartment house and the modern summer hotel were assuredly designed by the architect of the Tower of Babel, and some demon kinsman of his contrived the talking-machine and the automobile, the one adding to the hideousness of the city, the other destroying the seclusion of brown, beckoning roads and robbing the fields of their primal possession, solitude.

Even such an eminently gregarious animal as Horace Walpole realized that it is possible to have a plethora of society, the realization impelling him to cry out: "I have people in my pockets!" But how far removed is this and the older Horace's hatred of the "profanum vulgus" from St. Bernard's "O beata solitudo!" This contemplative's love for what he regarded as the sole beatitude was shared by that contemplative manqué Henry David Thoreau, and if the Yankee does not always express himself so rapturously we know that he endeavored to carry out his views with equal literalness. "I had three chairs in my house," said he, "one for solitude, two for friendship, three for society." And again: "Sell your clothes and keep your thoughts. God will see that you do not want society." This was strong language, even to his own generation. To a generation which regards society as the formal cause of clothes and clothes as the formal cause of existence it is very like the language of a madman.

For the attainment of solitude, however, it is not enough, indeed, it is not even necessary to live in a hut in the woods, although Thoreau in his groping undoubtedly hit upon an excellent method. But that there is an essential, one of the old masters of asceticism points out in a passage quoted by Montalembert: "Neither the profoundest forests nor the highest mountains can give happiness to a man if he has not in himself the solitude of soul, the sabbatum cordis, the ascensiones in corde." And these Thoreau had. He was a natural solitary; to use a phrase borrowed from a pagan source by Mrs. Concannon and applied to St. Columban, he was "a listener in the woods." Indeed, he said of himself that his "profession" was "to be always on the alert to find God in nature."

Now this was the distinguishing characteristic of such listeners as long ago as when David walked alone on the lonely hills and watched the heavens show forth the glory of God,—"the work of cæli enarrant," as Ruskin calls it, obviously regarding this as a distinct office of nature. Every man carries about with him his own Thebaid, his own Walden. It is possible to live among men and retain the sabbatum cordis, to be alone in crowds, to feel the cramped streets a prison both to body and spirit. But it is impossible, given a thoughtful mind, to live close to nature, to know the sabbath of the woods and fields, to learn the ways of bird and beast, to watch the unfolding of bud and leaf and the recurrent miracle of ripening grain, without coming to a fuller knowledge of the supernatural, to a clearer perception of the peace surpassing understanding, to a more reverent comprehension of the stupendousness of creation, to a deeper realization of the unwearying vigilance of the Providence of God.

Richard Jefferies, pantheist as he was, found strange words for this: "From earth and sea and sky, from night, the stars, from day, the trees, the hills, from my own soul—from these I think. I stand this moment . . . face to face with nature, face to face with the supernatural, with myself. My naked mind confronts the unknown. I see as clearly as the noonday that this is not all. I see other and higher conditions of existence." Here all lights fail him, or, rather, he himself draws a veil across the noonday brightness. He will not acknowledge the Personality behind this clearly perceived "supernatural" world. He will not utter the word God as the name of the "inexpressible entity" of which he recognizes the existence, but calls it "something infinitely higher than deity," which, to say the least, is erring by excess of faith.

"Weep not, little voice," says Thel, in Blake's poem, addressing the worm. The robin in the grass tilts a harkening ear to a din of these "little voices" from which our grosser ears are held, and the ears of listeners in the woods are attuned to a shout that resounds unceasingly through creation: Lift up your hearts to the Lord. The Psalms abound with instances of this exaltation of the heart. "Wonderful are the surges of the sea!" exclaims the Psalmist, and immediately as by a natural sequence, "Wonderful is the Lord on high!" David's songs are murmurous with the streams where he watered his flocks, they are fragrant with the scent of vineyards and green pastures, they are radiant with the light of the stars on which he gazed as he kept the night watches, but it was the voice of God that he heard in the waters and His tabernacle that he beheld in the sun. To Coleridge every peak of the majestic Alps "thundered forth God," and the whole world listened to what the silence of the woods and rills whispered to the boy of Winander. John Oxenham exclaims:

> We thank Thee, Lord,
> For all Thy ministries,—
> For morning mist and gently falling dew;
> For summer rains, for winter ice and snow;
> For the reft clouds that show the tender blue;
> For the forked flash and long tumultuous roll;
> For mighty rains that wash the dim earth clean.

This is a descant on that wondrous land of "little Brother Francis," his swan song, in which he gives praise not only for his "worshipful brother sun," but for "brother wind," and for "every kind of weather."

This page from the writings of the modern mystic known to us as "Lucie Christine," reads like the search of Job brought to fruition:

> I sought Thee at the hands of all Thy creatures and they all replied: Behold, He is here. . . . I met Thee in the impenetrable gloom of forests, I saw Thee pass in the lightning flash, I heard Thee in the distant voice of the wind, in the reverberation of the thunder and in the raging of the tempest. I have greeted Thee in the early dawn and in the evening twilight; I have surprised Thee in the freshness of the valleys, I have listened to Thee in the gentle murmurs of solitary springs.

This is not an apology for the anchoretic life, which is so largely a matter of Divine election and has God for its apologist. It is an attempt, however, to show how much more lovely things silence utters than the tongues of men, on the witness of those who have sought out her haunts and penetrated her fastnesses. A man need not have been born under a gypsy star nor with the mark of the swallow in his palm to have a right appreciation of the delights of a lodging at the inn of la belle étoile, for the vague unrest which spring stirs in the hearts of men is the half remembrance of a forgotten language, the language of the open sky, the mother tongue of mankind. The exigencies of modern life have stifled it, as a conquering nation, in its efforts to denationalize a people, penalizes the vulgar speech, which none the less lives on. In the course of time it ceases to be the currency of daily life and, being relegated to books, it presently becomes classic and is understood only of scholars and such as for love are willing to pay a price for this lore. So it happens in this instance that chiefly poets and mystics are masters of what should be the universal speech.

And yet the very tumultuous urgencies of life in a large city, the "people in our pockets," the teased nerves, the challenged senses, require that we be not wholly without refuge in a foreign country, require that we should have, in the unpublished words of one from whom it is a privilege to quote, "Some halls of space and avenues of leisure in the soul, some stately distances of manners and high porticoes of silence, some long reverent approaches to the interior mansion where God and His angels condescend to walk."

We Americans are conceded to be a facetious people. It is perhaps to our credit that we can turn such a jaunty countenance to the present hour, that more than half jestingly, with something of a Gallic shrug, the entire nation faces the realization: Il faut cultiver son jardin. Perhaps we shall learn more than how to raise potatoes and cabbages. Perhaps the ages-old "work of cœli enarrant" will be accomplished again; perhaps the dead will become a living language; perhaps the hearts of a whole people will be lifted up to the Lord. And who shall say it is to no purpose if even one of those who listen discern beyond this a silence which has no voice, a silence such as in the vision vouchsafed to St. John reigned in heaven for the space of half an hour, a silence such as was divined by St. Augustine and St. Monica as they looked out across the Tiber that evening at Ostia: "And we said to one another: if any soul were to be still, and in perfect silence from all tumult and noise of the flesh, and from all images and impressions of the earth, water or air; if the heavens also were silent to her and the soul were silent to herself and should pass beyond herself by having no thought of herself . . . and so He should speak alone, not by the tongue of flesh, nor by the voice of an angel, nor by the sound of a cloud, nor by the obscurity of a similitude . . . whether this would not be what was written, enter into the joy of thy Lord."

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On the question of Catholic young men and Catholic young women "getting acquainted," which most of us discuss quite often, the following incident perhaps is worth noting.

The Brooklyn Alumni Sodality will hold its annual "social meeting" in a few days. The meeting will take the form of a smoker. Not even Julianne is far enough advanced, I think, to attend a smoker. Hence the social meeting will be a "stag" affair, as these social meetings of this particular alumni sodality have always been.

The point to which I would call attention is this: When the affair was broached at a recent meeting, one intrepid member arose, not a Jesuit college graduate, and suggested that this year, in his opinion, the ladies should be invited. He was greeted with that sort of laughter which carries with it an invitation to "sit down, you're out of order." He sat down, but not before he had said: "I wonder if it is true, as I have often heard, that the Jesuits do not encourage their students to pick out good Catholic girls among their acquaintances and marry them. I thought you men might like an opportunity to bring your wives and sweethearts here to meet your fellow-sodalists. Probably I was wrong." Was our friend correctly informed?

The only reference to the fair sex that I can remember from my college days was made at one of our retreats, when the priest conducting the exercises bade us: "Beware of the fair-haired dames whom you meet in your sophomore year." The idea was that if you had a vocation, the said "fair-haired dames" might—well, there apparently was no telling what they might do; but, in any case, we were warned to beware!

The Tariff and Religious Interests

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The pending flat tariff impost of 10 per cent at first sight may not be of very general interest to your readers, although experience shows that in nearly all cases the consumer pays the tax. As a newspaper or magazine proprietor, you may, like others, be affected in your general circulation by reason of the postal rates provided in Section 1201, though certain exceptions and conditions are permitted and restricted to "religious, educational" and other organizations. However, the main reason I have for addressing you is to call the attention of your subscribers who may be interested, to the provisions of Section 1000, which, briefly expressed, adds "10 per cent to the value of all articles imported not now dutiable by law." Unless this section is amended, all church regalia, works of art, books, philosophical instruments and all articles heretofore free, used by churches, societies, schools, colleges, etc., will be subject to this increased tax of 10 per cent.

This is a matter that should be of interest to bishops and pastors, colleges, libraries, and such societies and organizations as may be affected. While it is stated that this is a war measure and will be in force only during the time of war, and while the amount collected may be only negligible, it is an unwise plan to allow such legislation to pass without a protest, especially as it discriminates against religious interests which now, more than ever, should be more liberally treated..

As the sponsor of this bill has today declared it will become a law by the end of this week, it is quite evident that prompt individual action should be taken at once and such notification addressed to the Senate Finance Committee.

Irish Preparedness in the Revolution

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In my article on "Irish Preparedness in the Revolution" in a recent issue of AMERICA, while mentioning the prominent Irishmen of that period, through an oversight I neglected to mention brave John Barry of Philadelphia, the first senior captain of the reorganized American navy, the first man appointed by President George Washington in 1794 when the navy was rehabilitated. Barry's deeds on the sea from the period when he was given command of the first American "man-o'-war," the Lexington, 1775, until his forced retirement on account of wounds received when coming back from France in 1781, have been an inspiration for many of the stirring achievements of other Irish seamen who have given their services to the country from that time until the present.

John Barry was born in Wexford, Ireland, in 1745. He emigrated to America in 1760 and settled in Philadelphia, where he acquired wealth as master of a merchant vessel. He was appointed by Congress to the command of the brig, the Lexington, the first armed vessel to be used in the service of the colonies, on October 14, 1775. The next year with this vessel he captured the British tender, the Edward, the first ship taken by a commanding officer of the United States navy. In 1777 he captured a British war vessel in the Delaware river. In 1778 he was given command of the Raleigh, which soon after was captured by a British man-of-war. In 1781, while returning from France, he captured two vessels, but was severely wounded, and hence was eventually forced into retirement for a period. He was first senior officer of the navy, with the rank of commodore, from the reorganization of the navy by Washington, July 4, 1794. He was a Catholic and was twice married, on each occasion to a Protestant. Both of these ladies became converts. He died in Philadelphia September 13, 1803, and his remains are interred in St. Mary's churchyard. As a token of his countrymen's appreciation of his services, a bronze lifelike statue of him was erected in Independence Square, Philadelphia, by the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, March 16, 1907. The year previous Congress had appropriated $50,000 for the erection of a memorial to him in Washington.

Ireland's Problem

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With most of what Judge Cohalan says concerning Ireland I cordially agree. It has always seemed to me a great pity that Americans of Irish birth or Irish ancestry should differ so acutely and so bitterly upon the details of a matter regarding the fundamentals of which all are in agreement. We all vehemently desire that Ireland should have that full measure of self-government which befits a people possessing every other distinctive mark of true nationality. No one of us will be contented until the people of Ireland are contented in this respect. Why can we not unite upon that platform—leaving it to the Irish people themselves to determine what will and what will not content them? After all, they should best know what they want.

Mr. Birrell and Ireland

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A just encomium is tendered Mr. Augustine Birrell by Father Michael Maher, S.J., in the current number of the Catholic World; and this passage of merited praise should be noted by those who were tempted to view Mr. Birrell in the light of English censure at the time of the Easter uprising. He is not the timid and inefficient fonctionnaire that the criticism of a year ago described him to be. Take for proof the history of Catholic university education in Ireland during its recent years, escaping from the palpable injustice which surrounded it, and growing to its present attainment and its prospect of greater achievements. Father Maher records that history; and in a final paragraph, after noting that Mr. Gladstone at the zenith of his power had wrecked the Government in a futile effort to solve the problem, and that Mr. Balfour, with hopes to remove the injustice, shrank timidly from any practical endeavors to better the situation, he says:

> It was Mr. Birrell, to whose alleged timidity and weakness of government the catastrophe of last Easter week was ascribed by his opponents, who had the courage to face the opposition not only of the Orange faction, but of his own Non-Conformist supporters, and the energy and skill successfully to carry through this valuable instalment of justice to Ireland.

Anent this worthy praise, I quote a memorable excerpt from a speech by Mr. Birrell, made in December, 1911; for therein we learn what were his convictions about one condition of affairs in Ireland, and that, as history shows, he had the character to put his convictions into effect:

> After studying Ireland for many years, the main feeling left in my mind is how, after all the fighting and revolution and confiscation and menace, after all the penal laws and famine and coercion acts, after the destruction of native industries and the yearly drain on the population by emigration, there are still in Ireland 4,500,000 people, and that the majority of them still adhere to their old religion. Such tenacity of faith is, I believe, almost unexampled in the history of the whole world. From the time of Elizabeth, almost down to the time of Victoria, to be a Catholic in Ireland was to be an outcast. Catholics were robbed of their land; they were given their choice between "Hell and Connacht"; they were ousted from portions of Ulster in favor of Scotchmen, and they were killed or banished whenever opportunity offered. But they were neither annihilated nor converted; and yet, from the time of Elizabeth downward to our own day, they enjoyed all the blessings of the Protestant Establishment. They had four Protestant archbishops, between twenty and thirty bishops, I do not know how many deans, and a parochial clergy, all supported by tithes wrung out of wretched tenants, none of whom ever entered the place of worship to which they were compelled to contribute.

Of this excerpt Father Matthew Russell said: "God bless him for saying the truth." Of his part in bettering the educational situation we say: "God bless him for doing justice."

Dissemination of Catholic Literature

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father LaFarge's recent article on the dissemination of Catholic literature in rural districts and the subsequent comment thereon in your Communications section prompts me to give a brief account of one humble attempt in that direction. Six months ago the local council of the Knights of Columbus appointed a "Propaganda Committee" to solicit Catholic periodicals from its members and friends for the purpose of remailing them to isolated Catholics in the West and South. Twenty-five names and addresses received from the International Catholic Truth Society of Brooklyn formed the nucleus of our mailing list. Among these were a number of missionaries, to whom we send suitable literature in bundles at regular intervals. If a missionary makes an appeal for papers and reviews in AMERICA or any other periodical that comes to our notice, his name is added to our list and his particular need provided for in so far as our supply allows.

We became enthusiastic over the idea of sending controversial literature to some ninety or more readers of the Menace in the State of Iowa, whose names were sent to us; but a little subsequent investigation showed us that "the Greeks were at our doors," and now local readers of anti-Catholic publications are regular recipients, at our expense, of Our Sunday Visitor or the Antidote. Through the I. C. T. S. twenty non-Catholics in Arkansas requested the Columbiad regularly, fourteen of them being in one town. Needless to say we gladly complied with their unusual request, and in addition they, too, receive Our Sunday Visitor. Our mailing list now numbers 117, including sixteen missionaries, five hospitals and an army chaplain. We have gathered up and remailed thus far over 3,000 periodicals, which in nearly every case would otherwise have been burned or sold for junk.

To minimize the expense we are now experimenting with the scheme of becoming subscription agents for Catholic publications and applying the commission received to a fund for sending apologetic papers to readers of anti-Catholic journals. The greatest obstacle to the practical working out of this idea is apathy among our own people toward the Catholic press.

The Boston Chapter of the Knights of Columbus has recently taken up the proposition of establishing a propaganda committee in every K. of C. Council in Greater Boston. Once that is accomplished, a federation of such committees might be the means of founding a permanent "Lay Apostolate" for the conservation and utilization of every scrap of Catholic literature. But that is only a hope and an ambition, and "wise men tell only of what they have done." True, we are, as yet, but scratching the surface and feeling our way along, but at least we have started, and the score of grateful letters received from priests and co-religionists in distant parts amply repays us and is an inspiration to greater efforts.

Dorchester, Mass. JOHN B. MOORE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With reference to the communication from Mr. Edward Feeney, of Brooklyn, N. Y., in your issue of May 5, dealing with the dissemination of Catholic literature, I desire to say that the Catholic Truth Society, of Canada, has systematized the work of remailing Catholic newspapers and magazines in Canada to the extent that we now have something over 400 persons remailing, and about an equal number receiving such literature. Our method is to keep in touch with missionaries and parish priests in outlying districts, who supply us with the names and addresses of persons who are likely to benefit by this form of cooperation.

Toronto, Can. J. A. MURPHY.

The Truth About Brazil

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Having worked in Brazil for years as a missionary and as a parish priest, I can substantiate the remarks made by Dr. Hazlett in a recent issue of AMERICA. He is frank, honest and sincere. There are some things, however, to which I should like to draw attention, for the people of the United States have been grossly misinformed concerning the people in Brazil.

There is as in every other part of the world commercialized vice, but in a low percentage, less than 5 per cent, and to a great extent this has been imported from Europe. The native women are remarkably pure. Never have I seen such love as that of the Brazilian mothers; they are extremely affectionate and are models of devotion to their families, and have not infrequently as many as ten or twelve children. There is some thievery, but this too is largely a foreign importation, and is severely dealt with by the courts, especially in the case of those under age. There is some illegitimacy, but it is probably not 5 per cent of the total births. The difficulty arises from the fact that there are two marriage codes, that of the Church and that of the State, each independent of the other, and each insisted on. For valid marriage before the State a civil ceremony is required, and of course for validity in the eyes of the Church there must be a Catholic ceremony. The Church permits the civil ceremony, but recommends that it follow, not precede, the Catholic ceremony. The people understand the Church's position, and go through the civil function merely as a formality.

The Brazilians are by no means total abstainers, nevertheless they do not often drink to excess. To call them drunkards is extremely unjust. Brazilians are serious and honest. They are very determined in upholding their rights, but at the same time they are very humble and reasonable when they are proved to be in the wrong. In this matter they are quite different from most peoples. Neither do they worship images. Their attitude is strictly correct. Images are a help to external devotion to which they are much attached, but they know that the worship must be paid to God, not to the image. This is undoubtedly the fact, but Protestants refuse to admit it.

It is my fixed conviction, based on years of experience, that Protestantism will never make much headway in Brazil. The people will be Catholic or nothing. Being Latins by extraction they do not take kindly to Protestantism. The Protestant ministers in Brazil do not make converts, nor are they supported, except by generous contributions from the United States.

Why Fight for America?

THE generous impulse which urges a man to give up all things for his country is good. It is the beginning of service. But it is only the beginning. An impulse, especially if evoked by the strains of martial music, often weakens when the music dies away, to be replaced by an abrupt command to dig trenches. If it is to outlast adversity, it must be reinforced by some principle which definitely identifies it with duty. This principle was admirably stated by the Archbishop of St. Paul, in his address to the recruits of that city. "Next to God is country, and next to loyalty to God is loyalty to country."

If in the immense throng which listened to the Archbishop's impassioned plea for his country, any man asked himself the question, tainted with disloyalty, "Why should I fight for America?" he found the answer in the prelate's stirring words:

> To defend America is to defend not only the nation that protects you, that nurtures you, but the nation that stands in the universe for the highest ideals, the noblest principles governing mankind. When we speak of our country, we have in mind not only our homes and the homes of our fathers, but the great and noble things for which America stands, liberty and order, and order in liberty. America rises before the nations of the earth as that great country which above all others gives democracy to mankind, which makes every man feel that it is pleasant to walk upou the earth, and which showers blessings untold upon all its people. Sacred is the duty to defend our country, to make sacrifices for it. America did not provoke war. She sought peace. But her honor was attacked, her dignity assailed, her power defied.

Catholics, although they could look for no other course, will in the years to come, remember with just pride the patriotic utterances of their priests and prelates. In the days of victory that will surely crown this struggle, undertaken "that truth and justice may prevail among the nations," their country will cherish the memory of the quick response of her Catholic citizens to the appeal of their spiritual leaders.

The Idle Tears

LAST week a schoolgirl, just thirteen years of age, died in Chicago. The coroner has decided that the child met her death as the result of "a wound inflicted by a revolver." He does not know, nor do the police, whether the girl committed suicide, "for love of a fourteen year old schoolboy," or whether she was murdered in a fit of jealousy, by a girl of twelve.

The story is grewsome, sordid. Parents now weep, and their too-late tears evoke a sympathy which we give, but feel misplaced. "She was particularly fascinated by plays in which a 'vampire woman' figured in blood and thunder adventure," comments the Chicago Tribune. "We loved the 'movies,'" testifies the child, suspected of murder. "I liked Theda Bara. I think she's wonderful." These children, boys and girls just beginning their 'teens, consorted whenever and wherever they wished. They bound themselves in a secret society which "usually met on the curbstone." Together they read cheap novels and were absorbed by vile magazines; they played on the streets at night, and frequented places of low amusement. They had their sickly discussions of "life's problems," and weighed the merits of suicide as a sure release from the embarrassing entanglements of their intrigues, these babies who should have been safely housed in the sanctuary of the home, learning the lesson that manly worth and womanly sweetness can be founded only on truth and purity. They were not slum children, but they were, apparently, homeless.

The sanctuary of the home! Is it only a memory today, an historical reminiscence, like the right of sanctuary once claimed by the fleeing outlaw? In the magazines, the newspapers, on the streets, in places of amusement, our children are surrounded as never before, by all manner of incitement to evil. Where can these hunted children turn if not to the home? And if there is no home, what is left them but destruction?

The "newer social consciousness," so much in the mouths of soi-disant reformers has many possibilities of good. But it is only a slogan of hell if, in the least degree, it leads fathers and particularly, mothers, to forget that the first duty of parents is not to clean up the streets or the slums, but to take care of their children. Make the home a sanctuary, and we shall be spared the idle tears of hysterical mothers and broken fathers, repenting too late the criminal carelessness that has destroyed the body and soul of the most precious thing on earth, an innocent child.

Don't Throw Away the Crumbs!

A VIRTUE in the piping days of peace, economy is doubly a virtue in time of war. Yet, so far as the real resources of the United States are concerned, there is no cause whatever for alarm. Senator Reed, of Missouri, did the country a needed service when in the debate of May 14, he stated that the grim and ghastly picture of a starving America was nothing but a caricature, drawn by unscrupulous speculators in foodstuffs. "The thing to teach the people now, is that America cannot be starved."

True as these words are, it would be a grave mistake to accept them quite without reservation. Long before the press of war was on the country, economists had adduced facts and figures to show that the American people were anything but saving in the use of food. According to some statisticians, the annual per capita waste in the United States was about seven dollars. Others have suggested a higher figure.

Accepting the lower estimate, it would seem that every year we throw away over $700,000,000 worth of food. The value of that wastage is more than one-half the total revenue of the United States for 1916. It would liquidate, thirty times over, the interest on the public debt for that year. It is about equal to what we annually spend on education. It would support the public school systems in one hundred and fifty cities of the size of St. Louis. It would pay for the construction of two Panama canals. More to the present purpose, perhaps, it would suffice to build and equip forty battleships of the first line.

Some loss, of course, is inevitable, but our percentage is too high. Wise economy is the watchword of the hour, and the housewife can "do her bit" for the country by eliminating waste in the kitchen. As for the food speculators, while no ethical principle will justify the summary process, suggested in the heat of senatorial debate, of suspension from the nearest lamppost, it is to be hoped that Congress may find some practical method of visiting these ghouls with the penalty which usually attaches to treason in time of war. Men who put food beyond the reach of the people, put guns in the hands of the enemy.

Arming for Peace

A LETTER was recently sent to various historical societies by the director of the Division of Archives and History of the New York State Department of Education suggesting the appointment of a member or committee whose task it should be to gather historic material in reference to the war and the conditions arising out of it. It is a timely suggestion for Catholics in particular. They cannot fail to realize the importance of collecting Catholic data relative to the present struggle. Of what invaluable assistance, for example, in repelling the attacks of anti-Catholic bigotry during the past few years, would have been well-kept Catholic archives, filled with abundant and carefully collated documentary evidence bearing upon every phase of the preceding great wars of our nation, and describing Catholic activity in every locality throughout the United States. History is rapidly being made these days, and Catholics are again taking a notable and conspicuous part in the work. But much of the evidence in their favor will be hopelessly lost if not carefully preserved at the present moment.

The method suggested by the New York State Department of Education is to appoint correspondence committees who will send written accounts from outlying districts, collect clippings from the various local papers, and in other ways secure every possible information. We may presume that a systematic collection of Catholic data from all parts of the country will be made by our Catholic historical societies, or has already been undertaken, since they are afforded at this instant their greatest opportunity of serving Church and country. But others can also be of assistance, and none more effectively than editors of Catholic papers, who should gather all important items relative to Catholic activities in their own localities.

Needless to say, it will likewise be of importance for every Catholic to gather and preserve the important pastorals, addresses and other documents from Catholic sources, bearing upon this period. These documents will be an arsenal from which arms and ammunition can quickly be taken to repel the forces of bigotry and intolerance, silent and unknown in these times of war, but doubly loud and valorous in the days of peace.

Legality and Morality

RELIGIOUS people have been shocked, if not scandalized, by a decision rendered a few days ago in the House of Lords, which stated in effect that deliberate subversion of Christianity is not against the statutes of England. The occasion for the decision was a suit brought to test the legality of a legacy which had for its direct object "to promote the principle that human conduct should be based on natural knowledge and not on supernational belief." The legality of the bequest was upheld, and this although the Lord Chancellor declared that Christianity was a part of the law of the land. To aim at destroying the foundation of Christianity is obviously immoral, and yet it would appear not to be against the law of a Christian State,

However Americans have no reason to point the finger of self-righteous scorn at England. Instances in plenty of a like kind can be found at home. Legalized immorality has a recognized place among us. Legalized injustice also, if it be astute and unscrupulous enough, can find safe protection from the law under cover of technicalities.

In the present state of society this may be inevitable, an evil to be tolerated in order to prevent greater evil. But Catholics must keep their judgment clear, and remember that present-day legality and morality are by no means synonymous, that to be within the law is not necessarily to be within the pale of good morals. Mere statutory enactment is not of itself a safe norm for individual conduct. Legislators are fallible at best; their notions of right and wrong are at times vague and unsound, and often in their mistaken zeal for the general good of the community, they think it advisable to tolerate actions which are recognized as immoral. In itself this is deplorable, for the supreme general good of the State is inseparable from virtue. But apart from that, Catholics cannot take for granted that everything which the State refuses to treat as wrong is therefore right in the eyes of God. To be certain of the rectitude of his conduct, a man must test it at the bar of conscience, in the light both of reason and of Revelation. This is true even in Catholic States; it is doubly true of non-Christian and atheistic States.

Mary, Queen of Peace

THE Holy Father has given the Universal Church a new title for Our Lady. Early in May, in a letter on peace addressed to Cardinal Gasparri, Pope Benedict bade his Secretary of State make known to all the Bishops of the Church his Holiness's desire that "Pious and devoted invocations may rise from all corners of the earth, from the humblest huts to the most sumptuous palaces, to obtain for the upheaved world the desired peace," and in order that "The prayers of the unfortunate human family may go up more frequently and humbly to Jesus," the Pope urges that Our Blessed Lady especially should be implored to bring peace to the world. In the hope of securing more effectively her strong intercession his Holiness orders that, beginning June 1, there be definitely introduced into the Litany of the Blessed Virgin the invocation, "Regina Pacis, ora pro nobis": "Queen of Peace, pray for us."

Our Lady's new title becomes her well, for all her ways are pleasantness and all her paths are peace. In the Gospels, whenever we meet our Saviour's Mother we find her promoting harmony or bringing peace. "Behold the handmaid of the Lord! Be it done unto me according to Thy word," her noble answer to the angelic ambassador of God, first brought down to war-worn nations the Prince of Peace Himself; over the hills she sped, not long after, to bear peace and joy to the heart of Elizabeth; the whole world had to be at peace before Mary brought forth her first-born Son and laid Him in a manger; some time later she rejoiced to see the royal Magi returning to their subjects as heralds of God's peace; rather than let a single note of discord mar the harmony of Cana's wedding-feast this peace-loving Mother won a miracle from her Divine Son; and lastly, on Calvary she heroically did her part in reconciling man the offender with God the offended.

Now that in heaven, where perfect "tranquillity with order" is everlasting, Our Lady sits crowned as Queen, she is certainly more willing and able than she was of old to bring her clients peace. If there rises to her throne every day from pure and contrite hearts the earnest petition, "Mary, Queen of Peace, pray for us!" her powerful intercession may speedily win from the God of Battles victory for our country and the Allies and an enduring peace for all the world.

Love, Not Hate

ONE of the last public pronouncements of the late Joseph H. Choate, spoken in welcome to the British representatives of the International War Council, was the expression of his satisfaction that the United States had entered the war not for selfish motives of retaliation but "for noble and lofty purposes such as never attracted nations before." These words were the worthy peroration of an extraordinarily long life of great civic usefulness, guided throughout by high principle. The American people on whose behalf they were uttered would do well to keep them in mind, for they will help to keep clear the spirit in which we have entered the struggle.

Catholics, like their fellow-citizens, will not forget that the war has been forced on us; that we could not without sacrifice of national honor, have refused to take up the gage repeatedly and deliberately thrown at our feet in the sight of the whole world.

Nevertheless they should not let their judgment be clouded. Patriotism begins and ends with love of country. Conscious of the rectitude of our initial purpose and final aim, we have ample means to fire our hearts with exalted enthusiasm without giving vent to the evil passions that lie in the black depths of the soul. There must be no "hymn of hate" with us. An appeal to hatred would dishonor our flag. Justice is all sufficient to steel our hearts. Christian charity, devotion to a blameless cause, heroic self-sacrifice on the altar of liberty, pure love for our hearths, our homes and our native land, these are the motives that should be our inspiration. They who would fill us with hate are not true friends of America.

The courage that is resolute in the face of danger, that calmly endures the prospect of pain, that fights without bitterness and suffers without complaint, that lives without reproach and dies without fear, springs from the inspiration of heaven, not from the counsel of hell. If our soldiers are to be heroes in the real sense of the word, martyrs to a holy cause, they must steep their hearts in lofty ideals of self-sacrifice, not in thirst for revenge. Our object is to halt the march of death, to open the flood-gates of life, that glorious life of liberty which we have so long enjoyed. And our standard when it comes back from Europe, rent and darkened with blood, must have no taint upon it, no stain of savagery, no memory of brutal passion. It must still fly aloft in the breeze, the unsullied symbol of honor.

Literature

AUTHORS, EDITORS AND REVIEWERS

AS authors, editors and reviewers are literary cater-cousins, so to speak, it would seem that they ought to get on together quite harmoniously. Unfortunately, however, it often happens that they do not. Just as blood-relatives, and near ones too, not infrequently are found bickering and quarreling about family matters, those whose profession is creating, perfecting and appraising literature, are a traditionally waspish and contentious set. The root cause of this incompatibility is said to be the editor's addiction to invading the author's province, and the reviewer's fondness for teaching both author and editor their trade.

The writers of unpublished stories bitterly complain that the average editor is quite incapable of distinguishing a literary masterpiece from a bit of clever journalese, and that he mars, as a rule, what he thinks he mends. The editor retorts that many of today's authors are as blind to "what the public wants" as they are ignorant of how plots should be constructed. Authors, moreover, particularly the young and callow, the editor does not fail to remark, set such an absurdly high value on the mere verbal tinsel in their output that the man who is rash enough to delete or alter a single word in the copy submitted to him incurs the author's everlasting enmity. As for the reviewer, he realizes that his high mission is to examine critically the literary productions which the author and the editor have considered worthy of publication, and to point out ruthlessly all the errors in taste, mistakes in fact or faults in construction that his impartial eye can detect.

Small wonder is it then that authors, editors and reviewers are so often at daggers drawn. Indeed, the quarrel must be quite as old as literature itself. No sooner did the earliest poetaster begin to recite his limping, unmusical lines than some caustic critic doubtless remarked:

"Those verses are not poetry at all."

"But my friend, Redactor, who heard the poem and then suggested numerous changes which I reluctantly adopted, says that it is now a masterpiece."

"Redactor!" the critic then perhaps exclaimed with a contemptuous snort. "Why, he knows no more about poetry than you do yourself!"

That short dialogue may be considered an epitome of literary criticism's history. Mutatis mutandis, the process is perhaps the same in every age. Today a "living author" writes what he considers a chef-d'oeuvre. A publisher then reads the manuscript and indicates what changes should be made to render the book a best-seller. After a long struggle the author churlishly consents to the suggested "improvements," and the book appears. The prowling reviewer then pounces upon it, berates the author for writing a pot-boiler "so utterly devoid of artistry that the book will not increase Mr. M.'s literary renown."

Sometimes, however, the battle is only two-sided: between the author and his editor, between the author and his reviewer, or between the editor and a reviewer. As an interesting example of the third kind of quarrel may be cited the "Correspondence of George Bancroft and Jared Sparks, 1823-1832," which John Spencer Basset has recently edited for the Smith College Department of History, to illustrate "the relation between editor and reviewer in the early nineteenth century." The book contains a collection of letters written by two young New Englanders who subsequently became famous, the one as his country's historian, and the other as Washington's biographer. Both the correspondents, as was not uncommon among Harvard graduates in those days, had tried their hand at preaching Unitarianism, but when these letters were written Bancroft was conducting a boys' school at Round Hill, Northampton, and Sparks was editor of the North American Review.

Bancroft, who had been studying at German universities, began the correspondence by volunteering to review "Buttman's Greek Grammar," an offer which Sparks accepted, saying: "You may make it as learned as you please; only let all your learning be in very fair manuscript." But relations between editor and reviewer did not long remain harmonious. For Sparks felt it his duty to take the edge from some of Bancroft's sharp criticisms, and that gave the reviewer such pain that he wrote: "To give up a production of my own, to be accommodated to another's views, to have another's mind reign in it, is what I never can do," and he then spoke sadly of "relinquishing the career of letters." But only "three or four lines were omitted," protested Sparks, "not a word or at least a sentiment added." But this soothing answer only aroused Bancroft's wrath, and he wrote:

> Do you not know, you changed one assertion from a negative to a positive one, thereby saying something which I do not believe, and which makes the words at least unmeaning? And do you think that when a man has written according to the strictest rules of rhetoric as far as he knows them, has consulted harmony and perspicuity in the structure and arrangement of his sentences, and has carefully and after frequent deliberation selected his words and phrases, that he likes to see them erased, or supplemented by words which do not express his ideas? You altered what you would not have altered had you understood why and in what spirit it was written.

But Sparks promptly returned the ball, saying:

> I have made it a practice without a single exception to strike out of any article such parts as I did not like; and I have hardly printed an article in which I did not omit something, nor do I remember writing an article for the N. A. R. while it was in other hands from which some parts were not struck out. I add nothing without the consent of the author, but I omit in all cases where I think it ought to be done. You are the only person who has complained. E. Everett has now an article just going to press in which I have canceled three sheets. He thinks them good, of course, but he makes no objection to their being omitted.

"Literature I love," observed Bancroft in a later letter, "but reviewing is a bad business." So that quarrel ended, but a new one soon started. For Sparks, without consulting his contributor, "edited" another of Bancroft's articles. Whereupon the future historian indignantly wrote:

> Your omissions and additions do in my view essentially change the character of my article. The remarks which you have added do not accord with what I have publicly and privately expressed; and on the whole the article as it now stands is calculated to convey an impression entirely different from what I designed. I cannot, as a man of honor, take part in this or permit it without forfeiting my claim to self-respect. . . . I protest against the publication of the article as it now stands; I absolutely refuse my consent to it; I go further; if I have any legal right to forbid it, I exercise that right.

"I can only wonder again at your strange notions of an editor's task," Sparks calmly answered. "If all writers were thus minded, an editor's condition would be very much like that of a toad under a harrow." What the authors of the books Bancroft tore to pieces thought of his work we have no means of knowing. They doubtless had an opinion of both editor and reviewer which would now be very entertaining reading if it had come down to us. However that may be, Sparks's ruthless blue-pencil doubtless helped to perfect the style of our country's great historian.

The methods and manners not only of authors and editors, but even of reviewers, have improved since the early part of the last century, and their mutual relations are now more cordial. But there is room, of course, for further improvement. If authors, for instance, could manage to avoid writing books of which there is no earthly need—and a surprisingly large proportion of those published nowadays fall in that class—and, when they do produce useful books, if they would only take more time and pains in writing them, it would be easier for editors and publishers to save their own souls. For they now approve of and bring out far too many worthless, and worse than worthless, books, articles and stories, from which they ought to protect the helpless public.

The reviewer also has duties, of course, toward the public and to the authors and editors as well. In the first place, he ought to read the books he undertakes to review. A mere glance through the preface, the chapter-heads and the index of a real book will not enable him to appraise it justly. Moreover, the competent reviewer ought to try to know considerable about the subject his author writes on. That will keep the critic from dogmatizing on matters of which he is quite ignorant, or from ridiculing, in a flippant line or two, arguments or conclusions which are the fruit of long years of thought or research on the part of the author. The conscientious reviewer will always commend when he can, but if he must condemn, let it be done briefly, fearlessly, and more in sorrow than in anger. Reviewers can also lighten the harried editor's lot if they will only keep within the limits of the space and time assigned them. Nothing drives an editor to worse desperation than to receive a month too late what was to have been a 300-word book-review, but which has grown by the delay to some 3,000 words. Can he be blamed then if he seizes his blue-pencil and his shears, cries "Havoc!" and savagely slaughters the dearest children of the reviewer's brain?

So for the production of good literature it is clear that the harmonious cooperation of author, editor and reviewer is required. If each does his part competently and conscientiously, no doubt there will at length result a masterpiece which the editor's sage counsel and the reviewer's penetrating criticism will have had no small share in helping the author to write.

Le Témoignage des Apostats. Par TH. MAINAGE, des Frères Prêcheurs. Leçons données à l'Institut catholique de Paris (1915-1916). Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne. 4 fr.

Readers familiar with the work of the author, "La Psychologie de la Conversion," will welcome this companion volume in which he studies the problem of apostasy. The scholarly Dominican has thought it impossible to separate these two opposite phases of one and the same question, namely, faith in its relations with the laws of psychology. Just as in the phenomenon of conversion, converts obey certain well-defined laws and yield to the impulse of clearly determined motives, so, he writes, apostates offer us the spectacle of a moral transformation which obeys certain well determined motives. He deems it important to examine the value of these motives and to inquire in all impartiality and judicious calm whether the reasons which cause the defection of certain souls from the Church, its practices and dogmas are really of such power and cogency as to shake or diminish in us the argument drawn in behalf of the Faith and the Church from the testimony of converts to her fold.

It is evident that the question thus studied and outlined is of the highest interest and actuality. It opens new, wide horizons to the apologetical writer and gives him the opportunity of a splendid treatise on practical psychology supported by the voice of history, and pressed into the service of the Faith. Father Mainage submits to a stern analysis the apostasy of Luther and finds it caused by the tyranny of his passions; of Julian the Apostate and sees in it the result of the fascination and hallucination which the marvelous and the unknown exercised over him; of Lamennais, and sees in it the effect of love of power and intellectual superiority and domination. Calvin's apostasy, according to the author, was brought about by intellectual narrowness, and that of Ernest Renan, by what he terms "l'emiettement intellectuel," or what we might call intellectual dilettanteism.

The conclusion at which he arrives after the analyses of these cases of apostasy is the following: At the outset of every apostasy there lurks in the mind or heart of the future apostate some evil inclination, some tendency which has not been completely checked and brought under subjection. The apostate, before violating the law of God and the obligations of conscience and thus bringing about his spiritual downfall, disturbs the harmony of the faculties of mind and soul which constitutes his perfection as a man. The fall therefore of the apostate and his rejection of his former faith, far from weakening the claims of the Catholic Church, only pay a striking and unmistakable tribute to its vitality and to that splendid equilibrium of all the faculties and powers which it causes in the soul, an equilibrium ever unbalanced by the apostate's fall and which he never regains outside of the Church which he has betrayed.

The Woodcraft Manual for Boys. By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON. Published for the Woodcraft League of America. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co. $0.50.

Its preface states that this book of over 400 pages is "an official manual of the Woodcraft League, giving full information as to the carrying on of the work of the Woodcraft boys. It is also a handbook containing information on outdoor life for the boys of America." The author's name, of course, will attract the attention of every lover of the outdoor life. The manual is a compilation of facts and instructions, written to please boys, but not devoid of the charm to be found in most of Ernest Thompson Seton's writings, for he knows how to impart to others his own keen appreciation of nature and love of outdoor life. Only a small portion of the manual, however, is given to an explanation of the spirit, organization, methods and ideals of the Woodcraft League, an association formed by Mr. Seton to further his work of interesting American youth in outdoor life, "for its worth in the building up of our bodies and the helping and strengthening of our souls."

By far the greater part of the volume is devoted to subjects which will delight the average boy, whose admiration for the pioneer hero of Indian tales and campfire stories is so great. In the author boys will find an enthusiastic and entertaining guide, one who takes pleasure in showing them the secrets of the woods and teaching them the ways of the forest ranger. Directions are given for pitching a camp and making it comfortable, hints for the cook, lessons in Indian handicraft and woodlore are offered and instructions in tracking and trailing, in reading signs and signals, and in the use of the hatchet are also given. "Friends in the Out of Doors" is a chapter which will acquaint the reader with the more common forms of wild life, such as animals, trees, flowers, etc. The manual's illustrations are profuse, and though sometimes crude, are always clear. For those who desire more complete information on other subjects than the limits of the manual allow, a list of standard works is given at the end of each topic.

Brazil Today and Tomorrow. By L. E. Elliott, F.R.G.S. Illustrated. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

In the midst of the increasing number of books of travel describing the great Latin Republics of the South, written without an understanding of the peoples, their religion, their social conditions and their history, it is a pleasure to meet a volume so judicious and sympathetic as this. Here and there Catholics may meet a phrase or two which they would like to see modified, but for the work as a whole they will find nothing but praise. The author has not seen in Brazil and its inhabitants that gross immorality, that unprogressiveness, the lack of enterprise repeated ad nauseam by other travelers, who are evidently lacking in the thorough knowledge Mr. Elliott displays about the immense resources locked within the 3,300,000 square miles of Brazil's territory.

He begins with a review of the history of the Republic and gives a fair and impartial account of the colonization and civilization of the country. He recognizes faults, but is not blind to heroic achievements. Of the work of the missionaries, and especially of the Jesuits, he gives a just appraisal. The author describes the civilizing influence exerted by the first missionaries and pays a high tribute to their heroism and dauntless courage. Through an oversight, however, the great Antonio Vieira does not receive in these pages that position of honor to which his long labors both for the Portuguese and for the Indians entitle him.

In the chapter on the "Social Conditions" of the country the author tells us with evident emotion and sincerity of the gentleness and courtesy of manners everywhere prevailing in the great Republic; he praises the virtuous, home-loving and refined Brazilian mothers, daughters and wives; he describes the correct literary and artistic taste of the better classes, and expresses his admiration for the courtesy and hospitality of the poor. Mr. Elliott admits that a favorite pose of some Brazilians is to speak slightingly of religious practices, but thinks that such language does not express their genuine sentiments. Though education among the poorer classes has not made as much progress as in this country there, he finds that higher education is flourishing in Brazil. According to the author, the Jesuits are doing excellent educational work there; the "very best education" for men is said to be given in the Jesuit college at Itú, in the interior of Sao Paulo State. He pays a like tribute to the work of the Benedictines, the Franciscans and the Ladies of the Sacred Heart. The industries, the finance and monetary condition of the Republic are then studied, and there is a special chapter on the "World's Horticultural and Medicinal Debt to Brazil." Mr. Elliott has written an interesting and authoritative book.

Intolerance in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. By Arthur Jay Klein. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $2.00

It is not easy to see why this book was written. The author takes a Jovian attitude, and from the height of his Olympus looks down with kindly tolerance on the inevitable intolerance of mortals in the world below. He finds intolerance a necessary consequence of the knowing that one is right—of course he says it in the mere imposing language affected by professors—but, for all that, he finds it intensely amusing; which makes one suspect him to be a philosopher of the school of Lord Dundreary, holding the world to be full of things "that no fellah can find out," and therefore the more delightful. Such being the case he would have been more philosophical, no doubt, had he taken intolerance for granted, like measles and mumps, as something unworthy of discussion. He implies that among the motives prompting him to write was the desire to show how the rise of dissenting Protestant bodies in the reign of Elizabeth prepared the way for the struggle under the Stuarts. But this hardly called for a new book. It is an old story. The general tone of Mr. Klein's volume is hardly pleasing. One feels continually the suggestion that "the subordination of religious to political considerations" was the proper thing, that Catholics were unreasonable, and were on the whole, treated better than they deserved. For us Catholics, the historical work in this book is insignificant. The abundance and exactness of what our own authors give, cause us to be as much amused with Mr. Klein's book as he is with intolerance. Had the author studied the matter more fully he would have hesitated before committing himself to the Protestant falsehood that "the officials of Mary were objects of hatred to the people."

Elementary Social Science. By Frank M. Leavitt and Edith Brown. New York: The Macmillan Company. $0.80.

Crimes of Charity. By Konrad Bercovici. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. $1.50.

The first of the foregoing books is an attempt to supply a text on social science for pupils in the grades. With the curriculum already burdened to the point of strain, if not beyond it, one may seriously question the fitness and possibility of any formal treatment of this subject in the elementary school. However this may be, it is difficult to understand how history and geography can be taught properly without some reference to social science. Hence the present volume, clear in statement and admirable in arrangement, may be found serviceable by teachers. There is not a trace of Socialism in the book, and the important functions of government are stated concisely and, on the whole, satisfactorily. Yet, as in all texts intended for non-sectarian schools, the no less important function of religion in private and public life receives but the scantiest consideration, with the result that the chapter on "The Promotion of Morality" is the weakest in the book. To state, quite without restriction, that "There is generally more good than bad even in law-breakers" is loose and misleading, while to defend the depredations of Robin Hood on the score that the laws and customs of the time were "perhaps" unjust, is to abandon the principle laid down by the authors, "Crime is never right, no matter how great the provocation." A carefully winnowed bibliography would have made the book more useful.

Mr. Bercovici should have dedicated his volume of fiction not "To My Naomi," but to the late Mr. Simon Legree as the rightful patron of all organized charity. The reviewer is by no means minded to rush to the rescue of the New York societies which fall under Mr. Bercovici's lash; on the other hand, he puts no more credence in Mr. Bercovici's wild and inherently improbable accusations than he did in the ravings of Messrs. Kingsbury and Doherty against the private child-caring institutions of New York. Mr. John Reed, contributing a preface, writes that "the law, the police, the church, are the accomplices of charity," and states in apparent seriousness that "liars, cringers, thieves, sweat-shops and white slavery" are its direct results. Mr. Reed's comment is fully in keeping with the tone and temper of Mr. Bercovici's contribution to the world's store of misinformation.

Literature in the Making. By Some of Its Makers. Presented by Joyce Kilmer. New York: Harper & Bros. $1.40.

"This book," says Mr. Kilmer in his introduction, "is an effort to bridge the gulf between theory and practice." With this object he interviewed twenty-three American authors of today who represent a wide diversity of opinion and the character of whose literary output is quite as varied, and by the adroit questions he put, learned the tendencies, shortcomings and excellencies of modern American literature as seen by its actual makers. Among the authors interviewed are William Dean Howells, Frank H. Spearman, Kathleen Norris, Booth Tarkington, James Lane Allen, John Burroughs, Robert W. Chambers, Montagu Glass, E. S. Martin, Robert Herrick, Arthur Guiterman, George Barr McCutcheon, Will N. Harben, Ellen Glasgow, Robert Underwood Johnson, Amy Lowell, Percy Mackaye and others.

The subjects discussed range from "The Joys of the Poor," "Deterioration of the Short Story," "Magazines Cheapen Fiction" to "City Life Versus Literature" and "The New Spirit in Poëtry." Harry Leon Wilson, for example, bewails "our lack of authoritative criticism." He finds that "at least eighty-five per cent of our book-reviews are mere amiable perfunctory echoes of the enthusiastic 'canned' review which the publisher obligingly prints on the paper jacket of his best-seller." Mr. Guiterman's "Sixteen Don'ts for Poets" ought to be conspicuously displayed in every editorial sanctum, and Mrs. Norris believes that we need writers who will tell us more about the little joys of the poor. The chapters on "Literature in the Making" all appeared originally in the New York Times Sunday magazine, and apart from the interesting character of the papers themselves, show what an excellent interviewer Mr. Kilmer is. The Spiritual Interpretation of History. By SHAILER MATHEWS, A.M., D.D., LL.D. Professor of Historical and Comparative Theology at the University of Chicago and Dean of the Divinity School. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. $1.50.

Dean Shailer Mathews is a modernist who, true to the sentimental optimism of his sect, manages like Teufelsdröckh to find "in a certain after-shine (Nachschein) of Christianity" reasons for still holding that life is worth living. The mental processes through which he conducts his readers, especially in what purposes to be the constructive portion of this work, bear about the same relation to facts as do those processes with which all of us are made acquainted in our dreams. Hence, though urgent in prophecy he is lamentably deficient in his judgments on history. To make matters even worse, his spiritualism is nothing higher than that animalizing theory of evolution according to which man is only . . . "the better beast, using his senses, not the sense of sense."

On this assumption he proceeds to read Bergson's élan vital into the past and calls the result "interpretation." Should anyone, on the ground of "personal impressions" of the Dean's writings, object to such criticism, he can do no better than recall the words in which Dawson, the sorry dupe in "Pelham" tries to excuse his own errors by shifting the blame on to those who misled him. "They never spoke of things" he says, "by their right names; and therefore those things never seemed so bad as they really were." The admonitory value of these words for such as indulge in modernistic literature is still further heightened in view of that supercilious attitude towards the past which is at once so peculiar to the Modernist and so marked a characteristic of this book. But in the reflection of Browning, "'Tis looking downward that makes one dizzy" is a psychological fact which better perhaps than anything else explains how it is that Dean Mathews could entitle his book "The Spiritual Interpretation of History," when in reality he only succeeds in filling its 219 pages with something very like the opposite. Should Students Study? By WILLIAM TRUFANT FOSTER, LL.D., President of Reed College. New York: Harper & Bros. $0.50

Testimonies and above all, apparently, statistics are the arguments that appeal most today. It was not always so. There was a time when an analytical study of the nature and the purpose of an object was regarded as capable of yielding conclusive evidence for or against a belief or a conjecture. But the modern mind would seem not to have entered as yet upon that stage of evolution wherein close reasoning is followed with understanding and ease. President Foster has done well then in basing his arguments on the findings of statistics. The old contention that it really does pay to study is, he tells us, borne out by the facts. The boy who studies in the high school is a good student in the college; the college student or the "grind," as his companions are inclined to call him contemptuously, attains high rank in the professional school, and success in after-life. And what of the "good fellow," of him whose sole ambition is to become the hero of the diamond or the gridiron, and of all those who are satisfied with the "gentleman's grade," in which mediocrity is the highest point attainable? The facts tell painfully against his chances for success in life, so much so that what the prospective law student must say to himself may be commended to the earnest consideration of every college youth. "If a college undergraduate," writes the author, "is ready to be honest with himself, he must say, 'If I am content with mediocre work in college, it is likely that the men in my class who graduate with honor will have three times my chances of success in the law school, and the men in my class who graduate with highest honor will have nearly ten times my chances of success."

"Thinking by Proxy," is a chapter that deserves to be pondered over by pupil and teacher alike. As the author well says: "You can lead a boy to lectures, but you cannot make him think—at least not often by this, the easiest of all methods of instruction." Doubtless, the lecture system can be a most deadening thing, like a phonograph record from which the harmonies have fled; and if we are to believe even half of what we hear and read, the lecture system as it is interpreted in many a university is only too often open to this charge. The daily or bi-weekly "quiz" is or should be the life-giving principle of the lecture. But how many professors of "modern philosophy" would be willing to have the most thoughtful of their students propose their doubts in the classroom? Would the professors be able to solve these doubts to the satisfaction of the reflective pupil?

The independence of thought President Foster praises, particularly in matters of religion, will seem to many, and justly, too broad; but if hedged round with the necessary safeguards and limitations, it deserves a place of honor in the scheme of education. Insistence upon making boys think for themselves is not of course something new in the history of education; and yet one cannot help suspecting that "thinking by proxy" is not the distinctively Catholic disease it was once considered to be.

Lloyd George: the Man and His Story. By FRANK DILNOT. New York: Harper & Brothers. $1.00.

This is a first-hand picture of the man who may now be said to rule the destinies of England. It brings him before us as a living personality whose minutest trait has been accurately observed. The writer has known "the little Welshman" for many years. He has seen, as he tells us, the present Prime Minister of England as the young political free-lance fighting what seemed to be at times a losing battle for the most unpopular causes, watched him thrilling an unemotional British audience with his eloquence, and studied him in Parliament, holding his own against a storm of opposition and invective. He has been charmed with his admirable home-life and the sturdy virtues which he practises amid the humble folk of the Welsh hamlet where he mingles unostentatiously with the friendly artisans and the farmers among whom he passed his childhood.

Many will be out of sympathy with the policies of the statesman whose rise to power has been so startling, but all must admire the lessons of energy and high resolve, of which he has so often given the most singular proofs. The book is written in thorough sympathy with the aims and the ideals of the hero, but it is not a mere piece of exaggerated panegyric. Mr. Dilnot admits that in some lights it seems a "shabby" thing that Lloyd George should have ousted Mr. Asquith from power, yet he does not think that Lloyd George sordidly schemed to take the ex-Premier's place. According to Mr. Dilnot, Lloyd George realized that the war must be pressed home to victory, and that the presence of his former chief at the head of the Government was an obstacle in the way, and that he must be sacrificed.

The book is interesting and on the whole gives a correct impression of a forceful and dominant figure. It teaches what great things can be accomplished even by those who start out in life with the heavy handicap of poverty, obscurity and opposition of every kind, provided that it be offset by a high purpose and an unflinching resolve to succeed. BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"A Short History of Ireland" (Stokes, $0.80), by Constantia Maxwell, M.A., is moderately fair, though obviously written in the interests not of the native Celtic majority of Ireland, but of the descendants of the English colonists there. Consequently there is a toning down, if not an actual omission, of all that might paint England and her Irish policy in an unfavorable light, together with a judicious avoidance of aught that might unduly influence opinion in favor of the native Irish. There are no great, glaring misstatements, but everywhere are gentle understatements, etc., so the effect sought is produced in a manner imperceptible to the unobservant reader.

"Manuale Ordinandorum or the Ordination Rite According to the Roman Pontifical" (Archabbey Press, Beatty, Pa., cloth, $0.50; paper, $0.25), by the Rev. Aurelius Stehle, O. S. B., is a handy manual containing all the rubrical points on the manner of conferring the tonsure and the Minor and Major Orders. The text of the Roman Pontifical is printed in full with the addition of many useful and informing notes taken chiefly from the authentic decrees of the Holy See and from approved authors. The text is preceded by a description of the things which must be prepared before the ceremonies take place and by appropriate instructions to the ordinandi. After the text there is a short summary of the doctrine concerning the defects which may occur in the conferring of the Orders, with the corresponding information on what has to be done in different cases. A collection of decrees bearing on ordinations and the text of the faculties of bishops in this matter close the work. All this is contained in a neatly bound and printed pamphlet, octavo, of eighty-eight pages.

In "Changing Winds" (Macmillan, $1.60), St. John G. Ervine, a decidedly ribald, intolerant and opinionated young Ulsterite, writes the 571-page story of Henry Quinn's political, amorous and literary vagaries. The author's hope for Ireland is the conquest of the "publican, the priest, the politician and the poet" and the country's transformation into a little replica of England. He insults and misunderstands Catholics and their religion as a true Orangeman must, and he reports the conversations of four Fleet Street literary men with the disgusting fidelity that the "new Irish school" affects. Henry's morals, it need scarcely be added, are no better than his manners. The best portions of the book are the descriptions of the Easter Week uprising and England's slow realization of the war's seriousness. In Mr. John Marsh, the author seems to have painted a good portrait of John McDonagh.

"The Contemporary Short Story" (Heath, $1.25) is a "practical manual" Harry T. Baker, M.A., instructor in English in the University of Illinois, has prepared for those who cannot die content until they have seen their names in the magazines. "Most authors under twenty-five years of age," is his sage counsel, "had better not be writing short stories at all." If many older authors, we might add, could contrive to avoid, until they are at least seventy-five, writing any more short stories, the mass of worthless material that now burdens our news-stands would be profitably lessened. The author, who has been special reader for fiction publishers, gives advice which teachers of English may find of value. But why should young people be encouraged to write for certain magazines that are not fit to enter a Christian home?

"Benedictus Qui Venit, a New Mass Book for Youth. Containing Instructions and New Prayers for Mass and Communion Proper to the Days of Youth" (Longmans, $0.30), by Father W. Roche, S.J., in arrangement is like his "Mysteries of the Mass in Reasoned Prayers," which was praised in our issue of February 12, 1916. Simple prayers for each part of the Holy Sacrifice are printed in broken lines that suggest pauses for reflection, and the accompanying explanations are brief and clear. Here, for instance, is what the boy who uses this little book says to Our Lord at the Gospel:

> I like to think how you stood by or sat watching our games—our pipings and dancing in the market place—and saying your Kingdom was for such as us. The daughter of Jairus you brought back to life and the dead son of the widow likewise. From a boy and a girl you drove the devil headlong. No one can count the young folks you cured, nor how many others you "looked on and loved" as upon the young man who called Thee Good Master and knelt at Thy feet. You allowed youths and maidens to carry palms and the boys of the streets to sing your praises, and one brave lad to bring the five loaves with which you fed the multitudes. Let me too praise Thee and serve Thee and love Thee and cling close to Thee and be of Thy Kingdom.

"Crabb's English Synonyms," (Harper, $1.25), has long had an honored place on the desks of literary workers and careful students, and it has had a part all its own in keeping the language from inaccurate and slipshod usage. The book deserved to be perpetuated; but of late it had lost something of its usefulness because it was climbing up the hill to its century of years, and naturally did not take account of those many words which have long since ceased to be neoterisms and are now accorded the sanction of the best writers. This defect has been remedied in the century edition, which in a revised and enlarged form, but one that retains the old thoroughness of discussion, has brought the volume up to date, filled the gaps and supplied a complete set of cross-references. "Crabb's" old friends will doubtless wish to renew their acquaintance with him, and the book may well look forward to another century of increased usefulness.

"Sea Plunder" (Lane, $1.30), by H. De Vere Stacpoole, will appeal to lovers of Robert Louis Stevenson's "Treasure Island." In this up-to-date story "pieces of eight" are not the treasure sought for, but the pirate crew of the Penguin seek rather the priceless Australian cable buried in coral one mile below the blue of the Pacific Ocean. The leading characters, Captain Blood and First Mate Harman, are lovable rogues who cherish in spite of their calling a peculiar honor-code of their own. ——"Louisberg Square" (Macmillan, $1.50), by Robert Cutler, is a rather commonplace love-story, too long drawn out. The refined Bostonians, of which this book is a record, are for the most part an aimless lot whose history is tedious reading. Some Italians are introduced to be "uplifted," and some Irish to be derided.——Elaine Sterne's novel, "The Road to Ambition" (Britton, $1.35), bears the marks of a 'prentice hand. The central figure of the story is "Bill," a superhuman steel-puddler, who invents a new refining process, becomes a "gentleman" miraculously and then weds the lady of the land. Probabilities are repeatedly strained to the breaking point.

In "A Garden Rosary" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25), Agnes Edwards, in carefully chosen language, describes the flowers of her well-stocked garden, as, from April to November, they spring up, bloom and fade. The dainty book is full of happy similes. For instance: "The lemon verbena is like one of those rare and inconspicuous women whose life is made up of continual and silent willing sacrifice. Break a spray and it thrusts out another even more fragrant. Crush the leaves between your fingers and a heavenly perfume is your only rebuff. It lives by giving." As the year waned, the author's mother, who was also very fond of flowers, passed away, and the bereaved daughter goes to the garden for comfort, poor pagan that she is, but ends with the faint hope that "the same Power" which regulates the development of a rose perhaps orders the "course of every human life in the way most rightful and inevitable."

The May Month is a particularly interesting number. It begins with "The Death-Knell of Autocracy," Father Keating's examination of President Wilson's war message and the significance of America's entrance into the great conflict. "The Art of Bolstering" is the title of Father Sidney Smith's review of a Protestant pamphlet on the Primacy texts. In "A German Vindication of Belgium," Mr. Hilliard Atteridge cites the Cologne Volkszeitung, a Catholic paper, to disprove the "atrocities" alleged to have been commtted by Belgian civilians. Father Thurston has an erudite article on "Afflictions" or the use of genuflections for penitential purposes, and Hugh Anthony Allen contributes an excellent "Appreciation" of Joyce Kilmer's poetry, which "floats high above all the rest" now being written in this country, "white and beautiful, eager with fresh, unstinted loveliness." He quotes for special commendation "The Robe of Christ," the concluding stanzas of which are these:

I saw him through a thousand veils,
  And has not this sufficed?
Now, must I look on the Devil robed
  In the radiant Robe of Christ?

He comes, and his face is sad and mild,
  With thorns his head is crowned,
There are great bleeding wounds in his feet,
  And in each hand a wound.

How can I tell, who am a fool,
  If this be Christ or no?
These bleeding hands outstretched to me!
  Those eyes that loved me so!

I see the Robe—I look—I hope—
  I fear—but there is one
Who will direct my troubled mind;
  Christ's Mother knows her Son.

O Mother of Good Counsel, lend
  Intelligence to me!
Encompass me with wisdom,
  Thou Tower of Ivory!

"This is the man of lies," she says,
  "Disguised with fearful art;
He has the wounded hands and feet,
  But not the wounded heart."

Beside the Cross on Calvary
  She watched them as they diced.
She saw the Devil join the game
  And win the Robe of Christ.

EDUCATION

The Gary Plan, 1917 Model

ONE is quite justified in the prophecy that in the course of the year 2017, if the world whirls that long, some unhappy savant will reach a stage in the composition of his "History of Educational Experiments," where it will be necessary to write a chapter on "The Gary Plan in New York." My heart goes out in sincere pity to that man. If he is prudent, he will remark that its origin is buried in obscurity, and for once he may be right as well as prudent. But if he is a philosopher, trained to hunt answers for questions that have none, he will fall to work on the "what, whence and why," and thereby plunge himself into an uncharted sea of difficulties. For to frame replies that will satisfy an interested generation, the New York Montagues and Capulets, is almost like attempting to square the circle. Perhaps, however, the coming races will not be equally contentious.

A Baltimore Critic

IT is not a matter of difficulty to collect a bibliography on the Gary Plan, but after a study of the alleged authorities, one is tempted to the conclusion that the Plan is very much like Hamlet's cloud. A gentleman, writing in the Baltimore American Citizen, holds that "the primary purpose of the Gary Scheme (pat word!) is the compulsory teaching of the Romissh (I follow copy) religion in the public schools by papal priests." This pundit allows that the "Scheme" has "possibilities," which possibilities, however, are only "the excellent jam that conceals and makes palatable the poison-pill of papacy which is being so eagerly gulped by gullible Protestants." The persons who urge the gullible Protestants to gulp this concealing jam are not precisely persons, but "the busy little bees of the Vatican, never known to take a vacation, or to leave off their stingers." These bees, trained by the Vatican, to turn from their original vocation of making honey, to the manufacture of excellent jam, are the Jesuits. "The Jesuit," says this person, "is always on the job," and in the present matter, he takes the measure of his most astute ancestors.

> The originator of the Gary Plan is Wiliam A. Wirt, of Gary, Ind. He is a cousin of John Purroy Mitchel, gallant Knight of Columbus, and loyal follower of Loyola, and present Mayor of New York City. Mr. Wirt is now being paid $10,000 a year of public funds of the City of New York for this job of delivering thousands of Protestant children, bound and helpless, into the hands of Rome's diabolic priesthood.

Considering the trying nature of Mr. Wirt's "job," ten thousand dollars does not seem an excessive stipend. It may pay for the chains and twine necessary to bind these thousands of hardy little annual Protestants, but will leave only a small sum to recompense Mr. Wirt for his exhausting labor in catching them.

Friends and Enemies

TURNING from this gentleman, whom the judicious will consider obsessed, the existence of a growing conviction, both among teachers and parents, that the Gary Plan "won't work," must be admitted. It was brought to New York by a whirlwind of antagonistic interests, and the strife then engendered has never been wholly allayed. Not without some show of reason is it claimed, that Mr. Wirt's theories have never been given a fair test. Yet, as his opponents have not been slow to observe, no educational experiment has ever been planned on so vast a scale, or carried out with such small concern as to its probable cost. Constantly has it basked in the smile of authority, an authority hard pressed at times, but usually on the top of the heap. Writing in the New York Globe on January 10, Mr. T. W. Metcalfe, an able commentator on local educational affairs, found in the appointments then made to the School Board by the Mayor, "a determination of the city administration to force the extension of the Gary Plan, irrespective of the protests of the supervising and teaching staff."

This "forcing" on the one hand, and the official favor enjoyed by the followers of the administration, on the other, are no doubt responsible, in some degree, for the varying estimates of the Plan in New York. No teacher will accomplish much if compelled to follow methods which he honestly disapproves, nor, in this case, can his failure be attributed to the system of which he is part. We seem to be facing a situation in which the friends of the Plan believe it a success, while its opponents see in it nothing but the beginnings of educational anarchy. Mr. Angelo Patri, for instance, principal of the largest Gary School in New York, considers his establishment an ample justification of Mr. Wirt's sagacity. Other critics find this same school the final justification of the worst that has been urged against the Plan. No Solomon has yet appeared in New York to strike a fair balance between these opposing judgments.

An Official Rating

THE only official rating of the Plan is nearly two years old, and the Gary schools may now be better or worse than was then indicated. In March and June, 1915, examinations were ordered by the City Superintendent, Dr. William Maxwell, to determine if possible, the relative efficiency of the traditional type of school, the prevocational school, sometimes called the "Ettinger school," and the Gary school. Tests in arithmetic, geography, spelling, history and grammar were taken by more than ten thousand children. In his report to the Board of Education, dated January 16, 1916, Dr. Maxwell wrote: "The results show that of the three types, the traditional schools made the best showing, the prevocational schools stood second, and the Gary schools stood third," the averages being 51.1, 45.5 and 43.7 respectively. The following figures, compiled by Mr. B. R. Buckingham, then chief statistician to the Superintendent, were submitted:

	Arithmetic.	Spelling.	Geography.	History.	Grammar.	All subjects.
Gary	42.2	62.2	52.3	38	24	43.7
Prevocational	47.5	64.4	54.5	40.3	21	45.5
Traditional	51.4	77.6	57.3	43	26.3	51.1
All schools	47.9	64.8	55.2	41	23.1	46.4

In June, 1915, a similar series of examinations was given to discover the percentage of pupils who had improved since March. Again the Gary school failed to show any superiority over the traditional type.

	Arithmetic.	Spelling.	Geography.	History.	Grammar.	All subjects.
Gary	40.7	52.8	58	72.3	55.8	55.9
Prevocational	47.6	63.7	53.4	67.2	65.8	59.5
Traditional	54.3	63	57.7	63.2	62.9	60.2

The ratio of the increase from March to June was 14.32 for the traditional, 11.94 for the prevocational, and 8.17 for the Gary school. Thus the older schools "appear to even greater advantage," comments Mr. Buckingham, "due to the fact that, in general, their improvements were made from higher initial scores."

What the Figures Show

IT should be noted in fairness, however, that neither Mr. Buckingham nor Dr. Maxwell believes that these tests are in any sense final. Yet they represent a serious attempt to arrive at an evaluation of the Gary Plan, and are sufficient to throw doubt on the claims advanced not by Mr. Wirt, but by radicals who have attached themselves to the schools. If the Gary Plan cannot turn out boys and girls as proficient in the fundamental branches, as the school of the older class, what it may have to offer in the way of manual training or "auditorium periods" is loss, not gain. The statistics gathered by Mr. Buckingham, if they do nothing else, at least bear out the contention incorporated in Dr. Maxwell's last report:

> The evidence afforded by this report is unfavorable to the defense. It shows that claims made have not, in the case of these particular schools, been substantiated. It makes clear the fact that, in matters regarded by the State as constituting essential parts of an elementary education, these schools have been unable to advance as many of their pupils within a given time as have the schools offering the regular course of study. It shows that the amount of improvement gained by each pupil does not equal the amount of improvement gained by each pupil of the regular schools. Extenuating circumstances may be urged, and rejoinders be made; but these facts will remain unchanged.

These "extenuating circumstances" have in fact, been urged, and an answer of considerable acumen was prepared by Mr. Howard Nudd of the Public Education Association. By refusing to accept examinations as a valid test, this rejoinder did not directly meet the facts alleged in the Buckingham report, but changed, rather, the ground of contention.

Present Status of the Plan

DATA on the present status of the Gary Plan in New York are not easily gathered, even on application to the Department's ever-willing Bureau of Reference and Research. On March 31 there were 798,235 children in 559 public schools in the city. Of these schools, seventeen, with an attendance of 40,852, are operating under Mr. Wirt's direction. The Research Bureau does not find "it possible to segregate from general budgetary appropriations for schools" the exact sums expended on the Gary schools, and hence the precise cost of the experiment is not known. "Independent of the budget, however, an appropriation has recently been requested for approximately $0,000,000 for new buildings and equipment, alteration and equipment of existing buildings, and additional sites, covering about forty-six schools." Oddly enough, the school authorities do not seem to know how many children are taking advantage of the religious instruction, sometimes possible under the Plan, or where these children go, or what training they receive, "when excused at the request of their parents from attendance at play or assembly periods." The Research Department informs me that since "no data are kept as to religious affiliation," the only means of ascertaining these facts would be "to take a census." I am in no position to accept the Department's suggestion, but, judging by two of the largest Gary schools in the city, I feel safe in saying that not one-half the Catholic children in these schools receive any religious instruction. The indifference of the school authorities, necessary under the law, coupled with their frequently repeated assertion that religious instruction has no essential connection with the Plan, shows how baseless are the fears of our brother of Baltimore, introduced in an opening paragraph, and of his followers.

The Suspended Judgment

THE best ground from which to view a circus poster, in order to take in with the wide angle of your eye, the tout ensemble of its mammoth expanse, is always across the street. The Gary Plan is something like that circus poster, and the critical public has not yet been able to cross the street. It is blocked by commentators and cranks. Perhaps, with our short vision focused on the lithographed clown, we have not been able to discern the beauteous equestriennes, the daring bareback riders, the marvelous fire-eaters, the death-defying acrobats, and the other attractions of the Greatest Show on Earth, depicted on the rest of the poster. The Gary Plan may or may not be a circus, consisting mainly of a $6,000,000 tent, one clown, and the New York Tribune for a "barker." One thing, however, is certain. It is not a Popish plot.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S. J.

ECONOMICS

Economic Aspects of War Finance

THE unanimous action of Congress in the passage of the gigantic $7,000,000,000 bond issue is now a matter of history. The President's signature approved the greatest single government loan ever floated. Three billions of this fund will go to the Allies as a huge credit extension to be spent in this country. To Great Britain something like $200,000,000 has been tendered. Italy, France and Belgium have likewise been participants in the enormous fund of wealth America now extends to the Allies in the struggle for the supremacy of democracy. Furthermore, the partial issue of two-and-one-half per cent Treasury Certificates to the amount of $200,000,000 has already been oversubscribed by American financiers. This augurs well for the ready disposal of the remainder. The first instalment of the "Liberty Loan of 1917" is now being offered to the people of this nation. It is everywhere recognized that duty to our country prescribes in unmistakable terms that every citizen buy government bonds in proportion to his ability. The varied sizes of denominations will facilitate their purchase, and render it possible for the poor as well as the rich to invest in these government securities.

Immediate and Future Effects

I BELIEVE that nearly all economists recognize, as do members of Congress, that this large initial bond issue is politically expedient. It would not have been practicable to introduce at once tax methods sufficient to cover the expenditures of the first year of the war. Again, loans to England and France could most easily be raised only through bond issues. As Professor Sprague of Harvard aptly remarked, a bond issue is expedient to "grease" the war machinery; to which Professor Anderson, his colleague, appends the added desirability of bonds to "get up steam."

Furthermore, this enormous war credit must have had a very valuable and powerful psychological effect upon the warring nations, on the one hand encouraging the new and probably faltering democracy in Russia, and on the other, it is hoped, producing dire consternation among the Central Powers. A recent cartoon most appropriately pictures the American Eagle with the Stars and Stripes in one talon dropping a "three billion dollar bomb" upon the heads of the Imperial German Government, with the Kaiser and his counselors scampering in the wake of the explosion.

Nevertheless, economists cannot help feeling that a series of bond issues will prove most disastrous to the ultimate best interests of America. Taxation of socially inefficient production and consumption, incomes and excess profits should be made the primary source of war revenue in the future, while bonds should only be used in a supplementary way. In giving their unanimous indorsement to taxation, economists set forth two broad, confirmatory principles; the first is moral and the second is economic and financial.

Conscript Profits and Incomes

IN the first place: conscription of profits and incomes is just as equitable as conscription of bodies and lives. For war may be defined as a social enterprise fought for the social rights of the entire social body. If a man gives one hundred per cent of his body and life, there is no valid reason why every income receiver and every income-earner remaining at home should not give one hundred per cent of his earnings above an amount necessary to maintain a sufficient standard of living. The man who buys a bond receives a promise of repayment, together with interest. The man who gives his life receives no such assurance. The Government cannot repay the life or limb the soldier in the trench may lose. If the patriotism of the man who remains at home, the farmer, the manufacturer, the worker, the income-receiver, is not sufficient to welcome any and all taxation above a living wage, needed in the prosecution of war, his lesser patriotism is thereby undeniably demonstrated.

In the second place, bond issues, no matter how raised, will cause inflation of the circulating medium, and consequently still higher price levels will prevail. Taxation will almost completely avoid all inflation. This may be discussed in detail.

Bond Issues and Rising Prices

BOND issues, under our system of deposit banking, will create purchasing power through the extension credit, where there was none before. This is virtually equivalent to a sudden increase in our supply of money, and inevitably leads to higher price levels. This is not mere theory, for the Allies' bond issues of the past two years have been an important contributing cause of the present high prices. While the intensity of demand (relativity of supply and demand) has aided to increase prices, and the present unpatriotic speculation and hysterical anxiety on the probable slight deficiency in food supply, are giving violent upward spurts to many commodities, the constantly expanding bank reserves and the consequent rapidly decreasing purchasing power are all contriving to elevate prices to levels never known before. Because of the quantitative relation of purchasing power to goods it is useless to deny that further bond issues will inevitably lead to still higher prices. Taxation, since it does not affect the amount of our circulating medium, will very largely prevent inflation.

With higher prices the expenses of the consuming public will increase in proportion to what they consume, and not according to their ability to pay. A higher price level will seriously decrease the already impaired purchasing power of the salaried and working classes. Those whose incomes are from such sources as land and capital, which supply the goods constantly rising in price under inflation, will benefit through enhanced war profits. The cost-of-living curve compiled by the New York Times Annalist stands at 275.9 for May 5, whereas a year ago the index number of the same was 168.2, taking the decade 1890-1899 as 100. This indicates an increase of sixty-four per cent in the last year alone. In the past four weeks the cost of living has mounted by 10.9 per cent. This means that a man with an average-sized family receiving an income of $1,640 is now no better off, economically, than he was last year at an income of $1,000. This is almost unbelievable, yet the index numbers in the above curve are accurately and scientifically drawn up and cover the average wholesale price of twenty-five food commodities selected and arranged to represent a theoretical family's food budget. Wages always lag behind wholesale prices on the rise. In fact, it is foolhardy to urge that wages in general have increased proportionately with rising prices.

Equitable Distribution Demanded

WHAT we want is an equitable distribution of the cost of the war among all classes of society. Taxation will distribute the burden with justice. It will tax those remaining at home; it will conscript the excess profits from war manufactures; it will put the burden upon all classes in the present generation. In contrast to this, further bond issues will but transfer the debt from certain classes within the nation in the present to certain other classes in the nation in future generations. If history serves as a reliable guide, the present purchasers of bond issues will receive interest from the Government, paid from the taxes of those returning from the war. The popular antagonism rife against the bondholders immediately following the Civil War must not be forgotten. Briefly, the masses doing the fighting in the present will largely bear the burden of repayment in the future, disproportionately to their ability to pay. Radical changes in our tax laws will, admittedly, somewhat relieve the injustice of this situation.

Taxation will increase war efficiency. Under further bond issues prices will rise. Even the Government will have to pay the higher prices for war equipment and food; this will lead to the more rapid exhaustion of bond issues already made, in turn requiring the issuance of additional bonds to constantly buy goods at constantly increasing prices. This cumulative geometrical progression can be avoided by taxation. In the words of the Committee appointed by the United States Chamber of Commerce to consider war finance: "War borrowing leads to extravagance; war taxation leads to economy." Finally, it will be easier to resume our normal civic life, enterprise and industry following the war if prices have not meanwhile suffered vertical inflation.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Catholic Dean in a Bolivian University

THE Ceylon Catholic Messenger mentions the appointment of one of the leading Catholic journalists and social workers of Madrid, Senor Don Rufino Blanco, for the important position of Dean of Philosophy and Letters at the Bolivian National University of La Paz. The Bolivian Government had petitioned the Spanish Minister to send them a man who should organize the entire course of philosophic studies in their great university. Senor Blanco was a professor at the Madrid Normal School and editor of the official Catholic organ El Universo. He is a foremost authority on matters of pedagogy.

> This appointment will go a long way in cementing Spanish-American relations, which all so eagerly desire; but it has been hailed with special enthusiasm by the Catholic press, for they know well that in the hands of such a man the philosophic and higher studies in the Republic which now at last turns for light and direction to the mother country, will receive a deep Catholic and orthodox impress, which must strongly tend to the progress of religion and order in Bolivia.

It is needless to say that the Spanish Minister who has made the appointment was not swayed by any "clerical" prepossessions.

Army Chaplains

THE circular concerning army chaplains, issued by order of Cardinal Farley, at New York, is of general interest. The document says:

> The President has been authorized by Congress to raise, by draft and by volunteer enlistments in the regular army and in the National Guard, a force of approximately 2,000,000 men. The Government provides a chaplain for each regiment on a war basis of 1,800 men. Consequently the new army will require more than 1,000 chaplains. The Catholic proportion, according to present arrangements with the War Department, is about 450 chaplains for the entire United States. Of this number New York will be required to furnish forty priests. All who are appointed chaplains in the new army will have the rank of First Lieutenants. Candidates must have the approval and recommendation of their ecclesiastical superiors, must be under forty years of age and in sound physical condition. The clergy of New York are hereby asked to volunteer for this service. Should an armed force be sent from this country to fight in France or elsewhere, it is certain that our priests would not permit our Catholic soldiers to go unattended. It is desirable therefore to have a list of those who are willing to serve, so that when the time comes, they will have official standing and recognition.

The applications are to be sent to his Eminence and formal application blanks, issued by the War Department, will then be mailed to all the approved candidates. When returned, these applications will be forwarded with a letter of recommendation to the military authorities. Appointments will be made from this list, as the work of organization progresses.

Royal First Communion of Belgian Princess

THE First Communion of the little Princess Marie José, the only daughter of the royal house of Belgium, took place within the little strip of Belgian territory still held by the Belgian army, in which Queen Elizabeth had erected a temporary orphanage for destitute Belgian children. In the humble chapel of this refuge, and in company with some of the orphan children, the little Princess received her First Communion at the hands of the Bishop of the diocese. The small space was densely crowded with orphans, officers and poilus.

> On a prie-dieu in front of the altar knelt King Albert in uniform and the Queen in plain white coat and skirt. The little princess, in traditional white dress and veil, and wearing a gold medal, knelt a little in front. She looked very lovely and very simple on this beautiful day, and at the close of the Mass, after a pious thanksgiving, in which her royal parents, who had also received Holy Communion, joined, she came forth in sunshine to greet her companions of the hours of misfortune, the staff officers of her father's entourage, the ladies of the Queen's tiny household, and then busied herself the rest of the day with the orphans.

The little Princess had made the journey to Belgium from her English convent school that she might here, in her own native land, receive for the first time her Divine King in the Holy Sacrament. Her two brothers were both present at this event.

Award Offered for Catholic Historical Essay

AN earnest effort is being made by the United States Catholic Historical Society to interest Catholic students in research work along national and Catholic lines. For this purpose a circular has been addressed by the Society to the various Catholic colleges, offering a prize of $100 in gold for the best essay on any one of the following topics:

> (1) The Centenary of Illinois (December 30, 1918): Catholic Landmarks and Achievements, Past and Present, in the State. (2) Catholic Social Service as Illustrated by the Creightons of Omaha, the Mullanphies of St. Louis, Margaret Haughery of New Orleans, Carney of Boston, Heeney and the Parmentiers of New York, the Drexels of Philadelphia, and the Founders of Benevolent Institutions elsewhere. (3) The "Marcus Whitman Myth" and the Missionary History of Oregon.

The following are the conditions governing the contest:

> (1) Every contestant must be certified by the faculty as a student in a course in a Catholic college. (2) The MS., which must be typewritten, is to contain no fewer than 2,500 words and may not exceed 5,000 words. It must be received at the office of the United States Catholic Historical Society, 346 Convent Avenue, New York, before November 1, 1917. (3) The papers will be passed on by the Editing Committee of the Historical Society, and the final award will be made by a special committee composed of the Rev. R. H. Tierney, S.J., Editor of AMERICA; Dr. Condé B. Pallen, Managing Editor of the "Catholic Encyclopedia," and Thomas F. Woodlock, Esq.

The successful essay is to be published in the Society's Records and Studies. Thus an excellent opportunity is afforded the faculties of our Catholic colleges to encourage the important work of Catholic historical study.

Rogation Days

BISHOP McDONNELL, in a special pastoral letter, directed the attention of the clergy and people of the Brooklyn diocese to the recent Rogation Days and their application to our present conditions. This period of stress brings home to us more than ever the wisdom and forethought of the Church in instituting these days of universal supplication, intended to call down God's mercy upon a world that has greatly offended Him and to avert the merited punishment, which for nations and peoples is likely to find its expression in such disasters as are now overwhelming the earth. They are likewise instituted to obtain the bounty of an abundant harvest, which is always to be desired, but is most urgently needed now. After specifying the prayers to be recited, the episcopal letter continued:

> We order these prayers that the Lord, hearkening to the cries of His people, may in His mercy bless our fields and farms and grant us an abundant harvest, and bestow on our country, in His own good time, a happy ending of the war, and the blessing of an enduring peace. We beg you to exhort our people to be mindful of the words of the Sunday's Epistle, "Be ye doers of the word, not hearers only," that their faith may be reflected in their daily lives and their supplications be more acceptable to the Most High.

The Rogation Days of the Church are April 25, called Major; and the three days preceding the Feast of the Ascension, called Minor. The former dates back to the very earliest years of Christianity and was the date set by the pagans for special worship of their idols, in atonement for which the Christians sent up their own supplications to the Throne of the one true God and Father of all. The later Rogation Days were first introduced into the Catholic Church in the year 511, at Vienne, by St. Mamertus, though an even earlier origin has been assigned to them by some historians.

The Wonder-Worker of Padua

CLIENTS of St. Anthony will be delighted with the following beautiful episode from the life of the late Austrian Emperor Francis Joseph quoted by Father Hull in the Bombay Examiner and taken originally from the English Universe. The incident is said to have been related by the Emperor himself. The son of a poor woman had been condemned to death for some crime he had committed, and the mother in her great affliction went about seeking the signatures of all the influential people in her district to obtain a reprieve. The task was completed late in the evening before the day set for the execution, but when she presented herself, tired and footsore, at the palace gate the monarch had retired to rest.

> In her despair she went to the village church, and, after praying long and earnestly before the altar of St. Anthony of Padua, she placed the petition upon the altar and returned to her humble abode. In the morning, however, she ascertained that the Emperor had, during the night, signed the doomed man's reprieve. She got access to his Majesty, and he then told her that a monk from the neighboring monastery had, just before midnight, gained access to his chamber and presented the petition, which he signed. The poor woman, quite at a loss to understand to whom she was indebted, told the monarch her experiences, and he became as interested as herself. Ordering a horse to be saddled, the Emperor rode to the monastery and asked the Prior to explain how it was a monk had been sent to disturb him at such a late hour the previous night. The Prior assured the Emperor that no one from the monastery had either gone or been sent to the palace, and, to prove that what he said was true, he had all the monks called from their cells and brought before His Majesty, who interviewed each of them in turn, but failed to identify his mysterious visitor of the previous night. Before leaving, however, the Prior escorted his august guest over the building, when, on entering the chapel, the Emperor suddenly looked at a large oil painting over an altar, and, intently gazing at it, asked who it was, as it much resembled some one he had recently seen. The Prior said: "Your Majesty must be mistaken, for that monk left this monastery many years ago. It is St. Anthony of Padua." Then said the Emperor, "That is the monk who was my visitor last evening!"

This is but one of the countless little incidents woven like a flowery wreath about devotion to St. Anthony. The popular trust in his gentle intercession at the Throne of God is founded upon more than sentiment.

Who's Who

REV. FRANCIS JAMES FINN, S.J., who contributes "Laurie Blakely, an Old-Fashioned Journalist," to this issue of AMERICA, was born in St. Louis, October 4, 1859, educated in St. Louis University and Woodstock College, Woodstock, Md., author of some twelve or fifteen books for boys, including "Claude Lightfoot," "Harry Dee," "Tom Playfair"; contributor to Benziger's Magazine, the Messenger, AMERICA, etc., etc.

MRS. HANNA SHEEHY-SKEFFINGTON, author of "What Does Ireland Want?" in this issue of AMERICA, is the daughter of David Sheehy, M.P. for North Meath, born in Cork of an old County Limerick family. Rev. Eugene Sheehy, her uncle, is a priest famous for forty years in Irish National affairs, who was imprisoned in Land League days and was sent to attend Land League Conventions in America. Bishop O'Dwyer of Limerick, now the most popular man in Ireland, is a cousin. She was graduated from University College, Dublin (B.A.) and completed her studies in Belgium and Germany; met at college, Francis Skeffington, who was graduated about the same time; on their marriage he changed his name to Sheehy-Skeffington. The latter was a pacifist, greatly interested in labor, suffrage and economic problems and strongly in favor of national independence. During the insurrection of Easter Week, while working to keep order and to organize a volunteer police force, when the Dublin Metropolitan Police withdrew to their barracks, he was arrested by Captain Colthurst, marched around as a hostage and then shot without trial. A sister of Mrs. Skeffington was married to Thomas Kettle and another to Mr. Culhome. The three sisters were widowed within a year. After the insurrection, when Mr. Asquith came to Dublin, he tried, in a personal interview with Mrs. Skeffington, to get her to accept compensation for the death of her husband. She refused to accept his offer in any way and succeeded in eluding the officers of the Government and reaching this country with her son, Owen, seven years of age. She has appeared before the public over much of the country and told the story of conditions in Ireland, in a manner that has been most effective because of her extraordinary power of restraint, as well as her ability and power of exposition as a speaker. Because of her environment, her education and her personal experiences she is singularly well qualified to speak on present-day problems and conditions in Ireland. (Communicated.)

Chronicle

The War.—During the past week in France there has been a lull in the fighting on the British front, the intermittent engagements which have taken place north of Bullecourt have not materially affected the battle line. In the Ailette Valley, the French have made repeated but unsuccessful attempts to advance on the Vauclerc Plateau, west of Craonne; further east they won a series of minor successes in the vicinity of Moronvilliers, where they have taken all except one of the crests of the Moronvilliers range, including the heights of Carnillet, Blond, Haut, San Nom, Casque and Teton. The victory is of importance in this sense that it gives the French possession of points of observation which dominate the territory north of their lines.

Bulletin, May 21, p.m.-May 28, a.m.

The most notable advance of the week has been that made by the Italians on the Carso Plateau, north of Triest. Shifting their offensive from the line between Tolmino and Goritz, as soon as they had secured the ground recently won, the Italians made a vigorous attack on a broad front from Castagnavizza to the Adriatic at a point a little northeast of Duino. Their offensive broke through the strong positions held by the Austrians throughout the line of attack, carried them beyond Boscomalo and Jamiano and resulted in the capture of Hill 92, east of Pietra Rossa, of Hills 77, 58 and 21, east and southeast of Monfalcone, and of the town of Bagni, a half-mile from the sea. Later they increased the gains by storming Hills 235 and 347, north of Jamiano, and by forcing back the Austrians to a line a mile and a half north of Duino; subsequent attacks gave them possession of Hill 220, southeast of Boscomalo, and of the heights between Flondar and Medeazza.

Although their most important gains were all made south of Goritz, they have also made progress north of the city, where they have advanced on the northwestern slopes of San Marco, on Monte Santo, and especially on the highest peak of the Vodice ridge where they have captured Hill 652. To offset this offensive the Austrians have taken the offensive in the Trentino, but without notable success.

Discussion by the conferees on the divergent elements of the Senate and House drafts of the Espionage bill has resulted in agreement on the export embargo and search-warrant sections and on the section penalizing interference with foreign commerce. No progress, however, has been made towards framing a censorship measure that has any clear likelihood of passing.

The Espionage Bill

Republicans in the House are practically unanimous in their determination to oppose the measure in any form should it again be referred to the House; in the Senate, although there is a possibility that three Senators who voted against the censorship section may vote for it, the majority are apparently more fixed in their opposition than before. The President in the hope of forcing its passage addressed a letter to Mr. Webb, Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, in which he said in part:

> I have every confidence that the great majority of the newspapers of the country will observe a patriotic reticence about everything whose publication could be of injury, but in every country there are some persons in a position to do mischief in this field who cannot be relied upon and whose interests or desires will lead to actions on their part highly dangerous to the nation in the midst of war. I want to say again that it seems to me imperative that powers of this sort should be granted.

Attorney-General Gregory made an official declaration supporting the President's view, in which he said that the Department of Justice is still of the opinion that it is necessary to confer on the President authority to exercise censorship of the press along the lines indicated in the Gregory draft of the censorship section. Despite these communications opposition to the measure has grown rather than diminished. The conferees suggested the following tentative form of the censorship section:

> When the United States is at war the publishing wilfully of information with respect to the movement, numbers, equipment, description or disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States naval or military operations or with respect to any of the works intended for the fortifications or defense of any place, which information is or may be useful to the enemy, is hereby prohibited; and the President may from time to time by proclamation declare the character of such above described information, which is or may be useful to the enemy, and in any prosecution hereunder, the jury trying the case shall determine not only whether the defendant did wilfully publish such information as set out in the indictment, but also whether such information was of such character as was or might have been useful to the enemy; provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

Whoever violates this section shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years or both.

A canvass of the Senate indicated that the majority of that body regarded this form of censorship as more reactionary and drastic and objectionable than the forms already rejected. Accordingly it was remodeled by the conferees so as to include merely censorship of information which is useful to the enemy, and to omit any reference to information which may be useful to the enemy.

Even in this modified form, the Senate appears to be irrevocably opposed to it. The attitude of the majority was thus expressed by Senator Reed of Missouri:

On this question of censorship I have not abated my former position in the slightest respect. In going into this war the position of America requires no such undemocratic restrictions upon the freedom of action of the American people. There is nothing in the political situation, the military situation or the geographical location of the United States of America which in any wise warrants restriction of the freedom of the press. America should take part in this war untrammeled, unshackled, unbound. America is in the war to fight with the instrumentalities of a free people enlisted on the side of the freedom of all the peoples. She should not be expected to do her best with her limbs fettered or her ears sealed, or her eyes blindfolded or her mouth gagged. The Government of the United States can trust the people of the United States, and the press of the United States is the voice of the people of America. I have seen nothing in the past few days to make evident to any one that the reiteration of the pleading for the gagging of the American press is making the slightest headway.

From present indications it would appear that the passage of the Espionage bill will be delayed until the censorship section is omitted.

The War Revenue Bill

The War Revenue bill on May 23 after two weeks of discussion finally passed the House by a vote of 329 to 76. It carries with it the authorization of the House to levy additional taxes on the country to the extent of $1,870,000,000, and has thus added $70,000,000 to the sum asked for by the Ways and Means Committee. Before the final vote was taken, a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee for further revision failed to pass, although 161 votes were cast for it. The bill in the form in which it received the approval of the House is practically the same as that reported by the Ways and Means Committee. The important changes are the amendment proposed by Mr. Lenroot which increases the income-tax schedule by the sum of $60,000,000, and the amendment proposed by the Ways and Means Committee which slightly reduces the tax on second-class mail matter, contained in the original draft of the bill, and substitutes for it the parcel-post rate.

After having passed the House, the bill was taken up by the Senate Committee on Finance, and from the results of the deliberations of that body, already published, it is clear that the bill will undergo drastic revision before it comes before the Senate. The Committee, it is said, regards the House bill as unscientific in many of its provisions and likely to injure business in a very serious way. The gross sum to be raised by the Revenue War bill will be considerably reduced, although the amount of the reduction has not yet been decided. The Committee has refused to incorporate in the Senate draft of the bill the retroactive tax on 1916 incomes and the surtaxes provided for in the Lenroot amendment, also the five-per-cent tax on manufacturers' gross sales. It is said that the increased second-class mail rates also are to be eliminated, and that for the House's schedule for excess-profits taxes on profits of over eight per cent on invested capital there will be substituted an excess-profits tax based on average profits for a period of years, not more than five.

Registration on June 5

Instructions published by the Government make it clear that every male resident, except those specifically excluded in the President's proclamation, if he be between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-one, must register on June 5, and on that day alone, in person, by letter or by agent. The only exceptions are:

Persons in the military or naval service of the United States, which includes all officers and enlisted men of the regular army, the regular army reserve, the officers' reserve corps, the enlisted reserve corps, the National Guard and National Guard reserve, recognized by the Militia Bureau of the War Department; the navy, the marine corps, the coast guard and the naval militia, the naval reserve force, the marine corps reserve and the national naval volunteers, recognized by the Navy Department.

The obligation of registration, failure to comply with which is a misdemeanor liable to punishment of one year's imprisonment, applies to all residents between the ages specified, not only to citizens but to all aliens, whether they belong to a friendly or enemy nation; to those already enlisted in the war under a foreign flag but now on furlough in the United States; and to all those who have a claim to exemption according to the provisions of the Army bill or who believe that they have a claim to exemption on grounds not included in the Army bill. According to the Memorandum issued by the War Department, "Registration is distinct from draft. No matter what just claim you have for exemption, you must register." One of the twelve questions on the registration blank is as follows: "Do you claim exemption from draft? Specify grounds." The New York American, which has been officially designated as a guide for war registration, gives the following directions for answering this question:

Because you claim exemption from draft, it by no means follows that you are exempt. For the information of the War Department you should make a claim now if you intend to prosecute it. Some persons will be exempted on account of their occupations or offices, some on account of the fact that they have relatives dependent upon them for support. Your answer touching these things will be important in supporting the claim you now intend to make in your answer to the present questions. Be sure, therefore, that the grounds you now state are in conformity with your answers to questions 7 and 8. In stating grounds you claim as exempting you, use one of the following terms: If you claim to be an executive, legislative, or judicial officer of the State or nation, name your office and say whether it is an office of the State or nation. If you claim to be a member of a religious sect whose creed forbids its members to participate in war in any form, simply name the sect. If you are employed in the transmission of the United States mails or as artificer or workman in an armory, arsenal or navy yard of the United States, or if you are a mariner employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States, so state. If you are a felon or otherwise morally deficient and desire to claim exemption on that ground, state your ground briefly. If you claim physical disability, state that briefly. If you claim exemption on any other ground, state your ground briefly.

Registration will consist in answering twelve questions put to the person registering by the Registrar, who will duly record them in ink on a card provided for the purpose: (1) Name in full? Age in years? (2) Home address? (3) Date of birth? (4) Are you a natural-born citizen; a naturalized citizen; an alien; or have you declared your intention to become a citizen (specify which)? (5) Where were you born? (6) If not a citizen, of what country are you a citizen or subject? (7) What is your present trade, occupation or office? (8) By whom employed? Where employed? (9) Have you a father, mother, wife, child under twelve, or a sister or brother under twelve solely dependent upon you for support (specify which)? (10) Married or single (which)? Race (specify which)? (11) What military service have you had? Rank? Branch? Years? Nation or State? (12) Do you claim exemption from draft? Specify grounds.

France.—The question of the resumption of diplomatic relations between the French Republic and the Vatican has again been discussed in a way that has caused something like a ripple of excitement in political circles. Catholics are not the only ones to deplore the absence of an official representative of France with the Holy See. The number of Protestants, anti-clericals and free-thinkers who recognize the political blunder made by the Government in ignoring the existence of the Pope is rapidly increasing. Recently the Journal des Débats and L'Oeuvre published three articles written by two stanch Republicans, who have never been suspected of "clericalism," M. Pichon, formerly Minister of Foreign Affairs, and M. Lazare Weiller. Both publicists boldly demand that official diplomatic relations with the Vatican be resumed. They discuss the question from a purely "national" point of view, and maintain that France's long abstention from a diplomatic "center of the very highest order" has been extremely prejudicial to the real interests of the country. The Vatican, they write, is at all times something like a general clearing-house where the best interests of the world are studied and fostered. It is much more so now, in the crisis of the great war. Viewing the problems which France will have to settle after the struggle, especially in the East, where formerly the Holy See had officially conferred upon France the guardianship of the Christian missions, the writers hold that it will be absolutely necessary that France should have a representative with the Holy Father. To the objection that the Italian Government might oppose the plan, Mr. Weiller answers that Italy has always allowed her allies the greatest liberty in this respect, and that even were it to object, which he does not think probable, France should nevertheless take a step so conducive to her welfare.

The Government and the Vatican

Ireland.—On May 21 it was announced by Premier Lloyd George in the House of Commons that the Government proposed to summon immediately a convention of representative Irishmen in Ireland to frame and then submit to the British Parliament a constitution for the future government of Ireland. The Chairman of this convention, the Premier announced, would be nominated by the Crown.

The Proposed Convention

According to the statement of the Premier, if a substantial agreeement is reached regarding the character and scope of the Constitution, the Government will take the necessary steps to enable the Imperial Parliament to give legislative effect thereto. The convention, he said, would be representative of the local governing bodies, the churches, the trade unions, the commercial and industrial interests. It would be held behind closed doors and would include delegates from the Sinn Feiners, the two Nationalist parties, the Ulster Unionists and the Southern Unionists. The representatives would be chosen by the respective bodies. Proposals for the settlement of the Irish question, added the Premier, had hitherto emanated from the British Government and so far had not met with success. The Government proposed that Ireland should now try her own hand at framing a plan. This method had succeeded, he declared, in Canada, Australia and South Africa, and he could not help thinking that what had succeeded there could be achieved in Ireland. The Premier made it clear that the parties entering the convention would be pledged to no conclusion, but every man who participated would be pledged to do his best to settle the controversy. No proposal would be shut out from consideration. If some substantial agreement should be reached as to the character and scope of the Constitution to be framed for the future government of Ireland within the Empire, the Government would accept the responsibility for taking the necessary steps to make it possible to give legislative effect to the conclusions of the convention.

Mr. John Redmond, the Nationalist leader, said in reply that for the first time in her history Ireland had been asked virtually to settle a problem for herself, and that he felt sure that all sections of Irishmen realized it was their duty to "come in." Four unsuccessful attempts, said Mr. Redmond, had been made by three successive governments to reach a settlement, but the present proposal was entirely novel. Ireland was being asked herself to draft her Constitution. That proposal carried with it the implied obligation that Great Britain would be only too glad to accept the decisions arrived at. He added that they must not shrink from a compromise and if they would attain a substantial agreement it would be worth all the heart-burnings and postponements of the last thirty or forty years. He agreed with the Premier that the convention should be absolutely free and representative of all classes and sections of the country, the county councils, trade unions, the churches, the teaching profession, the Irish peers, and the different political parties. He was willing to agree to a limited representation of the Irish Nationalist party, an equally large representation of the Ulster party, and a generous representation of Sinn Feiners.

While warning the Government that there would be grave difficulties in the selection of the members of the convention, Mr. William O'Brien, leader of the Independent Nationalists, expressed satisfaction at the move, because it showed that the Government had begun to find out that the only way to deal with the Irish difficulty was by conference, conciliation and consent. Sir John Lonsdale, Secretary and whip of the Irish Unionist party, asserted that it was not a compromise that the Nationalists wanted, but a surrender on the part of Ulster. Ulster, he said, would not be coerced into Home Rule by Parliament. He added, however, that the Ulster party would submit the proposal to the people of Ulster and recommend its careful consideration. Mr. Asquith heartily commended the Government's proposal. Sir Edward Carson, leader of the Irish Unionists, said that he found no reason to modify his belief that the best solution of the Irish difficulty lay in the maintenance of the Union, but gave his support to the plan, under the condition that all the delegates should enter the convention perfectly free, without stipulated conditions; otherwise he would not be a party to it. While the proposed convention has been well accepted by both divisions of the Nationalist party and by the Southern Unionists, the Sinn Feiners unanimously resolved on May 24 to decline to participate in any conference unless the following conditions were fulfilled: That the terms referring the question to the conference leave it free to decree the complete independence of Ireland; that the English Government publicly pledge itself to the United States and the powers of Europe to ratify the decision of the majority of the conference; that the convention consist of none but persons freely elected by the adult suffrage of Ireland; that "prisoner-of-war treatment" be accorded the Irish prisoners arrested during the recent revolution.

Mexico.—There is little news from Mexico these days: Carranza, the apostle of liberty in thought and action, is in the saddle and the censorship is so rigid that practically the only items which escape the vigilant eyes of the officials, concern the virtues of the First Chief. On March 15, a few days after the Mexican elections, the Diario de la Marina of Havana printed this interesting story:

Marvelous Mexico

For the benefit of those who labor under the impression that there is nothing but slaughter, misery and a return to barbarism (in Mexico), it will be well to call attention to the portentous elections which were held in that country on Sunday, the eleventh of this month (March). The voting booths closed at six in the evening of Sunday and by eight o'clock that same day the votes had been counted and the whole world had been informed that the election was unanimous for the First Chief, who had obtained considerably more than 1,500,000 votes. It must be borne in mind that twenty-four of the twenty-seven Mexican States are aflame with revolt, that the railways are destroyed, so much so that there is scarcely any traffic between Vera Cruz and Mexico City, that the telegraph wires are cut and the postal service paralyzed, that eighty-five per cent of the population is illiterate, that for the last two years constitutionalism has not existed and an anarchical military despotism has taken its place, that the period for the electoral contest was exceedingly short, all this must be kept in mind, then it will become evident that an amazing result has been attained and it amounts to this: fifteen per cent of the whole population went to the ballot, a proportion rarely obtained in the most advanced counries.

Wonderful beyond compare must be an electoral system so simple and so perfect that only a few minutes are needed for counting and recording the votes in a country eighteen times larger than Cuba and having no means of communication. No less wonderful must be the devotion the Mexican people professes for its leader and apostle Don Venustiano Carranza. We need nothing else to show how much more advanced Mexico is than the United States, to mention no other country. In the United States a fortnight after the elections the exact result was still in doubt, while in Cuba even now it is impossible to affirm anything with certainty after four months and a half. In Cuba and the United States, despite the unprecedented prosperity of both, opinions differed widely regarding the two candidates, whereas in Mexico, the surpassing and unheard-of qualities of Don Venustiano drew the people into an unanimity witnessed only during the "nefarious" dictatorship of General Diaz. All this nevertheless is as nothing compared to the incident I am about to relate and to submit for the consideration and study of politicians and rulers of America, as they may learn therefrom what true democracy means and how to solve the most abstruse problems of suffrage in countries which like Mexico are blessed with numerous apostles active in militant politics. This is the stupendous case. In the city of Havana lives a friend of Don Venustiano Carranza. He is a Mexican citizen and a good merchant with a place of business not many doors removed from the Diario de la Marina. This man has had his trunks packed for some time to be in readiness to leave for Mexico, to take his seat in Carranza's coming Congress. This gentleman got ready to depart plenty of time ahead, because for the last three months he has carried in his pocket his nomination as Congressman voted at the election on April 11. To be elected long before the elections! There is one of the prodigies of freedom-giving, people-redeeming revolutions!

These same facts can be related of others besides Congressmen.

The Emancipation of the Spirit

J. D. Tibbits

FEW historical events have undergone more radical changes, in the view of the modern world, than the Protestant Reformation. It is now generally understood except by those professionally interested, that whatever motives lay behind this movement, they were distinctly secular rather than religious. Its effect upon art and literature, as well as upon civilization in general, has been found, to say the least, not specially favorable; and there is more than a growing suspicion that its economic effects have been even worse. There are many, however, who still look upon it and upon its leaders with considerable pride; for whatever may have been its failures, it has yet scored, in their opinion one very important success. To use their own expression, it has, "emancipated the human spirit," and to that emancipation much subsequent material progress, and practically all theological progress must be traced.

Now this very idea of emancipation, though not a little vague, appeals to a great multitude of people, chiefly for the reason that it suggests deliverance from authority, and hence freedom from restraint. With the significance of this effect of the Reformation on secular matters I am not at all concerned; but as regards theology it means nothing less than the transference of all external authority to ourselves. By virtue of it, therefore, each man becomes the measure of his own religion; and the difference between religious truth and religious error, finally turns out to be the difference between favorable and unfavorable impressions.

All this was not a little obscured in the older Protestantism, which for many years sought to misplace the authority it had overthrown. It remained for the so-called new theology of our own day to bring it into high relief, and to attempt the curious experiment of formulating a scheme of Christianity wholly and unreservedly subjective.

This attempt would be of little interest to anyone other than to the new theologians themselves were it not for the claim so persistently made by them that it represents the last word of rationalism in religion. It is to test this rationalism that I propose to offer three illustrations, drawn from their own writers, of the methods the new theologians employ in dealing with the problem. These illustrations are not arbitrarily chosen, for to the problem, as they propound it, there are three principal avenues of approach. The first has regard to the person of Christ, the second to the primitive Church, the third to the Christian message. It must be understood that the professed aim of these new theologians is to go back to the most primitive facts, as regards all three, and thus to pierce through the mists of corruption which they believe have encircled the Church of all ages. In doing this they use, as do all Christians, the historical sources which remain to us; but they supplement these sources with a so-called "science" of criticism quite their own. My illustrations will show how this is done; and though they will be brief, they will be none the less typical of the method employed by the entire school.

The approach to the personality of Christ is well illustrated by the late Dr. James D. Martineau, in his learned work entitled "Seat of Authority in Religion." He is applying himself to the somewhat difficult task of separating what he conceives to be the respectively true and false elements in the Gospels. His method is summed up in three rules of interpretation. It will be sufficient for my purpose to quote the third.

> Acts and words ascribed to Jesus which plainly transcend the moral level of the narrators, authenticate themselves as His; while such as are out of character with His spirit, but congruous with theirs, must be referred to inaccurate tradition.

Now we have only to bear in mind the very claim of Dr. Martineau, that the Gospels are anonymous human products of comparatively late date, and we can see at once the impossibility of separating, with any approach to certitude, the personality of Christ from the personality of the narrator. Were there an admittedly original work of Christ, and another, say, of St. Matthew, it would be comparatively easy to recognize the traces of each, which might appear in a third. Dr. Martineau's own views of the Scriptures vitiate his method. His rule of interpretation is a rule for finding himself rather than Christ, and all the erudition with which he enriches his bulky volume is simply an amplification of his original error. As a method of justifying his impressions it is curiously interesting; that he should transcend these impressions is made impossible by the very conditions which he himself imposes. The value of his rule lies in the fact that it is a complete illustration of the workings of an emancipated theology. The personality of Christ is measured by the personality of the theologian.

A typical example of the manner in which the thinkers of this school approach the problem of primitive Christianity, is supplied by Professor A. C. McGiffert in his work entitled "The Apostolic Age." The professor is maintaining the somewhat gratuitous theory that the Apostles occupied no official position in the early Church. "They apparently held," he says, "no official position in the Church of Jerusalem, and were not regarded as in any way entrusted with its government or empowered to exercise authority within it." Later on, when confronted with the account in the Acts of the Apostles about the sending of St. Peter and St. John into Samaria, he remarks:

> That Peter and John actually visited Samaria, there is no occasion to doubt, but the idea that they were sent from Jerusalem by the apostles as an official delegation to organize the Samaritans into a church, or to give their Christianity the sanction of their approval, and thus complete the work of Philip, betrays the conception of a later age.

Now whatever the motives of the Apostles may have been, in sending, as recorded in the eighth chapter of the Acts, St. Peter and St. John into Samaria, is quite beside the point, but the ascription of the obvious meaning of a text to the conception of a later age, simply because it fails to accord with his own preconceptions, shows conclusively the extent to which Dr. McGiffert is prepared to read himself into history. He admits in the first paragraph above quoted that, "It is not easy to discover just what significance attached to the Apostles in these early days." How then, it might be asked, can he distinguish between earlier and later conceptions if, as he himself admits, the sources are almost, if not wholly silent, as to those which were earlier? In order to make a valid distinction we should surely have a standard of each; and in the absence of such standards the distinction is clearly invalid. As a revelation of Dr. McGiffert's viewpoint it is interesting enough; and it is even more interesting as bearing testimony to the method of emancipated historians. The facts of history are to be measured by their prepossessions.

The conception of the message of Christ, according to the new theology, is concisely illustrated by an article contributed to the Outlook some three years ago by Dr. Lyman Abbott, upon which I then commented in these pages. The doctor was publishing a series of "Letters to Unknown Friends." One of these unknown friends wrote as follows:

> The carpenter applies his square, the mason his plumb bob, the mariner his compass, each to the problem in hand, and confidently relies on the result. Where is the touchstone that I can apply when I find myself in sincere doubt whether a certain article of faith is in accordance with truth or error?

To this the editor replied in part:

> There is no absolute criterion, no carpenter's square, no plumb bob, no compass by which the result we have reached will be exactly and absolutely determined. Truth is infinite, man is finite, and we can never reach a final conclusion.

This somewhat startling theory, denying at once not only the power of man to receive but also the power of God to impart a revelation of definite truth, raises at once the question as to what the real value of religion is. Dr. Abbott apparently finds it in the impetus which it gives to speculation, and of that view he offers this illustration:

> A boy with an adding-machine can get an exact result more certainly than he can get it by doing the sum in addition himself. But by doing the sum in addition himself he gets a capacity to think mathematically, which the adding-machine can never confer upon him.

If one were to take Dr. Abbott seriously and subject his view of religion to even a cursory analysis, it would be found that the conception of the Christian message therein contained is simply a scheme for the encouragement of speculation. Now no one denies that speculation is valuable in its place; but most men who speculate do so in the hope of gaining results. But results, in the doctor's own views, are what we can never reach. The process, and not the product, is the important thing; and it was to encourage the process, while subtracting all possibility of arriving at the product, that Christ lived and died. This is the conception of religion which is put forward by the new theologians in the name of reason. Those who reject it are called "reactionaries," and the religious bodies whom it has failed to affect are somewhat contemptuously called "stationary." If this is "progress," there is at least some reason in standing still. If it is "emancipation," there is some virtue in bondage. It is little wonder that Mr. Sunday is called upon to rescue a declining Protestantism from a rationalism which is as misnamed as it is misplaced.

"What Does Ireland Want?"

HANNA SHEEHY-SKEFFINGTON, M.A.

IN his article under the above title in AMERICA for April 28, Mr. Shane Leslie pleads for colonial Home Rule, "a workaday gift of autonomy based on the free dominions in the Empire," as the ideal solution for Ireland, setting aside as "extreme" the other schemes, an Irish republic on the one hand, and coercion on the other. He is an able exponent of the case for moderation. While admiring his great qualities and admitting that his scheme has possibilities—it is better than coercion—may I be permitted to put the case for Ireland's independence? I have the advantage of a more recent and intimate knowledge of present conditions in Ireland, impossible to one who knows of the Irish rising and its sequel only through foreign sources.

Ireland, like Russia, is a country of surprises. In '48, after the abortive rising, Charles Gavan Duffy left Ireland "a corpse on the dissection table," yet in '67 there was a resurrection in the Fenian movement. W. B. Yeats declared in our own day: "Romantic Ireland's dead and gone. 'Tis with O'Leary in his grave," he sang, referring to the death of the great Fenian veteran. A fortnight before the uprising last Easter, George Bernard Shaw wrote, deprecating Irish Nationalism, saying with a cynical shrug, that no one bothered nowadays about a "little green pocket-handkerchief" of a country. Yet, almost before the type was dry, the Irish Volunteers had seized Dublin, hoisted the Irish tricolor over Dublin Castle and managed to hold the capital for a week; and it took 40,000 British soldiers to dislodge them. As a result of the uprising, Ireland, even Belfast, is now governed by martial law under a military governor with an army of occupation estimated as three times the size of the Canadian standing army. Moreover, Great Britain has considered the rising of such magnitude that, exclusive of military murders, she found it necessary to execute sixteen Volunteer leaders, to condemn to penal servitude 136 men and one woman, to deport about 6,000 men and several hundred women. If all these steps were necessary for the "defense of the Realm," it is clear that one must not minimize the strength and power of the Irish Republican party, or pass over as negligible the arguments in favor of the Separatist solution. It was the tragic mistake of Mr. Redmond and the Irish party to ignore this important factor in Ireland; a disaster to constitutionalism has been the result.

Mr. Leslie deprecates revenge. True, "Vengeance belongeth to the Lord." It is regrettable that the principle is not regarded as practical politics by all governments, for if it were, we should all be at peace. Logical Irishmen do not see why the wrongs of Belgium should alone be worth dying for, and why the doctrines of liberty for small nations should stop short at the Irish Sea. Mr. Leslie also says that "Republics are for countries like Russia and France which have discovered the art of putting up successful revolutions." In other words he favors the principle of revolution. One must remember, however, first, that Russia and France finally succeeded in establishing republics after repeated failures and, secondly, that, judged by the standard of success, Belgium, Serbia, Rumania and Poland, nay, even Alsace, have forfeited their right to independence, for they all have been overcome by greater force, yet the world is in arms for their right to independence.

Laying aside, therefore, mere word-weaving and sophistry there remain logically but two solutions of Ireland's grievance, government by force, the present solution, or government by consent within or without the British Empire. There are supporters of all three solutions and it would be idle and futile to wait until there is perfect agreement among all, for that will never be. In the end that party will triumph that can enforce by arms or by methods of peaceful persuasion its special panacea.

The first method, government by militarism is that favored by the ascendancy or Tory party. It was employed by Mr. Arthur Balfour during his régime in Ireland in the eighties when his method during riots and evictions was crystallized in the famous telegram sent to the police of Mitchelstown: "Don't hesitate to shoot." That method was employed last Easter to put down the Irish Volunteers and it is the method by which Ireland is now governed. It has the merit of logic and extreme simplicity and has always commended itself on that account to the military caste. Its rule of government is: "Shoot—after a trial, if you must, but shoot, anyhow—imprison, deport all inconvenient critics, buy the others. Make a solitude and call it peace."

As to government by consent within the Empire, it is the solution favored by Mr. Leslie and by supporters of the Irish party. The difficulty with the present generation in Ireland is that the scheme is now passé. To mention Home Rule in Ireland at a Nationalist gathering is to be greeted with derisive laughter. The Home Rule act now on the statute book is recognized by the Irish party itself as inadequate and unsatisfactory. It is unacceptable to the people of Ireland, for it creates an Irish parliament entirely subservient to Great Britain. By its provisions we are unable to levy taxes, to impose a protective tariff. We have no control over customs or excise, over our police, army or navy, and Great Britain maintains her right of final veto on measures passed by the Irish Parliament. Yet, even this restricted and purely local government measure Great Britain, bullied by Sir Edward Carson's swash-buckling threats of "civil war" in Ulster, refused to pass into law. And now the Irish party itself tacitly rejects the act and asks for more, realizing that England's difficulty is Ireland's opportunity. But even colonial Home Rule, based on the government of Canada and Australia will not satisfy modern Ireland. Gladstone wisely declared that "No government, however good, can be a substitute for self-government." Thirty years ago Ireland might have accepted a Home Rule parliament under England as an instalment, though even then Parnell wisely said that it could not be regarded as a final solution, for "No man can set bounds upon the onward march of a nation."

In times of peaceful development and natural slow evolution toward better government such a solution might have worked happily. But a war that is changing the entire map of Europe, leaving its altering mark on all the Governments of the world and shaking empires and dynasties out of their ruts, will not leave Ireland unchanged. When the fate of other small nations is being decided, the fate of Ireland too must be considered. Ireland from being a national problem is now international, and it is unlikely that America, entering this war as she states "for the democratization of Europe," will jeopardize her own honor and the future peace of the world by closing her ears to the voice of Ireland pleading among the small nations for her independence. Hence it becomes important for America to know what Ireland wants so that there be no mistake about the final settlement. It is the policy of Great Britain to regard Ireland's case as a "domestic" grievance, and accordingly some attempt at a patched-up "settlement" will likely be put forward. Such a solution even on the lines of "colonial Home Rule" will not, however, satisfy the Irish people. Their demand at the Peace Conference will be for complete and absolute independence. There can be no tinkering with a demand based on the principle of nationhood; anything that falls short of this is neither freedom nor true democracy.

The Irish Separatist or Republican party is not a party of "dynamiters" relying upon "outrages" and methods of terrorism to enforce their views. The only "outrages" committed during the Irish Rising of Easter week were those perpetrated by the British militarists, the only assassins those of Irish editors, of unarmed civilians and disarmed prisoners were the so-called upholders of "law and order."

Ireland recognizes that complete independence is the only policy that will give her self-respect and abiding peace, that any system that unites her even by the slightest thread to the "predominant partner" will never be administered for her own good, where interests clash, but only for the good of the Empire whose subject she remains. She will continue to be but a pawn in the game, a land exploited for imperial ambitions, plunged into wars with which she has no interest or sympathy, a victim of secret diplomacy and entangling alliances, taxed for the upkeep of imperial armies and navies whose protection is problematical at best, an alien province misgoverned by absentees. This is the grim reality behind the glowing vision of colonial or other Home Rule. The "dreamers and visionaries" are not those who died for an Irish republic, nor those who live now for it, but those who fondly fancy that the lion can lie down in peace with the lamb, that the British Empire will ever give Ireland a free and equal status within its boundary. So far is it from being true that "Ireland wants less than any other small nationality in Europe today," no self-respecting Irishman or woman would see her sink beneath the level of any other small nation. Ireland has a stronger claim racially, geographically, historically to independent nationhood than Belgium, Serbia or even Poland. She will not sell her birthright for colonial Home Rule.

Laurie J. Blakely, an Old-Fashioned Journalist

FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

ON an intensely warm evening in mid-June some years ago, I was one of a large audience, assembled in the Emery Auditorium, Cincinnati, for the commencement exercises of St. Xavier College. Presently there was a solemn procession, and the stage became a thing of caps and gowns. Very soon, all eyes were fixed upon one figure in that imposing assembly. He was the Macgregor of the crowd. No matter where he was, that was the place of prominence. Academic dress could not lessen his individuality. A mane of long white hair, flowing mustaches, a brilliant eye, striking features, cheeks which the rose might envy, all combined to present a typical Southern gentleman.

"Who is he?" came the question from the uninitiated.

"Why, that's Laurie J. Blakely," was the answer.

True to appearance and true to type, Laurie J. Blakely was every inch a gentleman, a Southerner, and, what concerns us most, every inch a Catholic. Also he was a knight, this old-fashioned journalist, who for many years as editor of several secular newspapers, had defended the cause of truth and righteousness. "His pen was never employed in battle but for the right," wrote the editor of the Commercial Tribune, on January 26, 1917. "He believed fully in the old adage that the pen is mightier than the sword, and back of his pen was the power of character."

Laurie J. Blakely was born in Brooke County, Virginia, on March 4, 1844, and died in Covington, Kentucky, on January 25, of the present year. His father was an English convert; on his mother's side, he traced six generations of American ancestors, four of which were Catholic. Shortly after the outbreak of "the war between the States," as he always called it, he entered the army of his beloved Southland. He had hoped to follow his older brother to Georgetown University, but the call of his State was the call of duty. "He was but a lad," writes a friend, "but so impressed was he with the pathos of that last scene of all, the surrender of Lee, that he dipped his pen in his heart, and wrote a description for the old Richmond Enquirer. The touching word-picture was widely copied, and Forney of Philadelphia editorial fame, picked the young writer as a coming man in the field of letters." After the war, the young man went to Kentucky, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of his adopted State; but in 1873 he laid aside the gown for the pen. For forty years, with a few intermissions, when chosen by his fellow-citizens to serve them in office, first as president of the city council, afterwards as prosecuting attorney, this old-fashioned journalist wrote in the pages of the Louisville Courier-Journal and Times, the Covington Commonwealth, and later, of the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, a message of truth and tolerance, founded on sterling Catholic principles.

Pen and voice! With Laurie J. Blakely, they were rare gifts, all the more effective from the fact that both were transfigured with a living, practical Catholic faith. He was the most fascinating conversationalist I have ever met. I make some profession of using the pen myself, but often have I been transfixed on seeing him put thoughts on paper with an ease, a precision, and a finish born of no slight literary gift and of long practice. Poetry, editorials, news items, fiction; it was all one to him. "Full of the traditions of the South," writes a friend, Mary Cabell Richardson, "had his path been easier, he would have been to Kentucky what Scott was to his beloved Highlands." That this old-fashioned editor did not leave the proof of his real literary gifts in permanent form, will always be regretted by those who knew him, and by none more than by the present writer.

But that he did not, is due to many reasons, some self-chosen, others, the freaks of fortune. He always seemed wedded to lost causes, always aligning himself with the weaker side, providing that side could allege justice. These are not short and easy paths to fame and financial independence. He published but one volume, a series of literary essays, and that was for private circulation. Some years ago, much of what he had written in various newspapers and magazines was arranged for book form. A few days later, the publishing house burnt to the ground. With it went at least one book for which the world would have been better. It was always delightful, and inspiring too, to witness the vehemence with which he would recount the wrongs and misfortunes of others. Of his own, he rarely spoke and the present occasion found no exception.

It was impossible to conceive of this old-fashioned journalist striving to strike a nice balance between conscience and profit. More than once had his brilliancy won him invitations to wider fields. But they were fields which he could not enter, he thought, except through the sacrifice of principle. He was the poorest financier I have ever known. In personal matters, fifty dollars, or five, or fifty cents, were all about the same. But on paper, he was a financial expert. Given a pen, he could handle millions, and with equal ease show the futile expenditures of a small town, or the extravagances of a municipality. Unworldly to a degree, this old-fashioned journalist, trained in the school of Prentice, Watterson, Breckinridge, and Murat Halstead, knew well the value of faith, of love, of ideals, and for them he fought to the end. But of money, in his personal affairs, he knew nothing.

His journalistic life was fitly rounded out when in 1912, he was made Dean of the newly-founded School of Journalism of St. Xavier College. "He looked on journalism as a great and noble profession," writes the then Rector, Rev. F. Heiermann, S.J., "burdened with high responsibilities, but a power in the realm of truth, making for clear thinking and clean living. In this high ideal, he himself set the example. No one who had come in contact with him, could ever forget him. His character had something of the courteous, gentle, but independent and uncompromising chivalry of old. He was a knight without fear and without reproach. His success may not always have appeared before the world, but his life was a blessing and an inspiration to all who knew him."

Poor himself, as men count wealth, he always found something to give to those poorer than himself. The first message that came to the members of his bereaved family was from a workingman, quite unknown to them. "When I was a copy boy on the old Commercial," he wrote, "I'd often gone hungry, if he had not paid for my meals." He loved the poor, the oppressed, the afflicted, and, caring nothing for personal advantage, could fight their battles without flinching. Being what he was, it was impossible that he should leave anything of this world's goods to his children. But he bequeathed them a nobler heritage. "He left us," writes his son, now Commonwealth's Attorney in Covington, "nothing but his good name, his example of unselfishness, of love of God, of devotion to duty."

To have done this, and to have upheld for forty years, in a non-Catholic environment, the principles of Catholic thought and action, is to have lived a life worth living.

A London Pilgrimage

A. Hilliard Atteridge

FOR some six-hundred years, from the twelfth century to the latter part of the eighteenth, the chief place of public execution at London was Tyburn gallows. It took its name from the Ty brook or "burn," one of the many streams that ran down from the high ground in the north of London to join the Thames, a brook which has long since been covered in and is now an underground drain. The site is now far within the western boundary of London, but in those old days it stood out among the fields, at the point where the Great Northwestern road, once the Roman "Watling Street" connecting London with Chester, and now the Edgware Road, branched off from the great road to Oxford and Bath. The cross-road is close to the north-eastern corner of Hyde Park, in old times a royal deer-forest. In 1783, as London extended westward and fine houses were being built in the neighborhood, the gallows was removed; its site is now marked by a bronze plate let into the wood pavement of the broad street at the corner of Edgware Road and Oxford Street. Under the old criminal law of England, every felony was a capital offence, and Alfred Marks, the historian of Tyburn, estimates that at least 50,000 executions must have taken place at Tyburn during 600 fateful, dismal years.

The gallows was triangular, three upright supports linked together by three cross-beams, each long enough for six executions, and there are records of eighteen criminals having been hung together on the "Triple Tree," as the gallows of Tyburn used to be called. Many of the victims were Catholics of penal days, amongst them no fewer than 105 beatified martyrs, priests and lay-folk. The first of these were Blessed Richard Reynolds and Blessed John Hale of Isleworth, and the three Carthusian friars martyred on May 4, 1535, and the last was the Blessed Oliver Plunket, Archbishop of Armagh, killed July 1, 1681. Under Henry VIII, the martyrs suffered for their loyalty to the Holy See. Under Elizabeth and in the subsequent reigns they died for their devotion to the Holy Mass and the Sacrament of the Altar; for it had been declared high treason to receive Holy Orders, to offer or assist at Holy Mass, or to shelter a priest. It is these martyrdoms that have made the site of Tyburn a place of pilgrimage and the representation of the triple gallows the honored symbol, worn by the members of a Catholic confraternity. On the day of execution the martyrs were dragged from their prison at the Tower or Newgate to the gallows at Tyburn on a hurdle, over the streets and roads. This journey was the prelude of their sufferings. When the sentence was fully carried out, the victim was cut down whilst still living, and hacked to pieces by the executioner. In some cases, the crowd protested and the victim was allowed to hang until he was dead before being cut to pieces. This horrible method of execution, though it had fallen into desuetude, was removed from the statute book only within the last century.

For the last five years London Catholics have adopted the custom of making an annual pilgrimage in the form of a solemn procession along the line of streets from Newgate to Tyburn, the Via Dolorosa of the English martyrs. It takes place on the Sunday before their annual feast on May 4, usually the last Sunday of April. This year after an unusually long winter, the day of the procession was bright with sunshine. In a changeful climate, one cannot always count upon such good fortune, and two years ago, the procession was carried out under showers of cold rain, but nevertheless, hundreds walked bareheaded over the miles of route, and knelt in the mud during the closing service at Tyburn. London Catholic processions are generally bright with color, banners are displayed, there are surpliced choirs, white-veiled ranks of the Children of Mary and priests in their vestments. The Tyburn procession has a more somber aspect. There are no banners, a crucifix is carried at its head, with an escort of surpliced altar boys, who give the only point of color to the long array. The men walk in front, the women follow, with a few nuns in their habits at the head, the rosary is recited, other prayers are said and hymns sung. The starting point is at Newgate. The old prison has been removed long ago, and its site is occupied by a stately modern building, the central criminal court of London. Close by in a side street the procession is marshaled, Father Philip Fletcher, the founder of the Guild of Ransom for the conversion of England, acting as its chief marshal, and leading the way beside the crucifix. A few policemen accompany the procession, but their duty is simply to divert the traffic and keep the way clear over the miles of route. There is no question of protecting the processionists, for the non-Catholic public shows itself friendly and respectful. On the way, there is a halt to pay a brief visit to three churches near the line of route. It happens that each of these has a remarkable place in the history of the Catholic revival in England. The first of them, St. Eltheldreda's church in Holborn, was built in old Catholic times by the Bishops of Ely as the chapel of their London residence. It is a gem of Catholic architecture, and is the only pre-Reformation church in London that has been restored to Catholic worship. It has a link with the story of the martyrs. For some time in Elizabeth's reign the old palace of the Bishops of Ely was rented by the Spanish Ambassador, and the church used as his chapel, and we read that on the day when a martyr was going to Tyburn, the Blessed Sacrament was exposed in the chapel and the Catholics prayed before it, and some of them went out to greet the martyrs as they passed by on the hurdles. The second church visited is St. Anselm's, close to the line of route in Kingsway. It represents an earlier church under the same dedication, which stood a little further off, and was removed to this new site when the Kingsway road was opened some years ago. The older church was the first church built in London after the Reformation, in the days of Charles II. The third church visited is St. Patrick's in Soho Square, which stands on the site of an earlier church, the first to be publicly opened in London after the first Catholic Relief Act, in the reign of George III, allowed the public opening of Catholic churches.

The procession closes with a striking ceremony. About 300 yards west of the site of Tyburn, one of the large houses looking out upon the Park, has been some years a convent, "Tyburn Convent," founded in memory of the martyrs, a house in which there is unceasing prayer day and night for the conversion of England. Its existence is the fulfilment of a daring prediction made by one of the martyrs, as he stood beneath the gallows. "You think," he said, "that you are destroying the old Faith by our deaths, but here some day there will again be a house of prayer instead of the gallows." As the convent is reached, the long lines of men at the head of the procession halt and face inwards, and the women move into the space thus enclosed, the crowd forming a dense mass on the north side of the broad highway, while the police divert all the traffic to the south side. Some of the priests and the choir, which has headed the procession, pass into the convent. Its chapel occupies the first story, which has a broad balcony, the windows are open, and at a signal given from the balcony, the crowd knows the Benediction service has begun, and all kneel. The Benediction hymns are sung, and the great crowd joins also in the responses. Then there is a pause, and one can hear clearly the ringing of the bell at the altar and then comes the public Benediction. Lights shine on the balcony and the officiating priest appears bearing the Blessed Sacrament and gives the Benediction to the crowd. As he returns to the chapel, the people rise and sing the Laudate and the English hymn, "Faith of Our Fathers," and then disperse.

This year there were over 1,000 people, and the open-air Benediction was a striking sight, though those who were present two years ago, said it was even more impressive on that occasion to see 1,000 men and women kneeling in the mud under the driving rain. At Tyburn, there is always a crowd looking on, respectful enough in their attitude, but mostly puzzled at what it all means. As the crowd breaks up, some of these on-lookers ask friendly questions and learn something of the Catholic associations of the place.

I notice on these occasions, along the line of route, how very generally men take off their hats as the crucifix is carried past them at the head of the procession. In Holborn this year all who witnessed it were struck by the action of a soldier in uniform. An omnibus passed the procession and as it came abreast of the crucifix, an Australian soldier on top of it sprang to his feet, came to the position of "attention" brought his hand to his hat in salute, and stood thus until the last of the processionists had passed.

Paternal Care of Young

RICHARD A. MUTTKOWSKI, PH.D.

OCCASIONALLY it is good for the so-called lord of creation to realize that he plays a relatively unimportant part in the animal world, that he occupies his position by tolerance and not through merit. At least this is true of man's fellow-creatures; for the animal male, like his human brother, has a bad reputation among the females of his kind. The female is distrustful of him and banishes him, and if he ventures too near she destroys him. Too often her distrust is well founded, for frequently he manifests a very unpaternal inclination for cannibalism and makes way with his offspring, if an opportunity presents itself.

As a rule the male prefers to hunt and to rest, rather than to participate in the care of the young; or at most he will consent to divide their nurture with the female. Such is the case in birds and mammals: the male provides a good deal of the food, and among the birds may even replace the female for brief periods of brooding. The male ostrich, kiwi and emu take over entirely the brooding of the eggs. The female deposits her eggs in the hot desert sand, the heat of which is sufficient to incubate them; but in the cool night the male returns to sit on them.

Paternal devotion is not uncommon in fish and some surprising instances are known. Thus certain catfish, and I might note certain species of frogs, incubate their eggs by carrying them in the mouth, and it is generally the male that carries them. In the dogfish and stickleback of our fresh waters the male shares the construction of the nest with the female; but after spawning he alone remains to guard the nest and its contents and to herd and protect the young after hatching. An interesting case of alternate incubation occurs in the butterfish where the parents alternately wrap themselves around the eggs until the hatching is completed.

Several remarkable methods of paternal incubation are found in the amphibia. The midwife toad, known also as the obstetric toad, winds long strings of eggs around his hind legs and retires with them to a burrow. For about three weeks he sallies forth nightly to wash and aërate the eggs. In Darwin's frog of Chile the male utilizes his vocal sacs to incubate the eggs. After the female has deposited the eggs, about twelve to fifteen in number, the male pushes them through the slits by means of which the sacs open into the mouth. On each side the pouch spreads under the loose skin of the body and in this pouch the eggs remain, going through their entire developmental stages, until the young frogs emerge.

In gregarious animals such as the horse, buffalo, and cattle, there is usually one polygamous male, the leader or head of the family. The devotion of this leader is proverbial; he leads his band through the vicissitudes of weather, of enemies familiar and strange, aiding the females to care for the young and in general caring for the whole band, a relatively high development of family life.

Instances might be multiplied. For each class of animals furnishes some example of paternal devotion, a devotion which is in marked contrast to the cannibalistic opportunism of so many animal males. Much might be said of the paternal devotion of the tumble-bugs and other insects, of many gulls, terns, horn-bills, and other birds, of fish, reptiles, of various mammals up to the chimpanzee that watches at the foot of the nest, but the instances given are sufficient. At best they can only show that paternal devotion is not usual, but unusual among animals. For the male prefers to hunt and fight and to leave the actual care of the young to his mate.

Some notoriety-seeking sociologist has uttered the slur: "Woman is a parasite in the human state in that she neither produces nor provides." This graceless doctrine has made its way into many schools and unthinking teachers seem to take joy in repeating it. It is pitiful to hear "serious-minded" girls say: "I shall not marry. I don't want to be a parasite." If one asks, "Why a parasite?" the answer is given, "Dependency makes us so." There we have it. A mother's dependency is made a reproach. For dependency is interpreted as parasitism, and from such a standpoint motherhood must naturally seem degrading. Ethically, such a principle is not even fit for a jungle code, biologically, it is untrue. For in that woman becomes a mother she is all that the crude word producer signifies and more. A man may produce food and wealth, but woman gives men to the world. Which is the nobler task? The innate reverence of all peoples for motherhood indicates their sane appreciation of the true relations, for people do not honor what they despise. And a human parasite is despicable. True, there is a woman parasite, the married woman that shirks her duty.

These thoughts occurred to me as I wrote of fish and frog, of male devotion and incubation, and I wondered whether paternal care of young would be classed as parasitism or as productivity. Now the efficient principle of the family is mutuality. When the burden of incubation and nurture is shared by the male, is this action an evidence of parasitism? Or if taken over entirely by the male, does he become completely a parasite? No sane person would think so. But the human family differs in the fact that mutuality is shared by all its members. For here the parents help each other and their children; and in turn the older children must share in the care of the younger ones. There are isolated cases of devotion among offspring of animals, such as young flamingoes feeding each other, but selfishness is the rule. In that each member of the human family helps the other, he is a provider; in that paternal care of young may replace maternal care, paternity ranks higher than material productivity; in that motherhood achieves human productivity and combines with it sacrifice of self the mother ranks highest of all. That is the position accorded motherhood even by the barbarian. But it required an ultra-modern apostle of "civilization" to suggest a level with the parasite. Such "progress" is singular, indeed, and reminds one of the expression of the boy anent a crab, "When he goes forward, he goes backward."

A Correction

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I note a slight error in the quotation from the Manly Report in the article on Economics in AMERICA for May 12, page 123, where it is stated that "approximately one-fifth earn less than $6.00 and nearly one-half earn less than $6.00 a week." The first figure should read "$4.00."

Catholics and Civic Interests

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Under the pressure of the national crisis many matters call for attention that ordinarily would attract little notice. In common with many friends among the Catholic laity living in New York, I believe that it would be interesting to discuss why Catholics, who are exhorted from pulpit and platform to profess their faith on every occasion compatible with dignity, are not more encouraged to enlist under the Catholic name in those local civic bodies that engage attention from time to time, and that need, to give them emphasis, the patronage of well-organized institutions, such as churches, clubs, merchants' associations, etc.

As I conceive it, the whole field for the exercise of an enlightened citizenship, entirely removed from partizanship and politics, is almost arid of Catholic support as Catholic. A few parishes in the city, but only a few, serve as shining exceptions. Why are they so few? It has not always been so. May it not be that to our neglect of these matters is to be traced the decline in influence of the Catholic body in New York? Never were we of so little account in public affairs. Is it that we lack encouragement or intelligent direction? Is there no vision? Or are we too tightly bound by parochial timidity to venture out into currents of life away from the familiar anchorages of church and rectory? The existing condition is not the fault of indifference on the part of the Catholic laity. They wonder at it, and are often forced because of it into an apologetic rôle that is very distasteful.

Now I do not want to be understood as suggesting that Catholics should make of themselves a faction in public life. Nothing is further from my thought. What I would wish to have discussed is why Catholics, as Catholics, habitually hold aloof from participation in local civic movements that have for their object to promote a good that everybody approves, movements that are best aided by the support of organized bodies. Are not precious opportunities lost by this aloofness?

Relief for Children

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The summer will soon be upon us, with its heat and the sufferings of the poor. Can we not do something to alleviate the hardships of our Catholic mothers and children in the crowded tenement districts? What an agony is theirs during the long, stifling months of intolerable days! In some cities the orphans, thank God, have their homes by the seaside, or in the mountains, but what of the thousands of mothers and children in the sweltering tenements who never get a whiff of the salt sea or a breeze from the mountain top? Their quarters are hot, narrow, dusty and stifling, and our schools are closed and the gates of the large playgrounds attached to them are bolted and barred. Can we not have these comparatively cool schools thrown open to the mothers and children? Can we not unbar the gates and let the little ones play and breathe fresh air in the large and often shady playgrounds? No one doubts the sympathy of the priests or the zeal of our people. Surely some means can be devised to alleviate the sufferings of the poor.

The public schools are open. Their playgrounds are at the use of the little ones, and devoted men and women give their time and energy for the good of mothers and children during the summer. Instruction in hygiene in comparatively cool classrooms is afforded the mothers, and amusements provided for the children. Can we not be equally zealous for the relief and welfare of our Catholic mothers and their children? Some slight beginning has been made in a few places. Can the movement not become universal? Can we not make our schoolrooms and playgrounds ring with the merry laughter of thousands of children who otherwise would pant and faint in tenements? Shall we wait until many of our little ones have been attracted to proselyting playgrounds and camps? Shall we hesitate till those faithful mothers who resist the allurements and tempting offers of the "soupers," pray to God to give them strength to fight temptation that, yielded to, may mean nothing less than the sacrifice of the faith of their little ones? Surely we can count upon the sympathy and interest of the priests and the zeal of our people to take some action at once in a movement that cannot fail of doing untold good, both in body and soul, to our Catholic mothers and children. Catholic mothers with their hard earnings have helped to build the schools, from which, in most cases, they now seem to be excluded.

"What About Ireland?"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have the firm conviction that, in thanking you for the editorial article with the above title, in your issue of May 12, I am not alone in my deep sense of appreciation for the noble stand taken by the writer in vindicating Ireland's right to freedom, but I am confident I express the thanks, not only of the Irish race, but of all who stand for human rights, in their highest and best sense. Such an editorial, coming from so high and conservative a journal as AMERICA, which stands for the preservation of society on a sound, moral basis, will find a responsive echo throughout the length and breadth of this land.

Its appearance at a most critical moment, when the envoys of the Entente are seeking aid from this Republic, adds significance to its every word. Assuredly, from President Wilson down to the humblest citizen, the conviction that becomes rooted in the minds of all lovers of freedom is that two supreme motives actuated the entrance of this nation into Europe's maelstrom of slaughter: freedom for oppressed races and peace without conquest.

The Red Cross and Catholic Sisters

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With the approbation of the Archbishop I have organized in the Diocese of Cincinnati a Catholic Women's Association, affiliated to the local branch of the National League for Woman's Service. Its object is "to work for our country in its hour of need." We are working in the League, Catholics and non-Catholics together. The Protestants number about 1,000, and I have secured a membership of 17,125 Catholics, with more coming in. Our association is composed of the societies of churches, academies and the religious communities. We are engaged in sewing, knitting and agriculture.

The Sisters of the Good Shepherd are making hundreds of shirts for the army. We work for the Red Cross without being necessarily paying members, as the League cooperates with the Red Cross. There are no membership dues in either the Catholic Association or the League, and a voluntary contribution of ten cents from each member is all that the League asks, to help establish a sinking fund. This detail is important to many members who earn their livelihood.

In all this work there is one branch of our Catholic association not "available" for service, viz.: 780 Sisters of Charity and 117 Sisters of Mercy, making nearly 1,000 hospital nurses. What an amazing exclusion in time of war! During the four years of our Civil War, before the Red Cross came into existence, the Catholic Religious Orders were the main dependence of the Sanitary Commission. The regulations of the Medical Board of the Red Cross, which monopolizes all service for army and navy hospital attendance, make it impossible for any Religious Orders to become Red Cross nurses. Every nurse must not only "qualify," but every detail of her costume is minutely decreed! In the French Croix Rouge the Religious Orders are hospital nurses, and also are at the front, and some of them, for special acts of heroism, have been decorated with the Légion d'Honneur.

When the President and Mr. Taft made eloquent speeches this week at the dedication of a great building given by the Red Cross in memory of "the women of our Civil War," they spoke of these women especially as having alleviated the suffering incident to the war. Surely they meant our Catholic Sisters, who were foremost in the work, although they did not mention them by name. Is it possible that in the present emergency, the greatest our nation has ever known, this gentle army of mercy is to be completely ignored because of the requirements of the Medical Board selected by the Red Cross, not one of whom is a Catholic? Is it just to ask Catholics for money when they have no adequate representation?

President of the Catholic Women's Association.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some just criticisms of the communications to AMERICA concerning the editorial "Let Them Get Acquainted" have come to my ears, to the effect that these letters point out a deficiency but offer no remedy.

It is certainly a matter for congratulation that many of our young people not only read AMERICA, but read it thoughtfully enough to discuss its articles. To such appreciative readers I would like to state a remedy for our lack of warm, Catholic, social intercourse and cooperation among Catholic students and their friends, a remedy which seems to me practical and easily applied. I would suggest the formation in our colleges and universities, whether for young women or young men, of a society, called "A League for the Promotion of Catholic Ideals in Social Intercourse." Where young men are concerned, they should get in touch with the alumnæ associations of the women's colleges in their vicinity and ask the members thereof to be an auxiliary to advise them and to act as matrons and patronesses at their social affairs, which might easily include a promenade concert and tea, a properly conducted afternoon dance with refreshments, or a lawn party—all within the college precincts.

These leaguers should also become acquainted with all Catholic public social affairs around them and see that they are well advertised in the college. In other amusements they could make known the best and warn against the dangerous, post such notices as the white list of plays, the appeals for censorship of the "movies," etc. Let us not be afraid, let us get together; we have to use new ways according to the times and the country, but this friendly intercourse is truly Catholic, and no matter where or in what country it diminishes or fails, the cause must be looked for elsewhere than in Catholicism.

Amongst our young women such a league could see to it (1) that all their social functions undertaken for charities, etc., are well advertised at the Catholic men's colleges. Heaven knows undesirable affairs advertise themselves well and hold out almost irresistible allurements. (2) They should also provide some entertainment during the year for the collegians; these affairs could be chaperoned by ladies interested in the college and should be made remarkable for real and up-to-date festivity, but widely divorced from the vulgarity and pagan luxury that characterize most of the social functions of the day.

At this very season there is work for such a league. There are many smaller social affairs under way, but, above all, there is the Catholic Summer School of America, an ideal Catholic colony, where comradeship and every form of outdoor and indoor enjoyment, intellectual, social and athletic, religious and secular, is to be found. Why not a campaign in our Catholic colleges to make this delightful place well known and well patronized? Why not cottages taken for the season by a combination of students as a social center or even a camping ground under homelike supervision? What Catholic college will be the first to have its pennant float over such a summer home and its name emblazoned on the doorplate? By all means, "Let Them Get Acquainted."

Brooklyn, N. Y. (MRS.) A. FIELD-MCNALLY.

Evangelizing Suggestions from the East Side

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Having for long read, marked and inwardly digested, not without internal combustion, the trenchant observations of various scribes and one or two Pharisees whose good fortune it has been to spend a holiday in the religion-ridden countries of South America, I came suddenly to the conclusion, one bright afternoon, that if a person applied his hustling and poetically liberal methods of computation and analysis to the city of New York, for instance, strange conclusions might result.

Accordingly, I journeyed by the most direct route possible in a carelessly orientated city, and came to a region where the senses are persistently assailed, the East Side. It is the truth that I saw two men horribly intoxicated; two others enthusiastically destroying each other's countenance; a woman shamelessly conveying a tin vessel of liquor from a corner saloon, and hordes of sallow children stridently exercising their limbs and their vocabularies in the gutters. Nothing was there but signs, sounds and smells of general degradation. And then I discovered what, I feel sure, must be the cause of it all, a grimy little church tucked away in a corner, exteriorly depressing, interiorly dark. The church's title contained the word "evangelical," and its pastor, whom I happened to detect in the act of emptying the poor box, was a well-fed looking person. Is there need to point out the obvious deduction?

I might add that the elevated trains clattering swiftly by suggested the avenue of escape for the helots of this congested area, particularly as I understand the shareholders of the railway are, in part, the ground landlords of the tenements. Hence their unity of influence is quite clear, and one can only wonder why the ignorant inhabitants do not profit by such beneficence.

If you or your readers fail to perceive the logic of my conclusions I can only reply that you should, and, following the educated example of the editors of our leading intellectual secular publications, I decline to enter into any controversy.

Sister Teresa Vincent

UNDER the soaring arches of New York's great Cathedral, she lay. The peace of God crowned her as an aureole; after the long day of toil, she was at rest. Prelates and priests and people gathered to honor a simple, holy woman; one who had always regarded herself as the servant of all, but consecrated in a particular manner, to the care of the lambs of Christ's flock.

For fifty-seven years, Sister Teresa Vincent had worn the garb of a Sister of Charity. Nearly fifty years ago, along with two of her religious Sisters, she came to New York, to devote herself to the rescue of the tenderest and most helpless of all outcasts, the babies abandoned, through shame or heartless cruelty, in the streets of a great city. Without one penny of endowment, they had in abundance the rich inheritance of faith in God, love of Him, and of all His suffering children. God, who has promised the joys of Heaven for a cup of cold water given in His Name, prospered the work. The house on the edge of the slums, which first saw their zealous work, soon gave way to the magnificent establishment, the New York Foundling Hospital, the first institute of its kind in the United States. Since 1869, more than one hundred thousand infants have been blessed with the loving ministrations of this shrine of charity.

Long will her name be repeated, with a prayer for her dear soul, in thousands of happy homes, made by the boys and girls who, humanly speaking, owe their very lives to the love of Sister Teresa. None will miss her more than the toddlers of the Hospital, who found in her the tenderness of a mother's heart, whose woes grew lighter, poor little waifs, at the touch of her gentle hand. Like our Blessed Saviour, whose love for the poor she so faithfully imitated, she lived to feel the ingratitude of those whom she had befriended, and to know that the favor of the great which she never courted, but merely accepted for her charges, falls away in the day of persecution.

But her works do follow her, and the grateful love of a world to which she exhibited an example of heroic self-sacrifice, as rare in these days of self-seeking, as it is needed. She will have intercessors in Heaven: most powerful will be the prayers of those little ones, the springtide blossoms of our race, who, baptized through her zeal, went before her in their innocence, to be as flowers before the Face of God. In those heavenly courts, as the Church sings of the Holy Innocents, the toys of their child-like play are crowns and palms. Surely they will pause for a moment in their play before their Heavenly Mother, to take her with them to storm the very throne of God, in intercession for Sister Teresa, who befriended them in the day of their great need. They will be waiting for her, whose name they first heard in Heaven, and will claim her for their own.

For she who on earth so loved the little lost lambs will turn to them in their chosen place. May we, too, one day look for her, "in the nurseries of Heaven."

The Food Administrator

POPULAR dislike is more often directed against an unsuitable name, than against the measure unfortunately misnamed. Recognizing this bit of "mob psychology," Mr. H. C. Hoover has wisely protested the use of such terms as "food controller" and "food dictator." He prefers to be known for what he is, "a food administrator." Opinions may be divided on the extent of power with which this new officer should be invested, but that he is a necessity in time of war, even for the richest country on earth, is perfectly clear. There is small danger that his activities will prove unduly repressive or tyrannical. As the President has stated, the powers asked are by no means dictatorial. "They are intended to benefit and assist the farmer, and all those who play a legitimate part in the preparation, distribution and marketing of foodstuffs." The advantage to the consumer of gently, but firmly, tilting the food-pirate from the end of his own plank, is obvious.

Further, if Mr. Hoover can impress upon the country the need of checking our enormous waste, he will confer a benefit that will outlast the war. In his recently published little volume, "Thirty-Cent Bread," Mr. Alfred W. McCann, a recognized authority on foodstuffs, makes the alarming prophecy that "Without regulation we shall have bread cards and soup kitchens within a year." With regulation, "We can have all the food we need for home use, and export two hundred billion pounds to our allies." Quoting the Department of Agriculture, Mr. McCann points out that fifty per cent of all the vegetables and fruits produced in the United States, "never reaches the consumer. They rot on the ground." Because we fancy the appearance of "patent white flour," we pay a higher price for an inferior product, and throw away about thirty-eight per cent of the wheat brought to the mill. Most of us suffer "a loss of twenty-five per cent in the peeling and preparation of the potato," a humble vegetable which Germany has studied during the war, with astonishing results.

Other data cited by Mr. McCann illustrate the wilful waste which, if not checked at once, will bring us to woful want. In food, as in our exploitation of the country's natural resources, we have been more than prodigal. War, as Mr. McCann suggests, may make us "look within," and follow the example of other countries in encouraging ideals of economy.

The Minister's Face

THE starry emblem of a country truly dedicated to liberty, strained and tugged in the freshening breeze. Under its mobile shadow, a foreign Minister of Justice, pleaded for American aid, that "justice might be done the nations of the earth." He was eloquent, his cause was popular; the whole city had gathered to do him and his fellow-envoys honor. "But look," remarked a bystander, "his is the saddest face I have ever looked upon." ". . . that through peace founded on justice, freedom may once more reign," the Minister was saying, and a mighty roar of applause came up from the crowd that packed the Square.

"The saddest face I have ever looked upon." Well might it be. He stood beneath a banner that had always welcomed the oppressed of all nations to true freedom. Did his mind go back over the years, to recall the great things he had done, that "freedom might reign?" For he had served his country well, some had said; at least, he had risen from lowliness to eminence. As a boy, a religious community had rescued him from dire want. These men, dedicated to God, had fed him, clothed him, housed him, educated him. They gave him a father's care, lavished on him a father's love. Did he remember that? Perhaps, for memory plays strange tricks when emotions are stirred. Did he remember too, that years later he used the gifts, born of their bounty, to turn these men out of house and home, that "freedom might reign"? Thus strangely is liberty worshiped. He and his political confreres had sent them into exile too, in the name of liberty; for these men wished to teach the law of God, and liberty forbade that. One might blaspheme God, on the public streets, even in the nation's parliament; liberty allowed that, protected the outrage. But one might not teach little children to know, love and serve God. That was slavery, unworthy a free man, a free country.

"The saddest face I have ever looked upon." Well might it be. For other memories rose up as the Square rocked with applause. ". . .we ask your aid in the great conflict for the ideals of liberty . . ." There were virginal souls too, in that once happy land, well worthy to touch the kindred virginal souls of children, to put their pure embrace about their fallen sisters, to soothe the bed of agony with a love that was like the love poured forth on Calvary. But that love, so manifested, was incompatible with liberty. And so he had closed and sold their schools, their homes, their hospitals, in the name of that freedom for which he was now pleading. Of the proceeds, some went to the Government's coffers. The rest, wrung from establishments built by pure hands and sustained by pure hearts, bought jewels to deck the leprous necks of harlots. And as for the good women, who asked only to be allowed to minister to Christ in the poor, the sick, the helpless, them he turned adrift. For such a vile thing is liberty, in the minds and the nations that sell Christ, hoping as did Judas, to find in the bargain, happiness.

"The saddest face I have ever looked upon." Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord, and I will repay it. Ill does it become any mortal to assess guilt and assign punishment. M. Viviani has come and gone; the cause of international comity can suffer no hurt by this reference to past history. But even as in memory of the First Word on Calvary we forgive the illimitable wrong, so we cannot forget that the broken voices of the poor who are oppressed, and the sobs of consecrated virgins thrown back upon a contaminated world, rise above the plaudits of parliaments and peoples, a piercing cry that moves the eternal God to eternal vengeance.

"Unproductive" Monks

SPEAKING in his recent book, "French Windows," of those ultra-modern Catholics, who think that monks are "out of date" nowadays, John Ayscough well remarks: "If God is out of date, . . . then monks are out of date too. Their reasonableness depends on His existence, and the reality of His claims. They are just for God. They do not fly to philanthropy to excuse themselves." That thorough knowledge of God and His claims which most men fly from, monks hunger after. In order to learn as much about Him as possible, they become specialists in prayer and make the practice of contemplation their life-work. As the world, however, considers such an occupation "unproductive" and therefore useless, scant patience is had with men who, as the phrase runs, "do nothing but pray."

"It is true that I 'do nothing but pray,'" the monk might serenely answer his scornful critics. "But I observe that for the past three years you have been doing practically nothing but killing one another and seem, moreover, to be quite unable to stop doing so. Perhaps my occupation is the more productive of the two after all. The peace which your artillery apparently is not able to give the world, my prayers and penances may hasten, for the fervent intercession of the just man is strong with God, and I am devoting my life, as you know, to the attainment of high proficiency in prayer."

The monk could appeal, moreover, to history to prove that even from a more material point of view he has by no means been "unproductive." And as for our own day, when the importance of agriculture is realized as never before, the highly necessary farmer, when tempted to discontent with his laborious, humdrum life, can behold the monks silently working in their fields and reflect, with John Ayscough:

> "There are husbandmen like me. Their life of toil in furrow and farmstead is mine. They see no variation but that of the seasons, no more than I: monotony of labor is their lot, as it is mine: looking downward, then, as I delve, can I not be seeing Heaven as they, and growing hourly more at home (like them) with my one neighbor God?" As he trudges homeward through the misty dusk, and hears their bell ring out on the frosty air, must he not say, "I to my hard-earned frugal meal, to my hearth, and to my rest: they, empty-bellied, to their prayer and praise, their brief hard repose, and then their vigil with the Great Sentinel of all," and must he not join his dumb heart in praise with theirs? Must not his empty fields seem less lonely?

Even if monks did no more for the world than to be models for it of patient frugal industry, the reason for their existence would be amply sufficient. But besides that, the true monk by thinking of God always, and working for Him alone, makes up for the multitudes of men who work only for themselves and never think of God at all.

Censorship and Censorship

CENSORSHIP is not a popular word in this country, nor is censorship a practice which appeals to the ordinary citizen. Yet he suffers it to an extent hardly equaled in those European countries which his wisdom regards as "retrograde," mainly, perhaps, because he feels that a conflict with a censorship which commands influence through its investments in stocks and bonds, is always a losing fight. But there are two sorts of censorship. One is quiet and efficient: the other, while not always noisy, is frequently as much to the purpose as a discord in a symphony.

The variety that is quiet and efficient has adopted the methods of Bret Harte's heathen Chinee, but is oftener able to carry them to a successful conclusion than was that unhappy Celestial. It can lay the ban upon the college, for instance, by holding out a price for the institution's opinions. No doubt these words state but crudely the very subtle and devious performance, in which on the one side there is no mention of "control," nor on the other, any reference to a detail so vulgar and commercial as a price. An expectant college, with mouth agape for the Midas-fruit, receives an intimation, politely conveying the sad fact that the Syndicate does not contemplate the extension of aid to schools, let us say, of a "sectarian" type. History asserts that more than one such expectant college, not noted, perhaps, for constructive work in scholarship, has had wit enough to take the hint. Wisdom, of course, counsels that the happy event be chronicled as an "endowment." Truth would seem to regard the transaction as a "censorship," a quiet "censorship," but very efficient.

The other sort of censorship, to cite a ready example, is that exhibited by a self-styled national board which attempts to review moving-pictures. This board certainly has its standards, but they are not such as can be accepted by any parent with even a rudimentary sense of responsibility to his children. An examination of a series of films "passed" by this board leads to the conclusion that they were "passed" by those members who were suffering from impaired eyesight. As an aid to parents in selecting amusement for their children, these "censors" are about as useful as a wide-meshed sieve to a one-armed man adrift in a leaky boat.

Yes, we have plenty of censorship in this country, but most of it is of the wrong kind. No wonder that both the word and the idea are unpopular.

The Fruit of War

DURING the week the editor's mail-bag has been heavy with sad letters about the great war. Fathers and mothers and sisters have dwelt in hot, burning language on the evils attendant upon the conflict. Alas, their words are true: millions of men are dead, others are hopelessly broken in body and spirit, vice reigns and the pall of sorrow lies heavy on innumerable hearts. The world is a valley of dry bones, where the dismal notes of the raven mock joy and peace. But this is only part of the vision; a glance upward would have revealed an all-wise Providence still directing the destiny of man, waiting for the moment of triumph to show to bewildered creatures His mercy and wisdom. Death and vice and sorrow are following the black chariot, so too are life and virtue and joy. Many have been cast down, many more have been lifted up. For a time materialism was in the full tide of victory, but each day its black waters run lower, and soon the tide will turn and flow onward to the abyss, whence it will never escape in full strength. Spirits will then be free, the people will come into their heritage of liberty, they will no longer be pawns in the game, the State will serve them in just measure, they will be exalted with new life, never more to break the bitter bread of a thraldom which ends in carnage and chaos. But for this many must die and many must weep, but none must or may sin. Death and sorrow loosen bonds, crime makes them stronger.

Literature

SCHOLASTIC PHILOSOPHY

FATHER ERNEST HULL, in his excellent brochure on "Fortifying the Layman," contends that the disinclination and even positive adversion to reflection on religious questions so widely prevalent among educated laymen is traceable, partially at least, to atrophy of the religious faculty; and by this he means the loss of a taste for and appreciation of religion. He finds the cause of the disease in the absence of religious food for the mind: a faculty unexercised, like a limb or muscle unused, sooner or later becomes inoperative and practically incapable of putting forth an effort. Further analysis reveals that a large measure of responsibility for this state of mind must be charged against modern education; for modern education is unquestionably one-sided. The acquisitive faculties are developed to the neglect of the contemplative and reflective powers of the soul. Hence it is that novelty alone appeals to the modern mind. The truths of religion are the same today as they were generations ago. In this sense they are old. The fact that though old they are ever new can be discerned only by the reflective; but it is precisely in matters closely bound up with or bordering on religion, as Father Hull points out, that the power to reflect long and patiently has become atrophied in the modern mind.

This apparent incapacity to concentrate the mind for an appreciable length of time on questions that do not rise above the objects of the senses or are removed from the daily needs of the body, may account to some extent for the unwillingness manifested by many an otherwise trained mind to interest itself in the larger, more lasting and far more deeply personal discussions of philosophy; in those problems that must surely press themselves from time to time on the attention of men and clamor for a definite and soul-satisfying solution. We refer to questions such as those touching on the ability or inability of the mind to attain absolute truth; the origin and purpose of the things that lie about us, their relations towards us and our attitude towards them; above all, our own origin and destiny, for on the answer, right or wrong, to this question must depend the view we take on the further problems involving our rights, and more especially our duties towards ourselves, our neighbor, the State, and our God. Yet we must confess that modern philosophy, as the phrase is popularly understood, is eminently unsatisfactory. Its terminology is indefinite, cloudy, and protean in its changes; its starting-point only too often is an open, though unwarrantable, admission of scepticism or materialism; its conclusions almost invariably run counter to the deep-seated convictions of the human race. Small wonder that men should long since have come to regard mataphysics and even logic as the weird pastimes of a weird section of the "high-brows."

Any attempt, then, to make the "common-sense" philosophy of Aristotle and Aquinas better known is surely deserving of commendation. When this attempt is made by one whose intellectual attainments and scholarly methods fit him admirably for the task, the work done is doubly welcome. But when the writer is one who combines in himself not only the special gifts that are most imperatively demanded for success, but a striking personality as well and an evident loftiness of character, and whose high office makes him a central figure in the Church whose cause and whose philosophy he champions, then indeed we are more than justified in rejoicing at the fruits of his labor. For his words are sure to receive a hearing where a hundred other voices would fall on listless ears. Cardinal Mercier needs no introduction, nor need we speak here of the splendid work he achieved as founder of the Higher Institute of Philosophy in the University of Louvain. All this is sufficiently known to those who are conversant with the history of neo-scholasticism.

"A Manual of Scholastic Philosophy. By Cardinal Mercier. Authorized Translation by T. L. Parker, M.A., and S. A. Parker, O.S.B., M.A. With Preface by P. Coffey, Ph.D. Vol. I; Cosmology, Psychology, Epistemology, General Metaphysics" (B. Herder, $3.50), which is the complete title of the volume under review, is a translation of the "Traité élémentaire de philosophie," itself an abridgement of the larger "Cours de philosophie," six volumes of which have already appeared. In this first part of the English version the reader who is anxious to learn how scholasticism faces modern problems and what solutions it has to offer, will find his desire fully gratified. If he has heard, as no doubt he has, that between scholasticism and the accredited teachings of modern science there lies an unbridgeable chasm, he will probably be surprised to discover that the charge is utterly baseless; that on the contrary, scholasticism eagerly embraces all such conclusions, supremely confident that truth cannot gainsay truth; that its proudest boast is that, unlike other systems of philosophy, it starts with facts and throughout rigorously insists that an explanation which does not square with the facts is by the same token hopelessly discredited.

That scholasticism should be slow to accept any and every theory that is proposed, or even to accord it instant consideration, must appear to the judicious a sure sign of temperance and maturity. Novelty in itself is not, particularly in the realm of the intellect, a guaranty of stability, much less of unquestionable credentials; and when, as not infrequently happens, the very stanchest and presumably the best-informed defenders of the new theory disagree on points that they themselves consider of radical importance, it is only prudent to wait until the specialists have come to some sort of an agreement before one endeavors to determine the philosophical bearings of the much-heralded doctrine. The history of scholastic philosophy is a vindication of its attitude toward scientific theories that have so often sprung up and died within a few years of their birth.

In this volume the reader will see, too, for himself that the fine distinctions which scholasticism draws between things and concepts that to the uncritical eye and mind are alike, distinctions which it has long been the amusement of cheap rhetoricians to deride, constitute in reality one of its chief glories; that the purpose of scholastic distinctions is to make men think, as Socrates aimed at doing, and as all genuine science proposes for its object. Again, he will rise from the perusal and study—intensive study, we hope—of Cardinal Mercier's work with the conviction that scholasticism is a well-knit system of thought where part fits in with part, where the teachings of psychology do not conflict with those of epistemology or with the fundamental principles established in metaphysics. Finally, he cannot fail to be impressed by the exactness of its terminology. A year or so ago a writer in a non-Catholic weekly, in the course of a review of Father Day's "Catholic Democracy, Individualism and Socialism," called attention to this very point. "Writers of our day," he said, "might with profit learn something from the old scholastics in this respect. However intricate their argument, however fine their distinctions might be, they left no reasonable ground for misapprehension of their meaning."

To those who are already acquainted with the teachings of scholasticism we recommend the masterly refutation of mechanism, and the section of metaphysics dealing with "The Causes of Being." The stress laid on the doctrine of final causes finds its justification, if any were needed, in the theological conception of the universe that scholasticism emphasizes and which alone can explain the order that is everywhere so strikingly manifest.

In view of the general excellence of the work it seems a pity that the author, or at least the translators with the author's sanction, should have failed to make it quite clear that in many points of relatively minor and secondary importance, opposite views are as widely received among scholastic philosophers as those which he himself favors; and that in many, if not in the majority, of these questions the mind of St. Thomas is not so apparent as to leave no room for reasonable doubt. As it is, the impression left on the mind of the non-Catholic reader will, we fear, be a strengthened conviction that once a recognized exponent of scholasticism has spoken, all discussion among the followers of that system is at an end. Yet in obviously debatable questions where the arguments for either side may justly claim a greater or lesser degree of evidential value though they do not wholly satisfy the mind, and where, moreover, these arguments appeal to many an ardent and enthusiastic champion of scholasticism, the rule holds: "Tantum valet auctoritas quantum valent argumenta." This acknowledged freedom of opinion in matters less immediately connected with the fundamental and outstanding questions of philosophy is, to the initiated, one of the most striking characteristics of scholasticism, and is in marked contrast to the tendency of a host of non-scholastic philosophers who under the shadow of some well-known name doubtless believe themselves immune from criticism.

Many, too, will doubt the wisdom of abandoning the traditional order of the treatises; they will remain convinced that pedagogically it is much more advisable to begin with logic and epistemology than to endeavor to explain to beginners the difficult treatises of cosmology and psychology. However, it would perhaps be ungracious to dwell much upon these differences of opinion; we prefer to congratulate his Eminence, if we may, on having done a good and, we trust, a lasting work.

IRELAND

Beside your bitter waters rise
  The Mystic Rose, the Holy Tree,
Immortal courage in your eyes,
  And pain and liberty.

The stricken arms, the cloven shields,
  The trampled plumes, the shattered drum,
The swords of your lost battle-fields
  To hopeless battles come.

And though your shattered remnants know
  Their shameful rout, their fallen kings,
Yet shall the strong, victorious foe
  Not understand these things:

The broken ranks that never break,
  The merry road your rabble trod,
The awful laughter they shall take
  Before the throne of God.

REVIEWS

French Windows. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.40.

The Rest-House. By ISABEL C. CLARKE. New York: Benziger Bros. $1.35.

These two books ought to make less defensible than ever the "wish-bone Catholic's" old jeremiad: "But Catholic authors' stories are so sadly lacking in interest and artistry that I never read them." And that jaundiced dictum will be further neutralized by the verdict of those who followed John Ayscough's war-papers as they appeared in the Month, and became absorbed in Miss Clarke's novel while it ran in Extension. The sixteen "French Windows" through which Mgr. Bickerstaffe-Drew looked last year while an army chaplain at the front "opened into that splendid and gracious thing, the heart of the French people." But he also tells, it should be added, what he saw in the hearts of English, Scotch, Irish and German soldiers, not all of whom were Catholics either. The author attests, moreover, that "every episode and every character" in the book "is drawn from reality and life: nothing is imaginary." Many of the incidents in the volume are so intimate and sacred that no one but a priest could describe them, and there are pages that may leave the reader's eyes wet: the author's account, for instance, of a young German Catholic soldier's happy passing, or the last words of a dying Presbyterian Scot, who said:

> Ye gave a wee Christ upon the Cross to yon Catholic fellow. Have ye, Father, e'en one for me? . . . I've been a wilful laddy, and His words have been dour and dismal talk to me, . . . and I went aye my ain gait, that wasna His, and I liked laughing-talk and merry things, and noo I know what suffering is, and I can understand better. . . . Father, ye'll mind to ask Him mak' me His ain laddie. Ma mither gave me, willing, to the war, as His gave Him, willing, to the death: ye'll write to her and pray for her?

The book is also full of the author's characteristic touches of humor and felicities of expression. His description, for example, of the Aumônier's astonishment at the "humility" of the English and that sage remark about this wonderful "Catholic Church of ours—that makes even her children who try not to be good, so good in spite of themselves."

In "The Rest House" Miss Clarke tells with remarkable spiritual insight how the attraction a young English girl felt for the Blessed Sacrament drew her, notwithstanding the great sacrifices she had to make, into the Catholic Church. Yet the book is not at all "preachy," the heroine's romance is artistically brought to its proper conclusion, and the story's characters for the most part are well drawn and consistent, as, of course, they ought to be. Yet when it is recalled how many of the men and women in our best-sellers are little better than lifeless puppets, this able Catholic novelist's real portraits deserve their meed of praise. If those who read with enjoyment "French Windows" and "The Rest House" should then be tempted to finish these two authors' other excellent books, that might start a little missionary movement for the better appreciation of today's Catholic literature. Melodious Vocal Exercises. By L. CAMILIERI. New York: The Devin-Adair Company. $1.50.

This is one of the few practical manuals that have been dedicated to choral music in a century. Text-books devoted to the theory of chorus-training abound, but there has always been the need for just such a book as Mr. Camilieri has now supplied. Although the chorus is the greatest vehicle of musical expression, because it is an orchestra of human instruments, it has forfeited its sovereignty within the last fifty years, to individual virtuosity, to the pageantry of opera, and to the ensembles of mechanical instruments. But the inspired thoughts of music are intended for exposition by the chorus. Giovanni da Palestrina and John Sebastian Bach, history's masters of composition, bequeathed their most valuable legacy, not to solcists, not to orchestras, but to choirs of human voices.

The twentieth century is not interested in choral music. And for two good reasons: first, because the average choral conductor is interested less in his chorus than in some other phase of musical activity; second, because the average chorus sings either altogether badly or with mere correctness. Choruses over which metronomic baton-wavers preside will not find much that is of value to them either in Mr. Camilieri's manual or in any manual of music. But where the conductor is a genuine choral musician the author's book can contribute splendid results.

The manual gives an excellent epitome of the principles of notation. It will help choristers to read music. But its compelling recommendation is a well-graded series of vocal exercises which offer opportunity of developing unified tone-qualities in the four sections of a chorus. Vocal exercises are frequently unmusical, but those provided by Mr. Camilieri are melodic and most attractively harmonized. A quarter of an hour spent at each rehearsal, in the careful employment of the "Melodious Vocal Exercises," will net the vocal fluency and the sureness of technique which by their absence have long made choral societies conspicuously ineffective. Mental Conflicts and Misconduct. By WILLIAM HEALY, M.D. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $2.50.

On Causation, with a Chapter on Belief. By CHARLES A. MERCIER, M.D., F.R.C.P. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.40.

Dr. Healy's book is, essentially, a study of juvenile delinquency, based upon psychoanalysis. For this term Dr. Healy substitutes "mental analysis," which he defines: "A method of using the memory to penetrate into the former experiences of mental life." Juvenile delinquency, he holds, may frequently be traced to certain experiences which the individual, because of moral or social reasons, strives to dissociate from his mental content. The effort is rarely if ever completely successful, and the result is a "repression," which, in turn, connotes a "complex." By "complex" Dr. Healy understands with Freud, "a constellation of mental elements, permeated with a vigorous emotional tone; a system or association of ideas grouped about an emotional core or center. . . . Being possessed of an emotional tone, it has energy-producing powers; by reason of this it may be, and often is, a great determiner of thoughts and actions." In "repression" one or more of these "elements," broken off from its "constellation," floats about in "the subconscious mind," as unsuspected, after a time, and as dangerous as a submarine. For the "emotional energy" with which it is charged may and usually does attempt to escape "along undesirable channels." The effort to check this escape is characterized by Dr. Healy as "mental conflict." The struggle, apparently, is not between good and evil, but between two evils. As presented in Dr. Healy's cases, forty selected from 147, discovered in a clinic of 2,000 children, the "repression" is almost invariably connected with matters of sex-experience.

Valuable as is this book to the qualified student, it must be admitted that Dr. Healy has failed to establish his main thesis. Finding evidence of "repression" in forty delinquent children, he has not proved that the "repression" bore, in his own words, "a causal relation" to the delinquency. He has merely shown that the two phenomena existed in the same individual. Farther than this his data will not bear him. It would be a grave mistake, however, to consider Dr. Healy's work, as some have done, mere theorizing. In his insistence on a careful study of the individual he has pointed out a path which may yet lead to useful discoveries in the field "of the hidden factors of conduct." Whether that path can be smoothed by psychoanalytic methods is at least open to doubt. In the words of Dr. Mercier, "In the first place, the universal repression of sexual passion is a mere assertion. Secondly, granting the universal repression, there is no evidence that this repression can produce mental disorder. Not one of the nine or twelve methods . . . has ever been applied to show that it has or can have any causal influence in producing mental disorder." Dr. Mercier, excellent in his destructive criticism of Hume, Mill, Welton, Pearson and Russell, is not always happy in his own ideas of causation, or in their presentation. But he has here stated a rule of logic, the observance of which would have made Dr. Healy's latest work a far more valuable contribution to the psychology of adolescence. P. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Clifton Johnson, that industrious maker of books which show Americans the antiquities and beauties of their own native land, has now prepared "New England: a Human Interest Geographical Reader" (Macmillan, $1.00.) He leisurely rambles from Connecticut to Maine and gathers on the way a pleasant variety of biographical, literary and historical data which he connects with the houses, villages and towns he visits. He also dwells upon the many industrial activities of New Englanders and describes the landscape beauties of the region. But of Catholic landmarks, institutions or traditions, as far as the author is concerned, there is none. Clark University, for instance, is mentioned, but Holy Cross College, which is said to be in the same town, Mr. Johnson unfortunately missed seeing. The book is well illustrated.

A book of interest and considerable value to the student of social economics is "The Minimum Cost of Living" (Macmillan, $1.00), by Winifred Stuart Gibbs. This study of 150 families in New York City was not undertaken to fit in with a preconceived theory. Miss Gibbs is content to supply a mass of well-coordinated detail, allowing the careful student to draw his own conclusions. Many of the estimates will, of course, call for revision in view of the daily increasing cost of living. — In "The Immigrant and the Community" (Century, $1.25), Miss Grace Abbott discusses the problem of preparing the immigrant to take his place in American life. The book is sketchy rather than thorough, while its plea for "internationalism," to which an entire chapter is devoted, may easily be misinterpreted in these stirring days. Nor does Miss Abbott seem to understand the importance of religion as a power for social righteousness. Religious indifferentism is a poor preparation for American citizenship.

The State Constitution of New Jersey, Article I, Section 4, makes the following provision: "No religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust; and no person shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles." But not all the School Boards and Superintendents of Schools in that State seem to be aware of that important provision's existence. This is clear from a series of letters on "Religious Bigotry in Action," which Mr. Stephen N. Horgan publishes in the current Catholic Mind. For the provision apparently can become a dead letter when a Catholic applies for the post of teacher in New Jersey's public schools. The second paper in the number is Archbishop Moeller's pastoral on "Catholics and the War," and the third article is Mary Butler's reflections on "Modesty in Dress," a paper which even some of our Catholic women, it is whispered, could read with profit.

"The Will to Win, a Call to American Boys and Girls" (Kenedy, $0.50), by E. Boyd Barrett, S.J., is a little book with an important purpose, for the author aims to tell our young people what is meant by will-power, to show its necessity and to give practical hints and methods for acquiring it. Father Barrett advises his young readers to > Keep alive within your heart a love for what is fair and good and great. Look around at the works of nature; observe and study a little the beauty of flowers, of mountains, and of the sea. Read good books and the stories of great men. Furnish your mind with the marvels of science. Open your heart to the call of great causes—the cause of the poor and oppressed above all. Take an interest in big problems and keep yourself away from the sordid and petty pursuits of evil doers.

Our country is no doubt forging ahead to a position in the van of nations, and her future rests on the boy and girl of today. They can make America great if they will it. A nation is great when its individuals are so. An individual is great when each of his acts is so. Our littlest acts are great when they are guided by principle, and "you can conquer the world through failure if you are true to your principles." This is the kind of winning the book asks for and teaches. Boys and girls who become interested in this little work the author would refer to his larger book, "Strength of Will," which was praised in our issue of April 22, 1916.

In "The Hundredth Chance" (Putnam, $1.50) Ethel M. Dell has written a strong novel, which points a good moral by the questionable means now so much in vogue. The machinery of the plot is the detestable "triangle," as it has been called. Circumstances hurry an unhappy girl into a loveless marriage. A good but ill-suited and tactless husband and a former suitor, rejected because unworthy, but still loved, combine to wring the soul of the wife with gloom and temptation. An unnatural mother urges her to fling propriety and morality to the winds. She resists and finally achieves legitimate happiness. The book is depressing, the atmosphere is unwholesome, and better editing would have excised several very offensive passages.——It is not clear just what W. E. B. Henderson would be at in his recent novel, "Behind the Thicket" (Dutton, $1.50). He introduces the reader to several very modern and disreputable men and women and his precious "hero" seems to be an ancient Greek faun who imprudently drifts into the twentieth century and is slain by Dionysus.——"The Wanderer on a Thousand Hills" (Lane, $1.40), by Edith Wherry, is a story about a Chinese girl who makes an unfortunate marriage, and after a gruesome experience is left a childless widow. So she adopts a little boy she finds and trains him to be the first scholar of China. But at the height of his triumph he discovers his English parentage; she loses him, and the book ends with his becoming a wanderer. The story is filled with descriptions of Chinese customs, but it is not pleasant reading.——"The Shadow of the North" (Appleton, $1.35), by Joseph A. Altsheler, is a commonplace story of the French and Indian Wars written for American youths under the auspices of the Boy Scouts.——The anonymously written "One Year of Pierrot" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.50), a charming story of motherhood which was praised in these columns on the book's first appearance last year, has now come out in a new edition, illustrated with excellent pictures by Lester G. Hornby. Part of the profits arising from the story's sale will be used to aid the orphans of France.

"Speaking of Prussians——" (Doran, $0.50), "Mademoiselle Miss" (Butterfield, $0.50), and "The Edith Cavell Nurse from Massachusetts" (Butterfield, $0.60) are little books on the war. In the first, Irvin S. Cobb, who witnessed the invasion of Belgium in the fall of 1914, shows "What war means in its effects upon the civilian populace of a country caught unawares and in a measure unprepared," especially when the invaders are Prussians. In his striking, effective way the author then urges his fellow-countrymen to make such a state of things impossible here. The second volume is a series of letters written home by an American woman who is nursing the wounded in France. There are lifelike descriptions of a routine day in an army hospital at the front, the astonishing gaiety of the patients is shown, and their consoling death-beds are vividly pictured. For instance:

> The last day our faithful priest confessed him—he knew just enough French for that—and it was moonlight when he went, one of us kneeling either side. After Extreme Unction he pressed my hand; and suddenly a marvelous change passed over his face as if it had grown white and luminous. "Mama," he murmured, "Louis," then fainter and sweeter—"O mon bon Dieu," and it was over, and nothing remained but a radiating smile.

A wounded Havre lad gallantly called "Mademoiselle Miss" "Lieutenant of the Life Guards." The third book contains a short account of another American woman's experience as a nurse with the British Expeditionary Force in France, but most of the volume is filled with the story of Edith Cavell's imprisonment, trial and execution. The proceeds from the sale of the two latter books will be devoted to the relief of those wounded in France.

A picture will fix a static scene. But as the anniversaries come round a priest must often wish he had something more than the mere photographic record of the day of his ordination. This "something more" will be found in "Our Anniversaries" (Herder, $0.35), which Father Joseph V. Nevins, S.S., has adapted from the French of Abbé Graduel. It is a little book of meditations designed for the priest's birthday and for the other red letter days of his life up to ordination. The meditations are short, but full of meat, and will carry the man back in prayer to the thoughts and emotions, that could not be fixed on a photographic plate, of those bygone days.——"The Chief Evils of the Times," by the Rev. H. Nagelschmitt, and "The Love of God and of the Neighbor," by the Rev. J. V. Schubert, are two recent publications of J. F. Wagner, Inc., New York. They are evidently intended to serve as homiletic helps for priests upon whose time the routine work of ecclesiastical administration makes heavy demands. The first is a course of seven sermons for Lent. Each of these sermons is a warning against some disposition of mind or heart easily observable in modern life as an influence working against the rights of God and the spiritual interests of mankind. Father Schubert's work is a series of suggestive outlines for instructions to children on the Ten Commandments. It ought to prove serviceable to those who are charged with the duty of forming in the young a right spirit with regard to the Divine laws that regulate man's relations with God and with his neighbor.

Among the finer lyrics in "To Mother" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00) an excellent "anthology of mother verse," are two poems on Our Lady: "Regina Coeli," by Coventry Patmore, and "Christ the Mendicant," by Father Tabb:

> Say, did his sisters wonder what could Joseph see
> In a mild, silent little Maid like thee?
> And was it awful in that narrow house,
> With God for Babe and Spouse?
> Nay, like thy simple, female sort, each one
> Apt to find Him in Husband and in Son,
> Nothing to thee came strange in this.
> Thy wonder was but wondrous bliss:
> Wondrous, for, though
> True virgin lives not but does know,
> (Howbeit none ever yet confess'd)
> That God lies really in her breast,
> Of thine He made His special nest
> And so
> All mothers worship little feet,
> And kiss the very ground they've trod;
> But, ah, thy little Baby sweet
> Who was indeed thy God!

> A Stranger, to His own
> He came; and one alone
> Who knew not sin,
> His lowliness believed,
> And in her soul conceived
> To let Him in.
> He naked was, and she
> Of her humanity
> A garment wove:
> He hungered; and she gave,
> What most His heart did crave,
> A Mother's love.

Shifting War Burdens on Posterity

IN the preceding issue of AMERICA I contrasted some of the moral and economic aspects of bonds and taxes. Proponents of extensive government loans urge that bonds be issued so that "posterity may help bear the burden and pay its share of the cost of keeping 'the world safe for democracy.'" True, posterity should pay its rightful share, but the fact is that posterity cannot relieve the nation of any appreciable portion of the present cost. Only if our Government could float loans outside of the United States to finance this war, which is highly improbable, could some of the burden be shifted to posterity. A few classes within the nation might lend the Government, with a promise of repayment by other classes in the future, but the nation as a nation cannot transfer the burden to posterity.

A WEAKENED POSTERITY

THE facts are that we have a given amount of labor power, capital, goods and land, which contribute to current production; and current production must furnish war equipment and food. A 1930 shell cannot be shot in 1917. Munitions, food, clothing, and practically all that is necessary for war must be produced as we fight. They must be paid for by somebody during the war period, unless the Government is to seize them without payment. Industries of peace must thus be diverted into industries of war. As a nation we must curtail consumption of the less necessary commodities, and of luxuries, and turn a large part of the forces which have been used in their production to military purposes. It is evident that current income must provide the goods of war, and that the burden of war financed at home cannot be put off on posterity.

Indeed, generations yet unborn most certainly will suffer from this war in at least two ways, irrespective of whether bonds or taxes are employed in war finance. First, theirs will be an impaired heritage, if the conflict lasts any appreciable time. Secondly, in this case, upon them will devolve the well nigh interminable payment of pensions. It is patent that if a father sustains loss of life or limb, the burden is put upon his children, in the sense that they will not receive as great an inheritance as they otherwise would have received. Again, all munitions, arms, and other materials consumed in this war mean the utter destruction of an equivalent amount of capital goods, that is, goods to be used in further production of wealth, which otherwise would have been our bequest to posterity. Posterity is then just so much poorer, inasmuch as it cannot in any way escape these dire consequences.

OUR DUTY TO THE PRESENT

ON the other hand, this Government is still paying liberal pensions to Civil War veterans or their widows, and for some time will continue to pay large sums to Spanish-American War veterans. What pension funds will amount to in the future, if the present war assumes the ominous proportions that now seem probable, no one can foretell. But this much is certain, a pension fund will saddle upon posterity such financial obligations in the way of payments, that future generations will perforce adequately make grateful return for the liberty, safety and democracy guaranteed it by the present generation.

Although it might be argued that the payment of pensions is but equivalent to the transfer of funds in the future from certain classes to others, thereby technically imposing no burden, still pensions are burdensome in at least three respects. The receipt of pensions is likely to minimize the motives for production in the recipients, thus decreasing the total possible production of wealth, the social dividend. Again, the administration of pension funds is an added cost and, finally, levies of taxes for pensions will unduly swell the opposition toward taxes for other purposes. In the sense that is usually meant, posterity cannot bear the present burden. Munitions not yet created and men not yet born cannot be hurled against the enemy's lines. If we can finance the expenditures of war at all, we can do it on a cash taxation basis. Borrowing at home creates neither men nor munitions. The nation as a whole simply cannot put off the burden.

Admitting, for the sake of controversy, the fallacious contention that the burden can be shifted to posterity, would it be feasible to continue further bond issues, with their consequent higher price levels, just to give the vast majority in the future the privilege of paying interest and repaying principal to a comparatively select minority, who will be the holders of the greater number of the bonds? Again, is it expedient to tax ourselves in the present through higher prices, simply to give posterity the chance to pay taxes in the future?

SOME PROPOSED TAXATION

FROM these considerations and others on the advantages of the tax policy, previously developed in the discussion of the morality and economics of war finance, the writer presents for serious deliberation the extreme desirability of taxation measures. Congress already is contemplating the incorporation into a fiscal policy, to a greater or lesser degree, of several proposals: (1) Drastic taxes on socially inefficient production, and on consumption of things we do not need. Saving in consumption must be made popular in order to conserve the national social income, and direct the combined efforts of America toward the production of the necessities of life and war, striving to bring the present war issue to a speedy and successful termination. All national hysteria, however, must be guarded against. "Waste is bad, but an undiscriminating economy is worse." (2) A material lowering of the present personal income tax exemption: progressive taxes on all incomes in excess of $1,000 or $1,200, of perhaps ten per cent, with a sharper progression in rates, up to ninety per cent if necessary, on all incomes of $100,000 to $200,000 and over. (3) A material increase, during the war, of the corporation income tax rates and excess profits rates. (4) A tax which will take substantially all of the special war profits above six per cent or eight per cent on capital stock.

THE OPINION OF EXPERTS

OVER three hundred economists and political scientists, including Fisher, Carver, Durand, Hart, Commons, Sprague, Young and Gray, have subscribed to a "Memorial of American Economists to Congress Regarding War Finance," prepared by the University of Minnesota, Department of Economics. It is therein urged that in the future taxation be made the major source of war revenue. Furthermore, President Wilson in his War Message to Congress on April 2 said:

> It (the war) will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation. I say sustained so far as may be equitable by taxation, because it seems to me that it would be most unwise to base the credits which will now be necessary entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

Justice demands the tax policy. The man who goes to the trench cannot be paid back the life or limb he may lose. The purchaser of bonds is not only guaranteed the repayment of the principal but likewise receives interest for the use of his money. That the soldier or sailor who gives himself to his country should, if he be so fortunate as to return, be taxed to pay interest and repay principal to bondholders, who have given only money, and made only a trifling sacrifice is the crassest form of injustice. Our army and navy will fight loyally in any case, but their spirit will be the more indomitable if they feel that every man who stays at home is serving his country to the utmost of his ability. The question of taxes versus bonds is thus not merely one of economics, it is one of right against wrong.

EDUCATION

The Coming Crusade

IT is dangerous to speak in superlatives. Yet it is no exaggeration to say that one of the most important events in our Catholic educational life is the appeal recently sent out by the new Mission Crusade Bureau to the students of our academies, colleges, seminaries and universities. A series of questions was proposed, inviting a reply by mail, while the inauguration of a vigorous crusade in the interest of home and foreign missions was confidently promised for the next scholastic year. The Bureau itself is in charge of a committee of students at the mission center of Techny, Illinois, and is merely provisional in its nature. It is immaterial by whom the impetus is given. If the faculties and pupils of our Catholic institutions of higher learning will give to this appeal the response it merits, the publication of this invitation can become epoch-making for the Church. These are large words, but lest the language used may appear excessive it will be well to give a brief glance at the results of a similar appeal made some decades ago to the Protestant students of the public and denominational institutions of the United States and Canada.

STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT

THE Protestant Student Volunteer movement goes back for its antecedents to a series of lectures delivered at Cambridge by the revivalist Moody in 1882. A handful of students, prominent in university life, then enlisted for the Chinese missions. The spark thus enkindled quickly spread the fire of missionary enthusiasm through the universities of England. Soon the blazing torch, lit at these flames, was handed across the seas, and a four weeks' missionary conference of American and Canadian students was held in 1885, which led to the most far-reaching consequences. Among the hundred students who there enrolled for missionary service was the well-known propagandist John R. Mott. In that conference, too, was adopted the slogan, "The evangelization of the world in this generation," a watchword intensely expressive of student enthusiasm and the unbounded hope and optimism of youth. (AMERICA, Vol. XII, p. 192.)

The movement thus organized did not presume to send out missionaries in its own name, but became a country-wide recruiting agency, whose stations were established in American and Canadian educational institutions of every kind. Its military nature gave to it a special appeal and its call for the evangelization of the entire world during the student's own lifetime was like a clarion note summoning to a charge on the results of which the fate of all mankind was to depend. The recruits won for the movement were in due course submitted to the properly authorized mission boards and societies.

"The movement is well officered and is conducted in hearty cooperation with the mission boards," reads the report of the Home Department of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions made in 1914. "Its services were never more appreciated than in the past year. This organization, through the activities of its New York office and the visits of its traveling secretaries, is, under God, producing a steady stream of missionary volunteers."

Thirty years after the first conference of American and Canadian students, held in 1885, the Student Volunteer Movement had extended to 1,500 educational institutions of every class in the two countries, and in less than thirty years had actually placed in the mission field 6,490 students, and had girdled the globe with its army of volunteers. According to the records in the movement's office on December 31, 1915, the following assignments of students recruited by it had been made up to that date: Africa, 682; Arabia, 26; Central America, 41; China, 1,972; India, Burma and Ceylon, 1,273; Japan and Korea, 808; Latin and Greek countries of Europe, 31; Mexico, 170; Oceanica, 67; Persia, 57; Philippine Islands, 180; Siam, Laos and Straits settlements, 118; South America, 405; Turkish Empire, 237; West Indies, 188; other countries, 235.

It is then no exaggeration to say that sending a similar mission message to our Catholic students at this critical moment is perhaps the most important single event that has come to pass in our American Catholic college life, provided our faculties and students will give to it the proper response. If the Protestant students could enroll 6,490 active mission volunteers in thirty years, how many more should our Catholic Student Volunteer movement be able to furnish within the same space of time? The answer depends upon the zeal of the presidents, faculties and students of our Catholic institutions of higher learning. Who can measure the result which such an army of tens of thousands of additional workers will mean to the propagation of the Faith? Why should not Catholic students too propose to themselves the conversion of the entire world within the lifetime of their own generation, so far as under God's Providence may be possible?

ORGANIZING THE ARMY

THE most effective work of the Protestant Student Volunteer Movement is done through its secretaries who from their central office in New York travel among the educational institutions of all kinds in Canada and the United States, and thus constantly keep the missionary zeal aglow or fan it into new ardor in the mission circles organized everywhere. Conferences and conventions, regularly held in different parts of these two countries, are another important factor. In the institutions themselves, whether public or private, the work is carried on, as the General Secretary writes, through promotion of missionary intelligence, by means of voluntary classes for the study of foreign missions; through distribution of mission literature suitable to the students; through meetings of various kinds in educational institutions of all grades; through enlisting students to contribute generously toward the support of foreign missions; and through the work and influence of individual Student Volunteers, and the Student Volunteer bands in different institutions. The students' offerings to the cause are liberal. For the year 1914-15 they amounted to $218,652, not including the sums given by the students to their individual churches. Yet the significance of these gifts "lies not so much in the amount reported as in the educational value of the process of securing contributions."

PROMOTING THE HOME APOSTOLATE

WORTHY of particular attention in this connection is the fact that the work of our Catholic home apostolate and vocations to the priesthood and the Religious Orders will doubtless increase according to the measure of generosity with which the cause is espoused. The reason is evident, for there is nothing that brings home more forcibly and continually the value of a human soul and the nobility therefore of using every energy in order to promote the eternal salvation of souls, than insistence upon the mission idea. Students whose minds are filled with such thoughts will be apostles in whatever circumstances they may thereafter be placed. Protestants have in their own way experienced the tremendous influence of the mission idea upon their own communicants. "Among the influences which are making towards the development of the spiritual and religious life of students, and directing this life towards the evangelization of the world," writes a Protestant professor of theology, "none is comparable in importance to the organization known as the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions."

As a practical illustration, the General Secretary cites a letter of a Student Volunteer, who during a single vacation brought together the ministers of his small town for concerted efforts, and became instrumental in founding an organization for girls and another for boys, together with similar organizations for married men and women, besides accomplishing other work in reclaiming men who had drifted into vice. The group of girls organized two other groups, and one of their number, who volunteered for foreign missions, returned to college and began a similar work there. So the ripples spread. "If I knew," writes another Student Volunteer, "which (mission) Board would give me the hardest place, the place for which there are fewest workers, then I would know which Board is my Mission Board, for I long to go to the place where no one else wants to go and do the work which is most neglected." If the Student Volunteer movement can produce such results in Protestant students what should not its effect be among Catholic students, with the certainty of their convictions and the strength of the Sacraments to support them?

Scope of the Movement

IT must not be thought that such students only as intend to volunteer for the home or foreign missions are to join the mission circles. In the Student Volunteer movement four purposes are mentioned which would naturally suggest themselves likewise to a Catholic student missionary movement when thoroughly organized. The first is to awaken and maintain intelligent and active interest in the foreign missions on the part of all Christian students in the United States and Canada. The second is to enroll qualified student volunteers to meet the demands of the missionary boards; this would find its own application in our Catholic colleges and academies. The third is to aid not only such mission students, but likewise to cooperate in the promotion of missionary interests in the home churches. The last is to encourage all members who may later belong to the home clergy or laity to continue, as long as they live, to further missionary enterprise by their intelligent advocacy, generous offerings and fervent prayers.

The Catholic Mission Crusade Bureau makes its first appeal to our Catholic students with the declaration that its exclusive aim is "to promote the mission interests of the Catholic Church in general, and not of any particular society or congregation." Its purpose is the propagation of the Faith both at home and abroad. In the next place, although the Bureau is at present located at Techny, Illinois, whither all communications are to be addressed, it is "merely a provisional institution" intended to serve as a temporary central agency. "As soon as the movement is well under way, it will gracefully retire to make way for one of a more permanent character." There is consequently no possible reason why every Catholic academy, college and university, whether for boys or girls, should not heartily enter into cooperation with it at once. Protestant students have given us an example which we must not be content merely to emulate, but we must surpass them. A momentous opportunity is offered; a world-crusade has been declared. Wars and rumors of wars, as the Bureau rightly says, should not divert our attention. "Though the world should totter on its foundation we cannot lose sight of the cause of Christ." Here is the spirit that wins. Catholic students cannot refuse to answer the summons and join in the one great cry: "God wills it!"

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Onward March of Prohibition

THE American Wine Press calls the attention of its readers to the fact that after July 1, 1917, the shipping of alcoholic beverages in interstate commerce will be forbidden in the following States: Maine, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Kansas, North Dakota, Iowa, Colorado, Nebraska, Idaho, Oregon, Washington, Arizona, and South Dakota. Prohibition has furthermore been adopted and will go into effect in Utah, August 1, 1917; Indiana, April 2, 1918; Michigan, April 30, 1918; New Hampshire, May 1, 1918; Montana, December 31, 1919; Alaska, January 1, 1918, and District of Columbia, November 1, 1917. In contrast with our own regulations the review states that the French Government has so far requisitioned during the present year 200,000,000 gallons of French wines and 40,000,000 gallons of Algerian wines as an allowance for its soldiers, "whose efficiency and health are second to none."

Worse Than a Lost Battle

THE San Francisco Bulletin strongly combats the suspension of labor legislation owing to the war. The suggestion in particular has been made that the laws forbidding the employment of children under sixteen years in the mines be set aside under present circumstances. Most of the existing labor laws, the Bulletin replies, rest on sound sociological and biological knowledge and were enacted because prevailing conditions were deteriorating the human race:

> For "efficiency" during a few years children and mothers of children were being crippled for life. Boys under 16 years have been kept out of the mines because it was shown that work underground at any early age prevented them from growing up into strong and healthy men. If this restriction should be lifted a certain number of boys who would ordinarily reach healthy manhood during the next decade, will have their lives shortened or their future usefulness seriously impaired. If the restrictions upon the working conditions of women are lifted the birth-rate will decline, the death-rate among babies will increase, and the health of the next generation will be somewhat poorer. For the sake of a slight addition to the national productivity now the welfare of twenty years hence would be sacrificed. If this sacrifice were necessary to present national survival it might cheerfully be made, in the same spirit in which young men go to the firing line, but until the conspicuous consumption of luxuries and vanities has been greatly cut down it is unnecessary and would be a wicked folly.

The suspension of every really humane law, as the paper rightly says, is as bad as a lost battle. It may even be far worse in its consequences.

Medieval Culture

IN one of the lectures on Gothic art, delivered by Mr. Ralph Adams Cram before the Art Institute, of Chicago, two years ago, and just now published, he pays the following enthusiastic tribute to the culture of the Middle Ages:

> The Middle Ages form a period of notably high culture but of comparatively undeveloped civilization. That this distinction is possible is proved by many eras of history, and it must be recognized if we are correctly to understand and estimate this particular period. Culture is made up of three elements—philosophy, religion and art; civilization is measured by the degree to which a people has diverged from barbarism in motives, manners, and customs. Greece was a center of supreme culture, but her civilization was of no high order; Rome was superbly civilized, but in philosophy, religion, and art she fell immeasurably below the Greece she had destroyed. During the Middle Ages there was little ground gained in the recovery of the civilization that had disappeared, together with culture itself, during the Dark Ages. Manners at first were rude and direct, civil government rudimentary, industry carried on by very primitive methods, material efficiency almost unknown, and yet philosophy rose to transcendent heights, religion, both in theology and in action, was vital, commanding, loftily beautiful, and of a nature that endures forever, while art, in whatever category, rose out of the nothingness of the tenth to the dizzy heights of the thirteenth century, where it forms a goal of emulation thus far unattainable by succeeding generations. Civilization is an excellent means to an end, if that end be character or culture, but if it is unfruitful of either, or if it produces only the Dead Sea fruit of Kultur, it is no more than the tree that bringeth forth evil fruit, and it is cut down and cast into the fire. Culture, on the other hand, does not necessarily follow from civilization, nor does it always have issue in civilization or in that human character which is the object of life itself. Sometimes it casts its glamour over very evil conditions indeed, as in Greece and Byzantium, just as civilization blinds us to equally evil conditions in the later Renaissance and in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, when true culture is at a lower ebb than at any time for 600 years. But the medieval period was not of this nature, and then, whatever we may say of efficient civilization, the culture of philosophy, religion and art did produce character of the highest, while in itself it finds few rivals in the preceding centuries or in those that have followed.

No sadder and clearer indication of the world's utter lack of true culture in this year of grace, 1917, need be sought than this dreadful war in which nearly all the so-called "civilized" nations are now engaged. It is hard to imagine such a state of things in the "dark" and "uncivilized" thirteenth century.

Resolutions of the Central Verein

A SPECIAL war-meeting was recently held by the Executive Board of the German Catholic Central Verein, representing more than 1,700 charitable, benevolent and fraternal societies. "Love of one's country," says the first of the patriotic resolutions drawn up by the Board, "is natural to man. Ennobled and fostered by the spirit of Christianity it produces the fairest fruits." Upon the apostolic admonition, "Let every soul be subject to higher power," the society bases the pledge of its unswerving fidelity: "We know therefore what duty demands of us, what we owe to our country, the United States, and we are ready to act accordingly." In our national crisis is given the greatest opportunity of utilizing for the common welfare all the leagues and branches of the organization.

> The present crisis demands of us extraordinary efforts. Times of war test not only the physical but still more the moral fiber of a nation. They test the people's sense of social duty and its faculty for organized effort. It becomes therefore our duty to increase and intensify all of those activities, heretofore carried on, which may tend to assist and strengthen the moral, physical and material preparedness of our country; and to initiate such new endeavors as may seem necessary. We must not remain indifferent or inactive, we must demonstrate to our people how to meet the difficulties arising from war. Instruction and organization, ever the watchword of the Central Verein, must be insisted upon even more than formerly.

The Executive Board calls particular attention to the need of meeting at once the moral dangers to which a nation is exposed in time of war, of bringing all the powers of the organization into cooperation with the municipal, State and national authorities, and of helping to solve the difficulties of the time by legislation and individual initiative. One of its principal functions will be "to act as conciliator and arbitrator between the various nationalities making up our population." More than ever, says the Executive Board, are the meetings and work of the Central Verein to be insisted upon as of national importance.

The Great Lady and the True Lady

RUTH SHEPHARD PHELPS in the North American Review discusses Mrs. Putnam's definition of a lady as distinguished from other women by the number of things she may not do. It is "the hierarchic lady of the social order" that is set before us; the lady whom society makes and can unmake, and who forfeits her social privileges if she transgresses society's rules. "At her best she is a precious thing. She is elegance, she is grace; she is rarity and costliness; she is ornament, decoration, sometimes even she is beauty; and at her fairest she seems worth all she may have cost to anybody." Her opposite, who has sprung up outside the walled garden of society, is "a person." But there is a vast gulf between the true lady and the merely great lady.

> The true lady resembles the great lady in being distinguished by the things she may not do; the difference is in her sanction. Those are things she will not let herself do, her inhibition comes from within; the other's from without. She blooms upon every level, in every parterre, she and her opposite, and we may often find them the children of one mother.
> We can best understand many things by looking first at what they are not; and the lady is not a martyr, nor an "egoette," nor a curmudgeon, nor a cat. She never makes scenes, and her feelings are never hurt; she never sets you right, never condescends to score, never puts you in the wrong, but quietly creeps into the wrong herself; she is unselfish, but willing, with a superhuman touch of unselfishness, not to appear so; she can give over woman's most cherished attitude, forego the martyr's crown, and seem to be always doing what she likes. She is able and willing, in short, to do entirely without credit and to be paid with an uncomprehending love; willing to be misunderstood! Indeed her virtues are for the most part so difficult and uncongenial to unregenerate feminine nature, that we can only wonder and admire on reflecting how many women have succeeded in being ladies at all.
> We are not asking a new version of an old question—The Lady or the Christian?—for either without the other is a lame and imperfect being. The lady may in her softness be facile, and fail at some crisis for lack of iron in her. The Christian, on the other hand, who is imperfectly a lady, is capable of keeping for her nearest and dearest a self so unbeautiful that not one person of her acquaintance would recognize it as a portrait of her. So we must have them both; and this is not one of life's true dilemmas, for we can have them. The Christian must provide the motive, in love of someone or something other than herself; while it is the lady who must see that the sacrifice is performed in a way to make no one uncomfortable. She must suffer as a Christian, but smile as a lady; to smile as a Christian would make her a martyr and spoil the picture.

The distinction between the true Christian woman and the true lady does not exist in fact, but is merely assumed to explain in their completeness the functions of the Christian lady, which are inseparably blended. It is because she is a Christian that she can smile in making her unnamed sacrifices, and it is because she is a true Christian that she does not call attention to them. That smile moreover is not a mere glint of sunshine upon icy waters, for deep down in the depths of her heart there is an even brighter radiance and a peace whereof the world knows not. She is giving her woman's love in return for a love that is Divine.

Chronicle

Home News.—In an open letter to his clergy, Cardinal Gibbons indorsed the Liberty Loan, and asked that parishioners be urged to subscribe to it. After explaining the nature of this loan and its purpose, "that the present aims and objects of our country shall be fully financed and our national interests safeguarded," the Cardinal called for a generous subscription as the best evidence of unswerving devotion to the cause of our country. He concluded with the following strong appeal:

Catholic Prelates and the Liberty Loan

> I would therefore impress upon the clergy of the archdiocese that they do all in their power to further the work, to the end that these bonds may be fully subscribed. I would suggest that on next Sunday, June 3, you urge your people to subscribe to the loan. The seriousness of the situation cannot be overestimated. It is something of personal interest coming home to each one of us. Let it not be said that we were weighed in the balance and found wanting.

A similar message was sent by Cardinal Farley to the priests of his archdiocese to be read at all the Masses. Attention was called in it to the duties connected with Registration Day, and, as a further spur to patriotism, he added:

> The percentage of Catholics already enlisted in the volunteer units and in training in the Officers' Reserve Corps shows that our young men of military age are imbued with the same ardent and devoted patriotism which has distinguished their Catholic ancestry in the military annals of our country. On Tuesday next not only will the youth of the country be enrolled, but the quality of our patriotism will be tested.

He finally asked the people to attend the rallies to be held previous to registration, "in order to catch up more fully and fulfil more devotedly the high and solemn duties before us."

In the same spirit Archbishop Mundelein pledged himself to take a large block of Liberty bonds, and urged each parish to follow his own example. Should any parish be too poor to invest even $100, he said, it was to borrow the amount, and he would later buy the bonds at the price paid if it was found necessary to dispose of them. He thus expressed his motive:

> The purpose of our action is to show to the people of Chicago, and especially our Catholic people, that the Church feels it a positive duty at this time to aid the nation in every way it possibly can in return for the peace and liberty that the Church has always enjoyed in the United States. We will lend every aid, every encouragement, and every assistance to our country at this time when our country needs us.

At a conference which took place at Cathedral Hall every congregation was pledged to support the Liberty Loan.

The War.—No important results have been achieved during the past week on any of the war fronts. Fighting in France has been on a comparatively small scale, although the Germans made a number of unsuccessful attempts to retake the ground recently lost in the vicinity of Laffaux and the Craonne plateau; their attacks have been especially violent against the heights of the Moronvilliers ridge. In the region of the Isonzo the Italians have been making vigorous but unavailing efforts to dislodge the Austrians from their positions on Monte Santo and the Vodice ridge, and have had in turn to repel a number of assaults on their own lines, especially at Hills 126, 174, 592 and 652, and on San Giovanni. Activity on a small scale has been reported in Macedonia, and an intermittent offensive on the part of the Russians near Smorgon.

Bulletin, May 21, p.m.-June 4, a.m.

The censorship section has been dropped from the Espionage bill. Having been already definitely rejected by the Senate, the substitute offered for the Gard House amendment needed only to be voted out by the House to disappear from the bill. On May 31 it was finally rejected by the House by a vote of 184 to 144, and the conferees were ordered to eliminate it from the bill altogether. It will not come up before Congress again unless it is offered in a separate bill or is incorporated into some other bill. To the very end the Administration endeavored to pass this legislation, but it is said that no further efforts will be made to force its passage, largely because the riots in Cleveland and Chicago had rendered it advisable to get the other provisions of the Espionage bill on the statutes as soon as possible in order to enable the Executive Department to deal effectively with similar situations, should they recur.

The Senate Financial Committee is disposed to view with apprehension the intrusion of the tariff question into the war legislation. The horizontal advance of tariff rates provided for in the House bill by the imposition of a ten per cent ad valorem tax on every item of the existing statute, in so far as it affects raw materials, will probably be eliminated; in so far as it affects other articles on the list it will probably undergo a good deal of revision, if it is not thrown out altogether.

The War Revenue Bill

The Committee has decided to substitute stamp taxes in the Senate bill for the taxes imposed by the House on manufacturers' gross sales; it has also dispensed with the House tax on pianos, organs and other musical instruments not operated mechanically, but retains the tax on instruments operated mechanically. Taxes on jewelry, chewing gum and moying-picture films were also struck out, and a tentative substitute was accepted, which was left vague as to details, providing for taxes on confectionery.

The Senate Financial Committee favors taxes on club-dues, admission to places of amusement, including motion-pictures that charge an admission of over twenty-five cents, on yachts and pleasure-boats, on athletic goods, perfumery, cosmetics, patent medicines, soft drinks, and an ad valorem tax on motor-cars to be levied on owners. With the exception of some modifications of the tax on cigars, the Senate Committee has retained the House schedule for internal revenue taxes on tobacco and tobacco products. An import tax on coffee, tea and cocoa, an excise tax on sugar, and a tax on parcel-post packages, have been written into the Senate plan; but the tax on express packages has been reduced, also that on passenger and Pullman tickets, and on munitions.

The question of mail-rates affecting newspapers and periodicals has not yet been definitely decided, although the Committee has rejected the House provisions for taxing second-class matter. One of the suggestions discussed was proposed by Senator Hardwick, which provided for the retention of the rate of one cent per pound on the "portion of the publication devoted to reading-matter other than advertising," and for a sliding scale of increased taxation on the advertising sections as follows: "Until June 30, 1918, three cents a pound; July 1, 1918 to June 30, 1919, six cents a pound; July 1, 1919, and thereafter, eight cents a pound." To this proposal there was strong opposition on the ground that such a tax was confiscatory, more drastic and unfair than any tax yet proposed. By it $20,000,000 would be raised in the first year and a larger amount in subsequent years. The Committee are now at work on a proposal which may satisfy the demands of the Post Office Department and not prove an unequal burden on publishers. Senator Simmons, Chairman of the Senate Financial Committee, informed representatives of publishers that they would certainly have to bear their share of the war-tax, and that a second-class mail-tax of some kind was almost certain to be imposed. The publishers signified their readiness to bear a portion of the burden, but declared almost unanimously that they preferred a tax on advertising, as the mail-tax would be ruinous.

The Secretary of the Treasury insists that a gross levy of not less than $1,800,000,000 should be made, but from present indications it would appear that the total of the Senate Revenue bill will not reach a higher figure than $1,500,000,000.

On May 28 the House adopted without opposition an amendment to the Army and Navy Deficiency bill, as already passed by the House. The amendment, which was offered by Mr. Fitzgerald, Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, was in substance the same as the Senate measure and authorizes the appropriation of $750,000,000 to be expended in building merchant ships. This raises the appropriation for the army and navy to a sum exceeding $3,400,000,000. The other amendments made by the Senate to the House bill were rejected. As a consequence the bill has been referred to a conference of both Houses. The amendment relating to shipping introduced by Mr. Fitzgerald confers on the President authorization:

The Army and Navy Deficiency Bill

(1) To order from any person such ships as he may deem necessary for the national defense. (2) To modify, cancel, requisition or suspend the performance of any contract made for any purpose which requires labor that might be used for shipbuilding. (This is the provision Representative Lenroot attacked). (3) To requisition the output of any factory or to take over any factory required for shipbuilding. (4) To acquire any vessel owned by an American citizen or corporation, along with its equipment. (5) To acquire any dock, wharf, warehouse or fueling, loading, discharging, terminal or other facilities.

The House measure omits all reference to General Goethals, although the Senate draft of the Deficiency bill explicitly names him as the one on whom the President may confer power to carry out the shipbuilding program. It was stated authoritatively in the House that such mention was unnecessary, as there was no serious friction between the Shipping Board and the manager of the Board's Emergency Fleet Corporation. The General, it was said, is to be given a free hand in all that concerns shipbuilding; the Board will exercise all the other functions provided for it by law.

On May 28 the House passed the Food Census bill without a record vote. It provides for an appropriation of $14,770,000 to be expended in a survey of the general food situation, in distributing seeds to farmers, and in stimulating food production. This is the first of the two Administration food bills introduced in the House by Mr. Lever, Chairman of the House Agricultural Committee.

The Food Census Bills

After it had passed the House, Senator Gore, Chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee, asked that the House Food bill with its amendments be substituted in the Senate for the bill already submitted to that body. His request was granted. The Senate passed without a record vote an amendment to the bill which makes hoarding, storage or destruction of food, fuel or other necessities of life with a view to limiting supplies or affecting prices, a felony punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than three years. An exception was made in favor of farmers and others with respect to products of land cultivated by them. Another amendment was added by the Senate restricting trading in futures with the purpose of unduly or unreasonably raising or enhancing the price of wheat or other food cereals to the injury of the people of the United States and providing for the punishment of such offenses by a fine of $500 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both. A third amendment curtails the power given to the Secretary of Agriculture for the investigation of food resources. Other amendments were also made, by one of which the appropriation voted by the House was cut down to $11,000,000. The bill was finally passed by the Senate without a record vote; but as there are some differences between the House and Senate measures, it has been referred to a conference of members of both houses.

The Agricultural Committee of the House has already concluded its hearings on the second Administration Food bill and is now engaged in perfecting it. Complete control of the machinery of food supply and distribution, measures for preventing hoarding, speculation and monopoly, standardization of products, the fixing of minimum and maximum prices, the regulation of grain used for the manufacture of whisky and beer, and the complete prohibition of grain for such purposes should the President deem such prohibition advisable, are some of the measures which are contemplated in the bill; authorization for the Government to take over and operate in extreme cases storage plants, warehouses, elevators, packing-concerns, factories and mines will also be provided for in the bill.

Socialists' Peace Conference

The Austrian and German delegates to the Socialist conference to be held at Stockholm are reported to have drawn up a peace program containing the following articles: (1) No annexations. (2) No indemnities. (3) The south Slavic lands and Austro-Hungarian crown lands to remain in the Dual Monarchy. (4) Finland and Russian Poland to be independent States. Galicia to have autonomy under Austrian sovereignty. (5) Restoration of freedom of commerce on land and sea. (6) Return to the maritime principle established by the Paris Peace Treaty of 1856 and the restriction of mechanical means which may be employed in maritime and air warfare." The delegates oppose the annexation of Belgium and favor Serbia's independence.

Provost-Marshal-General Crowder is engaged in working out regulations to govern exemptions from selective conscription. The details have not yet been published, but it is said that first the quota of men will be drawn for each section, probably by the jury-wheel system; then all claims to exemption will be taken up, individually and not by classes, under the direction of local exemption boards, of which there will be one for each county, and one for each group of 30,000 in cities. These boards, it is said, will be composed entirely of civilians, named by local authorities and approved by the President, and their work will be supplemented by boards of review which are to be established on the basis of one or more for each Federal judicial district. The Department of Justice has issued an official warning that interference with enforcement of the registration will be dealt with severely according to the provisions of the law.

Other Items

On May 28 the Brazilian Chamber passed the first reading of the Government measure, revoking the decree of neutrality in the war between the United States and Germany which passed the Brazilian Chamber April 25, 1917. The measure, which was drawn up by the Committee on Foreign Relations, authorizes President Braz to take the steps necessary for carrying the bill into effect.

The Prince of Udine and the other members of the Italian War Mission were welcomed in the Senate on May 31, when the Prince delivered the message of Italy to the United States. Although the object of the visit is said to be mainly concerned with acquainting the American people with Italian ideals and purposes, economic questions are also a part of its work. The delegates signified in a conference with the Treasury Department that Italy was in favor of creating in union with France and Great Britain a single agency for the purchase of supplies. Another loan of $100,000,000 is being negotiated. The War Mission will visit a number of cities before returning to Italy.

France.—The country has generously provided for the material and social welfare of her war orphans. These children are to become the wards of the nation. They will receive an education such as their parents would have given them had they lived. Whether remaining in the home of their mother, or boarding with some family, in a school or college, learning a trade or tilling the land, they are to get such a training as will fit them for their walk of life. Every opportunity for the development of their character and their intellectual faculties will be put in their way. "Every career, even the very highest," exclaimed M. Bourgeois in the Senate, "shall be opened to the wards of the nation." As the number of these wards will run into the hundreds of thousands the task before the nation is a formidable one.

Catholics and the War-Orphans Bill

To cope with the work a new organization has been created. There is a central bureau in Paris, attached to the Ministry of Public Instruction and administered by a council consisting of senators, of the mayors of large towns, leaders in the social and economic questions of the day, and Government officials. Besides this there are bureaus in the departments presided over by the Prefects. These will apply the law to the various districts, appoint delegates in every parish, and, wherever it may seem advisable, select a guardian who shall be responsible for each ward of the nation.

The whole scheme is comprehensive, practical and worked out with minutest care down to the least detail. At first sight, it seems to be a splendid piece of legislation. And but for one omission it is. When the bill was brought before the Senate, it was pointed out that in the whole elaborate plan there was no room for religious education or instruction. The bureaus which have the practical working out of the scheme are entirely under the control of the Minister of Public Instruction, of advisers and officials either downright radicals or anti-clerical. The same may be said of the department bureaus. The whole machinery is practically State-controlled. There are a few representatives of the private charity organization on the committees, but these are lost in the number of Government officials. No bishops have been called to take a place in the central bureau, no curés to take part in the deliberation of the department councils or to act as delegates.

After long debate the bill was modified and in the council of the central and departmental bureaus, a sufficient number of private members, representatives of commercial organizations and of charitable works was introduced to balance the official members. The guardians were replaced by a board of advisers to act only in behalf of children deprived of all relatives, and it was specially stipulated that no preference should be given to State schools. These are distinct gains. But the proposals of Catholic Senators that the new organization should be amalgamated with the Secours National, or should be attached to the Ministry of Justice, which has less of a partisan and political character than the Ministry of Instruction, were both negatived.

Russia.—Unwilling to wait till the Constituent Assembly meets and takes up the land question, the peasants in their own way are summarily settling it themselves.

Peasants Seizing Lands

It is reported that in many parts of Russia the ownership of land is being taken over by the communal authorities, generally without compensation or for a merely nominal rent, and in some districts the peasants have confiscated the proprietors' horses, plows and seed. There has been some incendiarism but no murder, and in most cases the confiscation has proceeded quietly. In Minsk, however, the agrarian disorders threaten the total ruin of agriculture. Anarchy prevails in many districts of Bessarabia and in the Pskov region a general confiscation of land has taken place. Local governments have been issuing proclamations in an effort to prevent the spread of the movement, but it appears to be advancing.

News came from Petrograd on May 29 that the country is facing an economic situation that, in the opinion of the Socialist ministers, can be met only by bringing the war to a close. Workers in the munitions factories are demanding wages that are greater than the managers' profits. Though wages have been increased from 100 to 150 per cent, the prices of the output have not advanced. The factories are in virtual control of workmen's committees and are threatened with a shortage of material, yet the owners do not dare close the works owing to their fear of the employees, none of whom may be dismissed without the consent of the committees. There is no way of enforcing discipline, and idleness is prevalent.

An Economic Crisis

On May 30, M. Pieschehonoff, the Food Minister, explained the economic state of the country to a congress of officers' delegates from the front. The army required, he said, 18,000,000 poods (a pood being thirty-six pounds) of wheat every week. But that amount is not being supplied; indeed, one week only 5,000,000 poods arrived. Other cereals, especially oats, were also scarce, because the peasants are demanding raw material and iron implements in return for their grain. The munition factories, the Food Minister continued, are in great need of iron. They have on hand only 3,000,000 poods of iron, whereas 30,000,000 are required. He declared that unless the people, particularly the peasants, are prepared to make great sacrifices, Russia is on the eve of a catastrophe.

On June 1, the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates voted to take control of Kronstadt, the large fortress that defends Petrograd. The local Kronstadt branch of the Delegates announced that it does not recognize the Provisional Government, and that all the Government's representatives have been removed from the fortress. On June 2 a few score armed anarchists, accompanied by soldiers and sailors, marched through the main streets of Petrograd carrying black banners, inscribed "Down with Authority," "Down with Capitalists," "Long Live the Social Revolution and the Commune." Labor troubles continue. The Donetz miners demand a minimum wage of $127 a month, and 6,000 Petrograd clerks have struck for double wages, starting from the beginning of the war. That sum would amount to $5,000 to $10,000 for each clerk. Many stores then closed. Minister of War Keronsky's orders to punish desertion with penal servitude are reported to have caused serious rioting at Kiev, where some 15,000 absentee soldiers organized a demonstration. Minister of Commerce Konovoloff has resigned on account of differences with the Minister of Labor regarding economic measures.

Turmoil in Petrograd

Our Censor and Mexico

EBER COLE BYAM

QUITE recently the New York Outlook, in announcing the appointment of Mr. George Creel as executive chairman of the newly-created Committee on Public Information, spoke of him as "an ardent defender of Secretary Daniels and a strong supporter of Mr. Wilson," who "ought to be able, sympathetically, to present the aims and policies of the Administration." Naturally, such a notice drew attention to the man who is to control "public information" for some time to come, and people began to ask for the credentials of the chairman of this all-important committee.

While this discussion was under way my eyes fell upon Mr. Creel's book, "Wilson and the Issues," and as I opened the volume, the following statement from the chapter on Mexico fell under my gaze: "In a country of 15,000,000, 10,000 own every inch of the land." That is very definite and final, but is it true? In 1910, the State of Chiapas, one of the twenty-seven States of Mexico, with a population of 436,817, numbered over 10,000 registered land-owners whose properties were assessed in excess of $200. The assessment rate was very low, and those assessed at less than this amount were not listed and paid no tax. Their number included members of the native tribes, who form quite three-fourths of the population of the State and practically all the land-owners.

In addition to the land owned by individuals, there are in this State several million acres of public land which was available for purchase at four pesos per hectarea. The price was payable, one-half to the State in cash, and the remainder to the Federal Government in bonds of the interior debt, worth about $0.75. This meant a price of 1.42 pesos per acre (about $0.70 gold).

In addition to the public land mentioned, practically every town and village possesses an ejido, or commons, where a farm may be had free by a process similar to the Homestead Law of the United States. These lands are without equal for fertility and enjoy a well-distributed and ample rainfall. They are at an altitude providing a comfortable and healthful climate, and all tropical products can be grown, because frost is unknown. If these acres could be set down within the borders of the United States, and still retain their fertility and climate, they would quickly sell for over $1,000 each.

The State of Chiapas is one of the southern States of Mexico. In size it is some ten per cent larger than West Virginia, and is less densely populated than the State of Washington. Its soil is a marvel of richness and its climate is ideal. The central highlands of Mexico, comprising some 30 per cent of the total area of the country and containing about 70 per cent of its inhabitants, are about as densely populated as the American Middle West. It is not to be expected that, in this region, there can be found any more public land than there is in Illinois. There are some large properties there, just as in Illinois, but there also are a multitude of small holdings. The Indian villages in all this region still hold their communal fields.

The Mexican Indian is distinctively a land-owner. In fact, his classification as an Indian in the census is determined by his residence in an Indian village possessing communal fields. On this basis the population of Mexico is given as 38 per cent Indian. As there are hosts of small land-owners, not so classified, it may be safely said that Mexico has a greater proportion of small land-owners than any other country in the civilized world.

The large "landed estates," so often referred to as an example of "land monopoly" in Mexico, owe their existence to desert conditions that have produced similar properties in the southwestern United States. There are large properties in the central highlands of Mexico, just as there are large properties in the Middle Western United States, and for similar reasons. In the United States there has been a tendency to increase the size of the average farm, while in Mexico the contrary has been the case. Several instances can be cited, off-hand, in support of this statement. For example, the hacienda of De Lencero, once the property of Santa Anna, has been divided into some dozen parts. A hacienda, named San Bartolo, near Morelia, in Michoacan, has been divided into fifteen parts. Another property in Michoacan has been divided into ten parts; another into twelve, and still another into fifty parts. Practically all these divisions occurred during the rule of Diaz. There has been no lack of land in Mexico, nor any impediment to its acquisition.

Having utterly misstated the land problem, Mr. Creel proceeds to say: "Lack of public schools doomed generation after generation to ignorance and illiteracy." This is strange, indeed. Reference to the records will show that a steady increase in the number of schools and school attendance in Mexico caused a steady decrease in the rate of illiteracy. The estimate for 1890 was 80 per cent; in 1900 it was given as 75.3 per cent, and in 1910 it had been lowered to 70.7 per cent. These figures take on a meaning little helpful to Mr. Creel when compared with conditions obtaining in the United States. In twelve southern States of the American Union, the illiteracy-rate runs from 13 per cent to 29 per cent. The American negro is 30 per cent illiterate, and the American Indian 45 per cent illiterate. And this in spite of a host of well-meaning busy-bodies working for their welfare, with the resources of the wealthiest nation on earth at their disposal. If Mexico had devoted the same amount per capita to the education of its 5,700,000 Indians as is appropriated in the United States for its 300,000 Indians, it would have absorbed every penny of its revenues, Federal, State and municipal, and, if it had equaled the United States in results, there still would be 45 per cent illiterate.

The States of the Mexican Union appropriated from a fourth to a third of their incomes to education, and the Federal Government devoted 6 per cent to a like purpose. The Mexican State of Yucatan spent more per capita on education than is spent by any one of seven different southern States of the American Union.

The number of schools in 1910 in Mexico is given at 11,940, with an average daily attendance of 800,000. This means an enrollment of practically 1,200,000. The private and parochial schools numbered approximately 3,000, with an enrollment of upward of 300,000. The total of 1,500,000 represents 40 per cent of the children of school age. When this is compared with the 51.15 per cent for the State of Louisiana, it will be seen that Mexico did not do so badly, after all.

But Mr. Creel is still writing. Labor is now his theme. Of this he affirms: "The toilers of the nation were serfs, compelled to labor all their lives under laws that legitimized slavery and oppression; and from birth to death the great mass of Mexican people bowed under the weight of a vast hopelessness, a paralyzing despair." It it impossible to reconcile this harrowing picture with the fact that wages had been on a steady increase for a number of years. Every employer of labor in Mexico will give abundant testimony about the independence of the Mexican worker.

Between 1898 and 1908 wages for farm hands in Chiapas rose from $1.00 a week to $1.00 a day, and in the Tampico oil districts wages went from 60 cents to $4.00 a day. In some of the remote and backward districts of Mexico there existed isolated instances of mild imitations of the conditions existing throughout the southern United States, in Georgia lumber camps and Alabama cotton fields, for example. Mr. Creel, in this instance, seems to have been looking no farther than his own country, and not at Mexico.

His references to "concessions" and "concessionaires" are quite evidently made without the knowledge that a "concession" in Mexico is a franchise, only that and nothing more. It bears no relation whatever to a monopoly. Mining "concessions" are mining patents, or mining claims; oil "concessions" are contracts to bore for oil, similar to contracts in the United States; railroad "concessions" are railroad franchises, in all of which the Government not only reserved the right to regulate the tariffs and have the mails carried free, but insisted that the roads revert to the Government in ninety-nine years.

There are many other statements in "Wilson and the Issues" as ludicrous as those examined. For instance, "Huerta died in the pay of Germany," and again, "Huerta died with German money in his pockets." Mr. Creel must be the only person in possession of the proof of this interesting charge. But, however that may be, we have seen the bandit now ruling Mexico defiantly shaking the Zimmerman note in Mr. Wilson's face, and asking him what he is going to do about it.

And the following words are strange indeed "With the punitive expedition far into Mexico, every peon aflame with suspicion and distrust, and Carranza balancing between his pledged word to the United States and anger of his own people . . . "

"Suspicion," "distrust," and "anger" hardly square with the truth in the light of the fact that several thousand unarmed Mexicans followed the American troops out of Mexico, preferring to take their chances penniless in a strange land, among a strange people, with a strange language, rather than remain longer where the 85 per cent were getting a "look-in." on the "government" of their own unhappy country.

But if this is queer, the reference to the Vera Cruz matter is still stranger. Mr. Creel hardly cares to urge the flimsy pretext of the "salute to the flag," and, while he lets it be understood that the real reason was the destruction of the only government Mexico had had since Diaz, through the driving out of Huerta, he lays this stress on the stopping of the Ypiranga: "If the delivery of the Ypiranga's cargo was to be prevented, the seizure [of Vera Cruz] had to be made before the steamer's arrival. As a consequence the order went to Admiral Fletcher on April 20." Thus he would have us understand that the whole business was for the purpose of stopping the delivery of the ammunition but he fails to explain that the Ypiranga was permitted to sail down the coast and deliver its cargo to Huerta under the nose of an American gunboat.

But does he not let the cat out of the bag, when he says: "Vera Cruz occupied worked the downfall of Huerta; the rise of a new order permitted the evacuation and the resumption of the policy of non-interference"? So we see that the taking of Vera Cruz was for the purpose of destroying Huerta, and for no other. And the "new order" has risen and submerged the miserable Mexicans under a flood of vile Socialism which has raped and murdered, robbed and destroyed, until stark famine stalks through the land.

This whole Mexican revolution, about which Mr. Creel is so excitedly solicitous, is epitomized in the manifesto issued by Alvarado, the (Carranzista) Governor of Yucatan, in which he said: "Let us remember religion is ignorance, and that as the Revolution triumphs God goes down."

Mr. Creel is the Executive Chairman of the Committee on Public Information. Hereafter may the information he choose to give to the public be both instructive and entertaining and not entertaining only.

The O'Connellite View of Ireland

SIGOURNEY W. FAY, S. T. D.

NO one of Irish blood could fail to have taken an intense interest in the articles that have been appearing in AMERICA on the Irish problem during these last few weeks. They are only one of the many evidences of the urgency of the Irish question, of the absolute need of a settlement which will satisfy the just demands of Ireland and of Irish-Americans. Indeed, upon the Irish question Americans of Irish descent yield nothing in the intensity of their feelings to the Irish living in Ireland, for in this country we feel that America was largely colonized by Irishmen, that our Revolution could never have been accomplished without the great numbers of Irishmen who served in the Continental armies, and that the Irish strain in the American blood is the most vital, the most energetic element which goes to make up the American character.

Ireland is far more the mother country of the United States than is England. There can be no doubt, then, of the great urgency of the Irish problem, and of the desire, not only of Ireland and of Irish-Americans, but of all good men everywhere, to see justice done to a nation to which every western European country, as well as the United States of America, owes so much.

The only question which can divide Irishmen is a question of what is practicable, and in deciding this it seems to the present writer that we should judge the present by the past. Among all those great men who have led the Irish in the last 200 years, who were those who succeeded in accomplishing anything? The moment we ask this, it becomes apparent that for accomplishment we must look to those Irish statesmen who took what is called the constitutional line, and who were content if they could obtain for Ireland an honorable position within the British Empire.

Grattan accomplished something; Flood accomplished something; Parnell accomplished something; Redmond has accomplished a great deal; but before all and above all, the man to whom the Irish race owes most, the man who not only raised the Irish Catholics from a position of intolerable servitude, but who taught Ireland and men of Irish blood everywhere to be proud of their Gaelic inheritance, was Daniel O'Connell. Never has the Irish race produced a man so typical of itself as in the case of the Liberator.

In the present crisis, then, if there is any character in Irish history whom the Irish people would wish to consult if they were able, that person would be Daniel O'Connell, and fortunately for us he has left us his statesmanship in his speeches as in a testament. Let us open his speeches anywhere at random, and we shall find two ideas always present in his mind: First, that Irishmen must be free; and secondly, that that freedom can only be attained within and not without the British Empire. In one of his famous speeches on the Repeal of the Union, the one delivered on June 29, 1813, he spoke of himself as follows:

> Your enemies say, and let them say it, that I wish for a separation between England and Ireland. The charge is false; it is, to use a modern quotation, as "false as hell!" And the men who originated, and those who seek to inculcate it, know it to be a falsehood. There lives not a man less desirous of a separation between the two countries, there lives not a man more deeply convinced that the connection between them, established upon the basis of one king and separate parliaments, would be of the utmost value to the peace and happiness of both countries, and to the liberties of the civilized world.
> Next, your enemies accuse me of a desire for the independence of Ireland. I admit the charge, and let them make the most of it. I have seen Ireland a kingdom; I reproach myself with having lived to behold her a province! Yes, I confess it, I will ever be candid upon the subject, I have an ulterior object, the Repeal of the Union, and the restoration to old Ireland of her independence.

Later on in the speech he told his auditors what was to him his only fear, that they would not succeed in obtaining the object of Repeal. He said:

> Your enemies cannot put you down unless you yourselves lend them assistance. Your cause must triumph, unless you yourselves crush it. You have the fate of Ireland in your hands; upon you, and upon you alone does it depend. Alas for poor Ireland! Her liberties depend upon the prudence of a people of the most inflammable passions, goaded almost to madness on the one hand by Orange insults and oppressions, and exposed at the same time to the secret seductions of the agents and emissaries of those very Orange oppressors. Do you wish to gratify the Orangemen? If you do, the way is before you. You have only to enter into some illegal or traitorous association; you have only to break out into turbulence or violence, and the Orangemen will be delighted, because it will afford them the wished-for opportunity of rioting in your blood. Do you desire to afflict and disgust your friends? If you do the way is open to you. You need only form illegal or seditious societies. You have only to commit some outrage against the public peace, and against your sworn allegiance, and your friends must abandon your cause with contempt and abhorrence.
> In short, your enemies are on the alert. They throw out the language of irritation, and they adopt every measure of oppression to goad you to a violation of the law, to a departure from your loyalty and peaceable demeanor. But it does not rest there. They send round their agents with money, and with pardon for themselves, to preach in private circles the doctrine of insurrection, to form secret knots and associations, to seduce you into crime and then betray you. These miscreants endeavor to obtain your confidence, that they may sell your lives. In the meantime, the Orangemen stand to their arms, ready prepared, primed, and loaded; they stand with the triangle and the gibbet, to torture, to plunder, and to massacre.
> Alas! Alas! my countrymen, see you not the fatal snare? Do you not comprehend the cruel purposes of your betrayers? Yes; my countrymen were never deficient in intellect, they never wanted ready comprehension. They do, and they must perceive that if a single parish, if a single village, nay, if a single individual, exhibits the symptoms of political crime, if a single wish, inconsistent with loyalty, allegiance, peace, be expressed, our enemies will have an excuse, and a justification for their crimes and oppressions. The Habeas Corpus act will again be suspended, the reign of torture will again be renewed, and the cause of Ireland will be lost, and lost for ever.

I am deeply anxious to impress upon those who hear me, or may chance to read a report of what I utter, I am most deeply anxious to impress upon the minds and understandings of every true Irishman that disloyalty to his sovereign would be double treason to his country; it would be perjury, aggravated by folly, and followed by the eternal extinction of the liberties of Ireland. And what prospect could there possibly be of aught besides destruction? You would have no friends, no supporters. We, who now join you in bearing down upon our oppressors, we, who expose the hypocrites that cover their bigotry in the stolen garments of religion, we, who are ready to run every danger, to sustain every calumny, and every loss and personal inconvenience in your cause, so long as you conduct that cause within the limits of the Constitution, we, in whom you confide, would, and must, be found, if you violate the law, in the ranks of your enemies, and in arms!

For myself, I tell you honestly, that if ever that fatal day arrive, you will find me arrayed against you. There will not be so heavy a heart; but there will not be a more ready hand to sustain the Constitution against every enemy.

I have quoted at length from this speech of the Liberator because never in his life did he express his mind more fully or clearly, and what he said at this very early date remained his settled opinion during the whole of his life. In his great work of emancipation he succeeded; his work for repeal was ruined, as the work of Grattan and Flood was ruined in '98, by the impatience of younger men.

The only question for Irishmen and Irish-Americans to ask themselves in the present crisis is: Whom shall we follow—those who have done great things for Ireland and could have done still greater, or those who have undone what their more patient and more far-seeing countrymen had accomplished?

Luther and the State

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

IT is not strange that Luther's attitude towards the State should be greatly misunderstood. The reason is to be found in the contradictory assertions that abound in his writings. He can with equal facility be quoted as the supporter of an absolute separation of Church and State, or as the most extreme advocate of a perfect union of the two. On either side he departed entirely from the Church's practice of forbidding temporal rulers to interfere in purely spiritual interests, and Church authorities from meddling in purely secular concerns. Both, however, may cooperate harmoniously in promoting issues that are neither purely temporal nor purely spiritual, remembering always the difference in value between the things of time and those of eternity.

So striking are the contradictions in Luther's utterances upon this subject that a Protestant authority has made bold to say that the heresiarch's attitude depended entirely upon the sentiment of the moment. This is partly true, but only in so far as that sentiment itself depended upon the principle of expediency, which was Luther's invariable law in dealing with this momentous question.

Those therefore who wish to represent him as the champion of a complete separation of Church and State have only to quote the principles laid down by him on occasions when local princes were unfavorably disposed towards his new teaching. This was particularly the case at the beginning of his career. He then insisted in the strongest terms upon the complete de-Christianization of the State. Its functions "all belong to hell" was Luther's pithy statement in his Kirchenpostille. (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XIV, 2, p. 281.) Such too is the summary of Luther's teaching as given by the Protestant author, Brandenburg. ("Anschauungen vom Staate," p. 13.)

Luther's doctrine at this period was that secular powers have no right to exercise any authority whatsoever over "Christians," a term which he applied exclusively to his followers. Temporal authority was instituted for that world only which is estranged from God: Catholics, Turks, and non-Lutherans in general. "Therefore," he warns the princes, "you cannot extend it [the temporal sword] over and under Christians, who have no need of it." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XXII, p. 73.) Luther's Christians, although under no moral obligation, were to render obedience merely for the sake of social order. The temporal regimen, he says in his Kirchenpostille, "is not instituted for those who belong to Heaven [i.e., his own followers], but merely for this purpose that people may not sink deeper into hell and make their case still worse." (Cf. Grisar, Vol. III, p. 486.)

As Luther, however, won control over secular princes he immediately looked for the support of the secular arm to promote his doctrine. This made it necessary for him to confine his former restriction on the power of temporal rulers to Papistical and non-Lutheran rulers alone, and at times, in a limited degree, even to Lutheran princes in so far as he might fear to lose control of them. Those who favored him, on the contrary, were not merely exhorted to take earnestly to heart the spiritual welfare of their subjects, but likewise to use the full force of their power, to impose punishment, banishment and death in order to preserve inviolate the purity of his New Evangel. The following illuminative passage is taken from a sermon preached by him in 1533:

> Secular authority holds the sword, with the duty of preventing all scandal, that nothing of the kind may break into the realm and work mischief. But the most dangerous and abominable scandal exists when false teaching and incorrect Divine service break into the land. . . . Let it [secular authority] then confidently take preventive action and remember that its office allows of no other course than to use the sword and all power that doctrine be kept pure and Divine service unalloyed and unadulterated. (Erlangen Ed., Vol. I, 2, p. 157.)

Luther did not differ from other originators of new religions in his methods of winning the active support of princes. He held out to them the tempting lure of the confiscation of the property of churches and monasteries, casting over this act of robbery the glamour of righteousness. He moreover gave them the complete spiritual as well as temporal power over their subjects, denying the existence of any other spiritual authority upon earth. In his letter to the Elector John of Saxony, November 22, 1526, Luther reminds the prince that since an end has now been put to the Catholic Church in his dominion, "and all the monasteries and foundations have fallen into the hands of your Electoral Grace, as the supreme head," the Elector must likewise assume the duty and burden of "ordering this matter, which no one else undertakes, nor can or should undertake." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. LIII, p. 386.) To quote at greater length from McGiffert's translation of this same letter, in his "Martin Luther":

Where a city or village has sufficient means, your Grace has the right to require them to support schools, pulpits and churches. If they will not do it for their own good, it is the duty of your Grace, who are the chief guardian of the young and of all in need, to compel them by force to do it, just as they are compelled to contribute money and labor for the building of bridges and roads and for other needed improvements. (Pp. 310, 311.)

It is to be remembered that this compulsion is to be exercised by the Elector over his subjects whether they believe in Luther's doctrine or not. "Worldly lordship," Luther explains in his work "An den christlichen Adel," has now assumed "a spiritual rank." Luther's princes are henceforth of a priestly and spiritual order, mitpriester, mitgeistlich, and free to exercise their power "wherever there is need and use for it."

In the work entitled, "Several Articles which Martin Luther is Prepared to Maintain against the Whole School of Satan" (1530), he takes away all spiritual authority from the church he has founded. Pastors and all higher church officials are told that they have no power to ordain fasting, prayers or Divine services. "Such a one," he says, "may exhort his church that it approve of some fasting, prayer, service, etc., for a time, because of some pressing need, dropping it again at its own will." But the power denied the supposed spiritual pastors over their flocks—if such terms may be used where no spiritual authority exists—is granted in the most absolute way to temporal lords. When the prince sets any fast days, Luther writes to Melanchthon, July 21, 1530, all his subjects are obliged to obey. The secular lord is thus constituted the sole spiritual as well as temporal ruler over all his subjects. To make this fact even more plain Luther adds in the same letter that when princes who are likewise "bishops" issue such orders they are to be obeyed, not because they are bishops, but solely because they are princes. (Grisar, Vol. III, p. 797.)

Luther indeed did not rest until he had introduced the most refined inquisitorial methods enabling princes to prescribe, investigate and control the religious practices of their subjects. He had definitely asked for the appointment of four "visitors" by the Elector of Saxony, who should order Lutheran schools and parishes to be erected wherever they might determine that there was need of them. Two of these visitors were to be skilled in temporal matters, and two were to be theologians, whose duty it was to examine the teachers, the sermons, and the Divine services, and to see that all was carried out in strict accordance with Luther's prescriptions. (Letter to the Elector, November 22, 1526.) In the "Instruktion," consequently issued by the Elector, and with which Luther is most intimately associated, the prince, as supreme head, is said to be in duty bound not to permit any false doctrine or false religious service in his land. The visitors appointed by the prince must exhort the people that the Gospel is to be understood by all according to the interpretation laid down by the prince for his subjects, and they are to support the preachers given them. All "who preach or hold an error in religion are to be told to make good speed in leaving the land, with the warning that if they again set foot upon it they will be punished in real earnest." (Ibid, 501-514.)

We are not to suppose that Luther did not have his well-founded misgivings about these matters, hence the contradictions that again and again occur. Of what avail, however, are veiled protests even at the moment that he wrote the prologue to the very "Unterricht" that was to guide the visitors in the inquisitorial work initiated by him. He had indeed desired a church consisting of independent parish units, but he constantly found it necessary to have recourse to higher powers to prevent innovations.

Luther's principle, in brief, was that there must be no limit to the power of princes in spiritual matters provided they employ it faithfully in enforcing his own doctrine down to the least article. He compares them to David and tells them that they must extirpate all heresy throughout their realm. In his explanation of Psalm 101 (100) he adds to these statements that the spiritual and temporal power of rulers, and the spiritual and temporal obedience of subjects are to be mingled indiscriminately "like a cake." When, however, he finds that his expectations are disappointed he again chances upon the same figure, but now it is the devil who has mingled the ingredients of the cake. Luther entirely forgets that the cake was made after his own recipe.

Luther in fact had accomplished his work more thoroughly than he himself knew. He had delivered religion into the hands of the State, hoping that he himself might remain the power behind the throne. But this hope had proved vain even in his own lifetime and the ultimate result was the complete enslavement of human liberty, for which he must be held responsible, as its modern originator, which found its terse expression in the motto: Cujus regio, illius et religio: "The ruler determines the religion of his subjects."

That this political slavery was introduced by Luther, a writer so hostile to the Catholic Church as Scherr is forced to admit: "Luther was the originator of the doctrine of unconditional surrender to civil power," says this author in his book on "German Culture" (Third Edition, p. 260). "He preached that two and five make seven; that you know. But if the civil government should proclaim that two and five are eight, then you must believe it against your better knowledge and sense. That explains why so many German princes took so kindly to the servile policies of Lutheranism." Luther's constant distinction that the people are forced to conform outwardly only to his doctrines, is a mere verbal evasion. He is the father of the most reprehensible form of political despotism, despotism over the consciences of men.

A Heroine of Charity: Sister Teresa Vincent

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

THREE or four days ago I happened to come across a newspaper clipping, just beginning to yellow with age. It told a story not uncommon in this modern Babylon:

> Yesterday morning Officer Smith saw a bundle sticking out of a refuse-can near Sixty-eighth Street and Avenue A. It proved to be a baby, and at first was thought dead. It was taken to the Foundling Hospital on Sixty-eighth Street.

Yesterday my eyes got just a bit dim when I read this letter on page ten of the "Biennial Report of the New York Foundling Hospital":

> Two weeks ago I received the dear little girl you so kindly sent me. She is just beautiful. . . . She won our hearts at first sight. I have not one fault to find with her. She is the sunshine of our home. Dear Sister, I wish I could thank you personally; it is hard to express our gratitude for baby.

And this:

> A line about our little darling. Our Lord surely sent us a blessing by allowing you to give us the baby. Light shines now where there were only shadows before. Our lives would be blank without her.

Now, I do not know which of these "little darlings" was the pathetic bundle picked out of the refuse-can and adjudged to be dead by Officer Smith. Perhaps neither, but I cannot find three exhibits which tell more strikingly of the sublime work of the New York Sisters of Charity than these quotations. What to you and me is a story that seems too horrible even to be told, is the staple of their daily lives. The epithet is common; ill-usage has made it trite, but no word except "divine" will fitly designate the work of these noble women. The very abnegation of Christ is in their lives. He, in the day of His abiding with us, had joy set before Him, but chose the Cross; that He might save us from eternal loss, and assuage our trials by the sympathy of a Heart that has known all possible human sorrow. So, too, the Sister of Charity. Perhaps your home, you who read these words, is made cheerful by the daughterly service and affection of the young girl, who still a child in her sweetness, betokens in "her little ways of cherishment" the sure promise of a noble womanhood. The world looks bright to her; you consult nothing but her happiness, but you want her to be always near you; you cannot think of the pain of parting. This Sister of Charity, who bends anxiously over the cradle of a once-abandoned infant, bearing, it may well be, in its agonized little body, the marks of the sins of unworthy parents, was once as your own child. She, too, has chosen the Cross. The world promised much, the ties of innocent affection were strong; but she cheerfully gave up all at the call of Christ, to consecrate herself, heart and soul, to the loving service of the outcast, and to embrace with especial charity the most lowly and helpless of all, the babies whom no one wants or cares for.

On September 27, 1860, a young girl, one of these chosen souls, entered the beautiful novitiate of the Sisters of Charity up at Mt. St. Vincent-on-Hudson, New York City. Her name was Jane McCrystal, and she was born in Philadelphia, of which see her kinsman, the Right Reverend John J. McCort, D.D., is now Auxiliary, on July 24, 1842. "There are still living," writes a companion novice, "those who remember the sweet, fervent young novice, whose gentle ways seemed ever to speak of Heaven." On the day of her vows, she was given the name "Teresa Vincent," and well did she imitate her two patrons in her fervent love of God and of the poor. Assigned to St. Peter's Academy, Barclay Street, New York, in 1862, she came under the direction of Sister Irene of blessed memory. But neither was to grow old in the work of education. "For many years," writes Mother Mary Rose, a novice with Sister Teresa, and still at work at Mt. St. Vincent, "the soul of Sister Irene had been stirred to its depths at the thought of so many unfortunate infants abandoned in the streets of the city." Providence had clearly set these two extraordinary women apart, to begin a work of rescue which has since grown to an extent perhaps unparalleled in the history of charity. Early in 1869, Sister Irene was appointed to open a home for these foundlings, and for her encouragement was given five dollars and Sister Teresa, then only twenty-seven years old. The first did not last long; the second was an endowment beyond price. A house was secured on Twelfth Street, but, within a few months, babies hitherto left to die of exposure on the streets crowded the Home. As is the rule in these cases, the Sisters, now five in number, slept on the floor, and took whatever scraps of food they could gather together. In the history of Catholic charity this is an old story. Even at this moment in opulent New York there are Sisters, the victims of a campaign of calumny engineered by the Charity Trust, who are denying themselves food and proper care, that the orphans may want for nothing.

"In those days," recalls Mother Mary Rose, "Sister Teresa used to sleep on the floor, and at dawn, like the Arab, silently fold her tent and steal away," cheerful in the prospect of a long, hard day. Like all whom God has chosen for great work, Sister Teresa was noted for her happy, fun-loving disposition.

In 1871, the central building of the present group on East Sixty-eighth Street was erected. Under the wise and devoted care of Sisters Irene and Teresa the institution grew in efficiency and equipment, until at the present time the great hospital, one of the first in the United States, covers the square between Sixty-eighth and Sixty-ninth streets, and Lexington and Third avenues. Sister Irene died in 1896, full of years and merits. In her stead Sister Teresa was appointed, remaining in charge until her death.

Who can tell the story of those forty-eight years of love and sacrifice? Of the babies who, brought dying into the hospital, were here reborn in Christ, and not knowing the evil of the world, first woke to consciousness with their Saviour in the fields of Paradise? Of the countless, unhappy, erring mothers, who in Sister Teresa saw something of that forgiving love of the merciful Christ which won them, as it won Magdalene, back to peace and purity? Of the 60,000 children who were brought under her hallowing influence? Of the thousands of boys and girls, once outcasts, who now make sunshine in the hearts of foster-parents, or hear in their own homes the laughter of joyous children? All this, and far more, is written in the remembering Heart of Christ.

But the days of sorrow were approaching as wild dogs drew near to rend her work. She who had so closely followed her Saviour in His love of little children was privileged to walk with Him through Olivet to the hill of Calvary. Of plans, as cruel as they are senseless, directed against her work with all the venom usually engendered of embittered apostasy, I may not now speak. The end came almost suddenly; the day before her death, Sister Teresa was actively at work among the children. One thing only ruffled the serenity of her last moments. "Who will baptize these poor little ones?" and the repetition proved the extremity of her anguish. But peace came at the end. She had trusted Him in the days of her girlhood; she would trust Him in the passage through dark waters. Near dawn on May 28 the anxious voice was stilled. She had pleaded for the little ones even to the end.

And now in heaven, whither the prayers of the Holy Innocents will surely bear her as on the wings of Angels

> "A throng of children like to flowers were sown
> About the grass beside, or clomb her knee . . ."

Three thousand people gathered at her funeral in St. Patrick's Cathedral, while the clergy of the city in great numbers were assembled in the sanctuary. The Solemn Mass was sung by the Right Reverend John J. McCort, D.D., of Philadelphia, and the Auxiliary of New York, the Right Reverend Patrick J. Hayes, D.D., spoke in touching phrase of the work of this great woman. "He hath exalted the humble."

But above the mournful chanting of the Requiem and the whispered prayers of baby lips about her coffin, I hear her anguished cry, "Who will baptize these poor little ones?" She moved in our midst as a ministering angel; let us not leave unfulfilled, whatever be the cost, the one wish with which she went to God. In Christ's dear name, we, too, make that pitiful appeal for the abandoned babies of New York.

"How Far That Little Candle Throws His Beams"

JOSEPH FRANCIS WICKHAM, M.A.

IT was a lady of old who said that; a cultivated and clever lady, who might have wanted to vote were she living today, and a niche in the world of affairs. But of this one cannot tell; she lived in her own day. And in her own day she knew the laws of the beautiful city on the Adriatic, and she knew the moonlit watery pathway back to Belmont, and she knew the value of a candle when the moonlight failed. All in all, in the book wherein she lives she doth appear a woman of a vast deal of wisdom conjoined with an infinite fund of humor; and the mingling of the two is an excellent thing in woman—or in man.

Candles and moons, captains and kings, titans and gods, there is ever a lesser and a greater, always a small and a large. Heaven and earth are so built up; the lives of individual men are so measured out, their years are woven of little things and things less small, of tiny, easily forgotten incidents and deeds that loom larger in the point of view.

But I am thinking of poets, major poets and poets minor, wonder-workers and workers in the stuff that is held of cheaper price, of Pindar and Callistratus, of Horace and Lucan, of Dante and Vittoria Colonna, of Shakespeare and Rossetti, of Racine and Delavigne, of Schiller and Uhland, the suns and moons that gleam in a full resplendence and the candles that shine with a softer glow. Is there anything new to be thought of them, any strange and curious intelligence come by the last post out of the beyond, and for which the world has been eagerly waiting? Alas, no; though perhaps there is no place for vain regrets.

If I could only call forth some such message from across the bar, some word from the mysterious far-land where poets dead to us live again in their fields Elysian, some little tidings of the wondrous secret they have solved, it would be worth your staying. You would know whether those that were the mighty here are now walking in their eternal leisure with the humbler laureates, or whether in the trim gardens of the poet's heaven there is a careful reckoning of literary values quite destructive of a true democracy, a precedency and a gradation much like unto the ordering of our own imperfect sphere. But I cannot play the philosopher. I am no Doctor Faustus, nor yet a Mark Antony, with a Cæsar's will in the folds of my toga to aid a will of my own.

And so let us converse with one another, and not with the dead. What think you of poets? What think you of the bardic prophets, and of the singers of the daily song? Do you in a simple benevolence admit them on equal terms to the counsel halls of your soul, or do you pledge your faith to a senate of elders, the time-tried poets that wear the mantles of the majestic and the great? Do you keep far away from your hand and heart the living poets and the spirits of those just passed, bidding them seek their honors from the future without asking your aid in that difficult task? When a new poet appears, do you commune with an old one?

To come to a just conclusion, let us try to form a composite picture of the bookshelves of our poetry-loving friends, and view the result. Of course, a composite picture is a likeness of nothing in particular, but if we could break up the synthesis, the analysis would probably show the component parts to be something like this: Homer, Virgil, Dante, Goethe, Shakespeare, Milton, Pope, Gray, Shelley, Keats, Browning, among the worthies that make the Muse of poetry so proud on her Olympian hills. But there would also be Stevenson, Andrew Lang, Austin Dobson, Stephen Phillips, Kipling, Katharine Tynan, Yeats, Alice Meynell, John Masefield, Rupert Brooke, Joaquin Miller, Edwin Markham, John Boyle O'Reilly, Madison Cawein, James Whitcomb Riley, Father Tabb, Richard Watson Gilder, Eugene Field, Richard Hovey, James Jeffrey Roche, Paul Lawrence Dunbar, Clinton Scollard, Thomas Walsh, Louise Imogen Guiney, George Edward Woodberry, Edith M. Thomas, T. A. Daly, and many more of the writers who have sung all sweetly and ever in tune for the generations that have not yet passed away.

There is our picture. And your library probably contributes to its making, like so many that we have grouped for the photograph. And so our point is clear; that most of us who would trippingly name three or four famous names as our conception of our individual taste in poetry are not really satisfied with our own choice; not our speech, but our books betray us. And if we are honest we shall admit from this day forward that our craving for poetry is appeased not alone by Milton but by Francis Thompson; not alone by Shelley, but by Kipling; not alone by Browning, but by Robert Bridges; not alone by Longfellow, but by Alfred Noyes; not alone by Poe, but by Joyce Kilmer. The larger luminaries shine in morocco and vellum in the near distance, not too far from the reach of the hand, but the littler planets are also safely within our grasp and ken, like the candles that light our way to pleasant dreams.

I should not wish to be misunderstood; there is no cynicism in my observations; I rather believe that there is vastly more than an infinite deal of nothing in the literary decisions of the world. And it seems to me that we should have no quarrel with him to whom the greater classics are not ever a measure of his heart's content. There are times, we must admit, when the "Epipsychidion," or the "Ode to a Grecian Urn," or the "Essay on Man" has a quite far-away appeal; and these are the times when the soul may respond with a quickened ardor to the love lyrics of a poet living yet in the world we see, with a message that comes not from the grave; when the heart throbs to the lullabies and harmonies of today or the close yesterday rather than to the measures that were evoked in the years of generations now asleep. I do not, therefore, think that the poetry-loving world is trying to deceive itself into an exchange of old gods for new; it is simply adding new divinities to the old pantheon, as many as have been touched by the glow of the divine fire. It is not endeavoring to banish Keats for a newcome philosopher of beauty, nor my Lord Tennyson for a modern aspirant in the knighthood of song; it has no desire that a single singer of days agone should yield his youth of immortality to the soul of a bard new-born. For men are not repudiating the classics that test the time and tide of poesy, and that time and tide have tested; it is rather, I think, that they are finding a way of keeping the old standards alive by listening to fresh voices and new songs.

It may be the part of wisdom to commune ever with the rarer ether on the hills of Parnassus; but it is no mean happiness to live at times on the lower slopes where also the dawn and the evening stars are glad to the cheerful heart. To limit one's reading of poetry mainly to the best works of the older masters may indeed be a virtue, as it is certainly not a sin; but this virtue is not, and perhaps cannot well be the universal mode. Perhaps it is also a sign of virtue that the world is listening to the younger poets, who not infrequently sing with a grace and a glory equal to the utterance of those who won the full gifting of the Muse. I believe in very truth that even a few minutes devoted to a fugitive poem in the journal of the day is a repledging of faith in the eternal message of poets, a glad welcome to the children of Dante and Shakespeare, an earnest of the soul's abiding love for the beauteous fabric of the soul itself. For whether our hearts go singing to the wondrous pæans that only the major prophets have intoned, or whether they dance to the melody of the lesser bards, they ever hold belief in the poet's own creed of his clan:

We are the music-makers,
And we are the dreamers of dreams,
Wandering by lone sea-breakers,
And sitting by desolate streams;
World-losers and world-forsakers,
On whom the pale moon gleams:
Yet we are the movers and shakers
Of the world forever, it seems.

"Let Them Get Acquainted."

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The editorial in your issue of April 28 on the lack of practical wisdom shown in refusing to afford facilities for acquaintance and friendship between our Catholic boys and girls has called forth some very sane comment from your subscribers. The obstacles put in the way of such advisable meetings are more widespread than is perhaps generally realized, and the wonder of it is that those who are responsible for the restrictions do not dream of attributing to themselves any share of the blame for the increasing number of mixed marriages. One phase of the question has not been touched on, namely, the loss entailed on the Church when Catholic young men and women remain single rather than risk marriage with a non-Catholic. Society today is badly in need of the salutary influence of Catholic homes and especially of Catholic mothers. It is a very short-sighted policy that bars the way to one of the principal avenues that lead to the happy consummation we all have so much at heart. Let us by all means introduce into our community and college social life more opportunities for acquaintanceship among our Catholic young people. The mere name of innovation should not deter us.

Was There a "Reformation"?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Was there a Reformation? The question seems almost superfluous for any schoolboy will tell you that one certainly took place in the sixteenth century, that the Protestant religion is the outcome of that Reformation, and that Martin Luther is considered the father of it. However, had the same question been put to Martin Luther himself, we can imagine him shrugging his shoulders and saying: "I really do not know what you mean." For during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the word "reformation" signified something quite different from what it means today. It merely meant the change from one confession into another. Thus the historians of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries spoke of the "reformation" when a town or country, as often happened, had thrown off its former faith and adopted a new confession. In this connection they spoke of a Lutheran, a Calvanistic or a Catholic reformation. We know, for instance, that the Palatinate changed its confession within a space of half a century not less than five times; and thus we would say, as the word was used in the language of those days: "There took place five reformations—i.e., five changes of confession, in the Palatinate."

In no official record of Luther's time, neither in the Confession of Augsburg (1530) nor at the peace of Passau (1552) nor at the peace of religion of Augsburg (1555), can the word "Reformation," as we understand it, be found. It is not till 1648 that the term appears in the official records of the Westphalian Peace, and here the expression "the right to reform" appears as a privilege granted to the authorities of towns and to the princes, to define the confession adopted within the limits of their territories.

Notwithstanding the historical meaning of this word as used for a Catholic, Lutheran, Calvanistic or Zwinglian reformation, or change of confession, the Protestants of the nineteenth century began to substitute for the former meaning of the word their new conception of the Reformation as a moral and religious restoration, that took place in the Church of the sixteenth century. With this meaning Protestants of today use the expression. The "Reformation," as they understand it, is something quite different from what Philip Melanchthon, the collaborator and friend of Luther, had in mind when he complained that the religious upheaval caused him such pain that he would rather have died than behold it. For the princes' crimes brought disgrace on the (reformed) church; they robbed her of her possessions; few of them were generous in supporting the ministers of the Word and in contributing toward the advancement of learning. Everywhere open disregard of religion was increasing, gluttony, plundering and limitless extravagance were spreading, and civil war was approaching.

After reading such a description of the so-called Reformation given by a contemporary, it is hard to speak of that time as a period of religious or moral improvement. So let us in future avoid the misleading word "Reformation" and adopt instead expressions which are more in conformity with historical truth, for instance, "the religious separation," "break" or "revolt" of the sixteenth century.

"Hospitals and Animal Houses"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article, "Hospitals and Animal Houses," which appears in your issue of May 12, closes with this warning to Catholics, "Choose a hospital for your sick, not an 'animal house.'" A hospital, in the common acceptation of the word, means a retreat for the sick, and why such an institution, simply because it does not chance to be conducted by nuns, should merit the term "animal house" is remarkable, and the term is naturally recognized as meaning to convey all the writer intended when the application was made.

I have been fortunate enough to spend many years at the Johns Hopkins Hospital as a pupil, subsequently as a head nurse, and also as a patient, when a sudden and severe illness demanded an immediate operation. The first act of the superintendent was to send for a Catholic priest, and the surgeons holding a consultation in the room withdrew, as was the custom. Catholic priests walking through the wards and corridors, sitting at bedsides and wheel-chairs were a sight made familiar by daily recurrence. There were no "visiting hours" for them; they came and went at pleasure. Many times during the years I spent there I conducted groups of nuns through the wards, operating-rooms, and clinics; they came to the "animal house" for information concerning our methods of nursing, and eagerly took down the instruction in notebooks brought for the purpose.

During the eleven years that I have practised my profession I have nursed in numerous hospitals and what you are pleased to call "animal houses," and I have never yet discovered any great advantage in a Catholic hospital to the patient, as far as religion is concerned. As a rule, there are as many Protestants training in Catholic institutions as Catholics, and while a Catholic patient doubtless enjoys and benefits by a daily visit from a priest, that same privilege may be accorded him in any "animal house" I have ever nursed in.

The apparent suggestion in the editorial I refer to, that there is a difference between a Catholic and a Protestant institution as regards the manner of nursing, is absurd, and it is a reflection on the nursing profession, as all nurses are taught that the one thing to consider is the comfort of the patient, and that "comfort" includes more, and extends beyond, the merely physical. Any desire for a priest or minister is promptly gratified in all "animal houses" I have ever been in. It is premised by those who conduct them that the "patient is something more than a valued animal."

In Macon, Ga., there is no hospital conducted by the Sisters, only an "animal house," yet frequently the nuns from the convent have gone there for serious operations and tedious illnesses. And they have been very grateful for the sympathy and care they received and the privileges extended.

I am a Catholic, for which I sincerely thank God, and I am also a product of an "animal house," to which I am very loyal and grateful, for it was there as a member of its nursing staff that I learned what real nursing means.

Atlanta, Ga. ANNIE MCDONELL.

[It is not necessary to state that the editorial did nothing so foolish as to stigmatize all hospitals not "conducted by nuns" as "animal houses." It did, however, apply that term, and does now apply it, to the hospital in which the patient is nothing more than "a valuable animal," which connives at procedures "contrary to Catholic principles of morality," and opens its clinics "to illegal and immoral practices" on the bodies of the poor. The comparison sins not by exaggeration, but by understatement. In the one case the object of experimentation is a brute; in the other, an image of God. That the priest is welcomed at Johns Hopkins Hospital, that Sisters often visit this institution for purposes of study, that Miss McDonell herself has never "discovered any great advantage in a Catholic hospital to the patient as far as religion was concerned," are facts, interesting possibly, but irrelevant. Furthermore, although in no sense bearing on the point at issue, it may be remarked that Miss McDonell's estimate of the spiritual value of the Catholic hospital is oddly at variance with Catholic thought and the Catholic practice of centuries.—ED. The Enemies of Nature

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you kindly grant a little space in your columns to an "average man," conscious of his "mediocrity," to express the rather bewildered feelings aroused by a perusal of the article in your issue of May 19, entitled "The Enemies of Nature"?

One was quite at a loss to determine how the author managed to exclude himself from the ranks of those whom he criticized; and somehow, to the average man, it seemed that the "men, women, and the inevitable brood of children," who picked the wild flowers of the country-side, were less ruthless enemies of nature than those who "went forth to pick the evening's flight of insects from the bait of stale beer and syrup smeared on trees." And even "that mad, blind destroyer, the real-estate agent," armed with his foot-rule and spade, appeared but a mild and spineless pacifist compared with those doughty knights who, in the dusk of eve', stealthily crossed the cemetery "laden with bags, cyanide bottles, torch-lamps, lantern-traps and nets." Here was an equipment, it seemed to the average man, to turn even a Von Tirpitz green with envy. It is hard to discriminate between these joyous adventurers and the pitiful, mediocre, flower-picking "enemies of nature," except, perhaps, that the former had "the evening's poetry in their souls."

Our Municipal Violet

TIME was when the politician traversed his district at the head of a brass band, and blocked the traffic at street corners, by delivering impassioned panegyrics of himself to the assembled "byes." But not today, at least not in New York. In the highly rarefied atmosphere of the world's metropolis, politicians are shy, modest creatures, most akin to the shrinking violet. Not all the king's horses, nor all the king's men, even though headed by a redoubtable committee of two hundred and fifty self-convicted patriots, can coax them from their cool and mossy nooks near murmuring waters, to fill a political city hall with the sweetness of their fragrance. So greatly do they abhor publicity, that their virtues must be advertised by their loving friends. But an admiring city pays the bill. "Some of his friends have feared," writes a New York journal of the city's present chief executive—a floweret permanently lured from his dell into the arid wastes of politics, some ten years ago—"have feared that he too much despised the arts of publicity." The fears of these consorts of our municipal violet, are without foundation. For

> At the outset of this administration an effort was made to formulate a plan for handling the publicity work of the Mayor's departments so as to better acquaint the public with the problems of city government and what was being done to meet them. An examiner in this office was instructed to devote part of his time to this work. In this connection it has been his duty to review and, where necessary, to restate briefly the essential facts in the reports of the several department heads under the Mayor for publication in the daily press, and also to prepare special feature stories for the magazine sections of the Sunday newspapers. In the case of the former flimsies were prepared and released to all the Manhattan and Brooklyn newspapers. . . . The Sunday special stories with accompanying photographs were sent directly to the Sunday editors for syndication in the press of this city. Under the foregoing plan to date 2,500 columns of daily and Sunday news stories relating to the work of the present city administration were printed in the New York and Brooklyn newspapers. This total includes 243 Sunday special stories, which have been given 29 full page and 32 half page spreads.—(Report of the Commissioner of Accounts, 1916. Italics inserted.)

One also recalls the various bogus "public meetings" set on foot last winter, but, for a shrinking violet, this alone is a fair amount of advertising. Like politicians, violets have changed; no longer are they content to remain half-hidden by a mossy stone. The times require "2,500 columns of daily and Sunday news stories" with "29 full page and 32 half page spreads" as a minimum.

Pampering the Murderer

THE Illinois Legislature has abolished capital punishment for all crimes, save two. The exceptions are treason and kidnapping. It is reassuring to know that there are some lengths to which these Solons will not go. They have laid the ghost, prowling through Illinois of late years, and speaking, without being spoken to, the silly message that capital punishment is simple murder. The principal patron of this ghost was a former governor of the State, and a Catholic at that. "What no one man may do," this jurist was wont to argue, "no aggregation of men may do." The argument was, and is, beside the point. The State is not a mere "aggregation of men." Rightly constituted and administered, it operates with the authority of God Himself. Nor does it seem to have entered the head of this chief executive, that he stultified his own doctrine, whenever he issued a pardon, called out the militia, or signed a tax-bill. No one man may do these things, nor may an "aggregation." But the Governor of Illinois may, when he acts neither in his private capacity, nor for one man, nor for any aggregation, but in the name of that society which is called the State.

The legislature has affirmed an undoubted right of the State, but observers will marvel why the crime of murder is singled out for special clemency. At a time when good men are asked in the name of freedom to sacrifice their lives and fortunes for the general welfare, the legislature makes gentle provision for beasts who may feel inclined to murder these defenders of their country. The Chicago Tribune well remarks:

> The legislature decides that the man who is not good, who attacks the community, who takes life rather than offers his own, shall be let off in neurotic fashion from the penalties murderers have hitherto been obliged to suffer, or that the law contemplated they should suffer. A hanging law never makes hanging obligatory. We know in Cook county, where we do about one-half the hanging necessary for the good of the county, that no hanging law can be made safe against the sentimentalism of juries. But it can be kept as a law and be there as a deterrent.

Good men as well as criminals have argued that capital punishment does not "deter." Their arguments prove too much. No law "deters" absolutely, not even the eternal law of God. It does not follow, however, that the penalties affixed, should be abolished or mitigated. Nor is deterrence the sole purpose of punishment. Through suitable penalty, the criminal dissolves the vinculum juris, the fetter forged on the law by violence, and restores in some measure the balance of justice disturbed by his evil deed. If a law must vindicate its right to exist by securing universal and perfect obedience, then we must logically reject all legislation, both human and Divine.

The Heart of a Child

IN a corner of Westminster Abbey, it is said, the traveler may see inscribed on a crumbling stone in the wall, the words "Jane Lister Dear Child." No more of her brief story is written, nor need it be. With England's great dead she sleeps, welcome in that mighty gathering. None are so tender as the brave, and since Our Saviour called the children to Him and took them in His blessed arms, there is no company that is not greater and happier for their innocent presence.

New York, too, now has her "Jane Lister Dear Child." "Fallen from the budded coronal of Spring," Pauline Bittner, eleven years old, before Death breathed upon her, wrote her "Last Will and Testament":

> To my brother, I give my desk and seat.
> To my mother and father, I bequeath what I owe them for being ill so much.
> To Lena, the maid, I bequeath my things in the bathroom.
> To myself I bequeath a golden dress and the diamonds and jewels of the Madonna and a golden grave.

"What things she said," sings Francis Thompson of "Monica," "things sweet immeditatably." Even in pallid cities where flowers droop and no birds sing, the children "fresh from God," awaken memories of our better selves, and so link us to Heaven.

Mr. Creel's "Explanation"

IT is certainly quite unfitting that a censor in wartime should be, however unintentionally, a clumsy jester whose precious decrees only amuse those whom they do not anger. Yet Mr. George Creel, the Chairman of the Committee on Public Information, in his "Preliminary Statement to the Press of the United States" has an "explanation" of "dangerous matter" that would be highly entertaining if it were not so fatuous and annoying. For their guidance and enlightenment experienced editors are gravely informed, for instance, that:

> The Department of State considers it dangerous and of service to the enemy to discuss differences of opinion between the Allies and difficulties with neutral countries. . . . Speculation about possible peace is another topic which may possess elements of danger. . . . Generally speaking, articles likely to prove offensive to any of the Allies or to neutrals would be undesirable.

Many a harried editor on reading the foregoing "explanation," no doubt will desperately resolve to abandon his useful calling and adopt the eremitical life. For should he so much as hint that a slight difference of opinion is said to be existing now between England and Ireland regarding the way the latter country should be governed, he may be giving the enemy information of priceless military value. If he should delicately intimate that China has a rather unneighborly reluctance to letting Japan "penetrate," however peacefully, Celestial territory, the thoughtless editor may be giving aid and comfort to the Kaiser. If he were to insinuate that the high-minded neutral, First Chief Carranza, had neglected to make his Easter duty this year, or that Mexican Catholics are not enjoying at this moment full liberty to practise their religion, the publication of the baseless rumor would doubtless have an important bearing on our failure to meet the U-boat peril.

As for the editor who is unpatriotic enough to believe that war, after all, was never meant to be the world's normal state, and who foolishly conjectures that if the Central Powers would grant this or that concession, the preliminaries of peace might possibly be arranged, he should remember that such a speculation "may possess elements of danger." Every scribe moreover who is so obtuse that he does not realize how sensitive to criticism are most human beings, particularly if they happen to be neutrals or allies, is likely to imperil, by some inconsiderate remark, the success of many an important military or naval maneuver. Our intrepid ally, Portugal, for example, is known to be ridiculously touchy about any criticism of her policy toward the Church; facetious remarks regarding the passionate love the Dutch have for tulips have been known to give offense in certain high quarters at Amsterdam; the haughty Spaniard cannot bear to hear his national bull-fights spoken of disparagingly, and all the world knows how angry an Italian will grow if any doubt is entertained regarding the consummate perfection of his country's olives, wine or macaroni. It would seem, therefore, that the editor who avoids all reference to what Mr. Creel considers "dangerous matter" will soon have a paper that is almost as enlightening and interesting as is the Official Bulletin issued by the Committee on Public Information.

Count the Children!

A THOROUGHLY equitable plan of taxation is, and has ever been, as rare as a roc. To the ordinary citizen, this exaction of government is burdensome in a degree never felt by his opulent brother. The man who owns a palatial city residence, a home by the seashore, another in the mountains, and a long count of dwellings which he rents to humble folk, is wont to protest loudly to the assessors, that taxes are "ruining" him. What he means by "ruin," is that he cannot turn the market upside down by some foray, or buy another yacht, or sit in at Monte Carlo. When a poor man complains of taxation, he generally means that he and his family are going without necessities to pay the tax bill. Next to our army of underpaid wage-slaves, about the plainest fact in American life today, is our tax-system, admirable enough in theory, but most inequitable in practice. And taxes are not paid in theory.

Congress is now debating the imposition of a graduated tax on incomes. Very properly is it proposed to lance the income swollen beyond all measure; a proceeding that will make taxation more tolerable for the holder of the relatively small income, while laying no appreciable burden on the plutocrat. Tax plans as a rule are wooden things, with small consideration for individual cases. But if any consideration can be shown, and from a legal standpoint there seems no reason why it cannot, let the man with a family profit by the exemption. Obviously the burden is not equally distributed, when the man with a two-thousand dollar income and five children, is forced to pay the same tax as the man with the same income and no dependents. The father who is caring for the physical, mental and moral growth of a flock of children is already doing his country an inestimable service. Count the children, and make liberal allowances. Upon them will devolve the work of rebuilding what war destroys. Nothing more wasteful can be conceived than the policy which will make the coming generation less willing to undertake this task or less able to accomplish it.

Week-Ends in Bed

"PASS your week-ends in bed" is the novel advice a physician recently gave, through the public press, to the lean, the nervous and the weak. A conscientious observance of the practice, he wrote, would effect a complete restoration of health. Here is his prescription:

> The week-end rest begins as soon as you get home on Saturday and lasts until you have to get back on the job Monday. Get right into bed and stay there. Have all food served in bed. No visiting. No talk. Just keep quiet and doze the time away. At the most, let someone read some good, light literature for you. Monday morning you will find that you have found new vigor and strength for the week's work.

If that doctor's counsel is widely followed, it is clear that results of a most revolutionary character are likely to ensue. For in all probability vast multitudes of men, women and children will now suddenly discover, for the first time, that they are dangerously lean, nervous or weak, and will joyfully hasten to adopt the pleasant panacea of a week-end in bed. The spread of the practice will sadly deplete, no doubt, our Sunday congregations. For those who now get up very reluctantly just in time to be late for the eleven o'clock Mass, will, on the plea of safeguarding their health, consider themselves excused even from evening Benediction. Then since empty pews and empty contribution-boxes, as all the world knows, are near relatives, many a worthy parochial charity will probably begin to languish. Other economic results of the week-end-in-bed movement will, perhaps, be the failure of numberless summer resorts, for fewer and fewer people will flit off Friday evening to mountain, lake or beach. The managers of theaters and film halls, most likely, will also go into bankruptcy owing to loss of patronage on what were once their best-paying days. Merchants, too, will be threatened with financial disaster, for the week-end-in-bed enthusiasts will naturally buy but few new clothes, and those will be of the simplest, least expensive kind, and week-enders will no longer use a hundred things, from automobiles to golf-sticks, which they once considered indispensable.

It will also be interesting to observe what kind of best-sellers will now be popular with those taking the new treatment. The stories will, of course, have to be of a very soothing and somniferous character, for novels that are too thrilling or absorbing will be likely to delay the patient's complete recovery from that leanness, nervousness or general debility which the week-end-in-bed prescription is designed to effect. Indeed, some future historian of our American literature will, perhaps, note that in the year 1917 there began to appear a new type of novel, one quite devoid of action and innocent of artistry, but abounding in tiresome descriptive passages and full of colorless characters, who hold long conversations on uninteresting subjects. Nor will our historian fail, perhaps, to remark that, curiously enough, the rise of this new school of fictionists synchronized with the spread of the week-end-in-bed movement. See how much, alas, the doctor who first published that prescription may have to answer for!

Bootless Prayers?

AS the Christians of every land have now for nearly three years been pleading with Heaven to give the world peace, many find a severe trial to their faith in God's seeming delay in hearkening to their petitions and are disheartened by their prayers' apparent ineffectiveness. "Cry! Cease not!" should be the patient Christian's watchword. For in answer to the unremitting intercession of the Church's holy ones, peace will surely come at last. An early peace, indeed may not be a part of the Divine plan. For the world which has so long rejected His claims, needs perhaps to be purified still more by suffering, and all the nations must be chastened and humbled by war before they will return to Him. With his usual felicity and penetration Shakespeare reminds us:

> "We, ignorant of ourselves,
> Beg often our own harms, which the wise powers > Deny us for our good."

So that peace which so many Christians throughout the world are praying for, Heaven perhaps is delaying until America by entering the war has found her soul. Too early a peace will probably leave us quite as materialistic and unbelieving a nation as we were before the call to arms was sounded. But the long and patient practice by all our citizens, young and old, at home and in the field, of the soldierly virtues of fortitude, faith and obedience may restore to the American people the moral qualities they now need most. Thus, before giving us a permanent peace God in His wisdom may teach us how to make the best use of it.

Literature

F. HOPKINSON SMITH, NOVELIST

"WHEN Smith died," wrote Thomas Nelson Page, "New York lost not only her most accomplished and versatile man of letters, but one who was not exceeded by any other among her millions of inhabitants as a force for clean living, good breeding and simple kindness." That tribute was well merited. Besides being a constructive engineer, ranking high in his profession, F. Hopkinson Smith was an artist, a lecturer and an essayist. But the man's genius appeared to best advantage in his stories. His optimism and breadth of view, the fascination of his character and his high ideals: all shine forth so brightly from the pages of his books that he should have many Catholic readers.

Smith's plots have little of newness to recommend them, yet one forgets the old, familiar garments under the lace and brocade of his exquisite description, lovable characterization, brisk action and sympathetic treatment. "Colonel Carter of Cartersville," his first novel, is scarcely more than a bundle of sketches about a charming old Southerner, who, despite bankruptcy, pathetically keeps up appearances amidst the bustle of New York life. The portrayal of this character is of a high order. Even a cold Northerner, annoyed at first by Carter's shallow veneer of pretension, must eventually fall under the genuine charm of this quixotic old fellow, whose financial mire gets deeper and deeper till a coal mine is found that permits the Colonel to end his days as becomes a Southerner of blood and breeding. This work is considered by some to be Smith's best contribution to literature, but many will say that it must yield precedence to both "The Fortunes of Oliver Horn" and "Felix O'Day."

In the former are most of the good points of the earlier book, enhanced by more attractive settings. Oliver, the scion of the aristocratic Horn family, is ambitious to be an artist. His mother, eminently practical, seeing the old paternal failing of unrest and profitless labor cropping out in her boy, sends him to New York to earn his living and stop his dreaming. The road is uphill and stony, but Oliver is not too weak to climb. In these dark days his old penchant for the palette asserts itself; he finds means for practice and progress; success comes and the girl he loves.

"Felix O'Day," Smith's last completed work and the one productive of much practical social good, is quite as interesting. O'Day, a young Irish nobleman, comes to New York in search of his runaway wife. For days and weeks he is baffled. But during this time he works as clerk in a second-hand store, where he makes many quaint and charming acquaintances. He plays uncle to the delightful "Mazie Beesvings" and is taken in tow by Kittie Cleary, her efforts to ease the sorrow of his life being rewarded by seeing man and wife happily united. The portrait of the devoted priest in "Felix O'Day" clearly is drawn from life.

If Mr. Smith's plots yield in originality to those of other authors, his characters do not. He is a wizard in delineating people. He studied and loved his fellow-men. The characters that cross his page are wholesome and delightfully human. It requires no extraordinary acumen to recognize the "type" character, yet the discovery is but the recognition of a loved friend; for the individual is not eclipsed by the type. Colonel Carter, Peter Grayson and Richard Horn are much alike in general tastes: gentlemen all, with the chivalrous spirit of the Southland dominating them. Yet how strongly contrasted withal: the first, optimistic to the straining point, fiery and impractical; the second, cool, buoyant, generous; the third, the most satisfying gentleman Smith has left us. For Richard Horn, accomplished, brilliant, manly and tender, the master of the mansion on Kennedy Square, is an inspiration to his kind for clean living, for true family devotion, for separation from all that is sordid in life. One is drawn to him as to Colonel Newcome, while in "Caleb West, Master Diver," we have a brace of the finest of Smith's portraits: Caleb West and Cap'n Joe. Rough-hewn they are, these old sea-dogs, yet underneath their simple fidelity there smoulders the courage of titans. As for the young folks that go rollicking through Smith's books, they have spirit enough, but, excepting John Breen, none of them approaches the heroic. As a child-study, "Mazie Beesvings" is quite satisfactory, though she is not to be compared, of course, with De Morgan's "Alicia."

Though masculinity of treatment is a strong characteristic of our author, it is, above all, a gentleman who writes, whose spirit, like a perfume, lingers after him. Perhaps it was this refinement that endowed him with such power when sketching his woman characters; for nowhere is he better. The typical Southern lady appears in the Misses Nancy Carter, Felicia Grayson and Sally Clendenning. Smith is not so happy in individualizing these, though any single one forms a superb characterization. If he is loyal to a cause, it is to that of woman. His pen throws off its brightest sparks when writing in her defense:

> Because of this loyalty to womankind and this reverence for the home, a reverence which began with the mother-love and radiated to every sister they knew, no woman of quality ever earned her own bread while there was an able-bodied man of her blood above ground to earn it for her. Nor could there be any disgrace so lasting even to the third or fourth generation, as the stigma an outraged community would place upon the renegade who refused her aid and comfort. An unprogressive, quixotic life, if you will, a life without growth and dominant personalities and lofty responsibilities and God-given rights, but, oh! the sweet mothers that it gave us and the wholesomeness, the cleanliness, the loyalty of it all.

Catholic readers will especially like Kittie Cleary, the expresswoman, who is the veriest antithesis of her Southern sister, and in her grasp of the meaning of life she is undeniably her superior. Work she has made her pastime; good deeds her hobby. Yet withal there is no sentimentality about her. Hers is just a plain, healthy, busy life, the kind not rare among God's poor.

To expect an artist-author to be sparing in descriptions were absurd. So Smith's novels and sketches abound in fresh, open scenery and unique, picturesque settings. Here, for instance, is a coming storm: "Soon a cold, raw wind, which had been asleep in the hills for weeks, awoke with a snarl and started down the gorge. Then the little leaves began to quiver, the big trees to groan in their anxiety, not knowing what the will of the wind would be, and the merry little waves that had chased each other all the morning over the sunny shallows of the brook grew ashy pale as they looked up into the angry face of the Storm God and fled shivering to the shore." Or recall the chapter, "Mr. Munson's Lost Foil." Was there ever such a potpourri of the antique and the modern as that famous banquet chamber displayed? Was a situation ever more delightful than when the two "old fogies," Richard Horn and Uncle Nathan, charm to silence that gathering of New York "high-brows" with Beethoven's "Fidelio"? And the acknowledgment that follows is all so wholehearted, so human. In these days of literary license it is consoling to find a man with F. Hopkinson Smith's wealth of optimism, who has peopled his world with normal, clean-living men and women, characters who make us morally healthier for the reading. It is gratifying to find a modern popular novelist whose pages are not blistered with problems of sex, whose clarion note is one of interest in and sympathy with his fellow-man, whose cleanness of language is but an indication of his cleanness of thought, and whose sterling reverence for women and all that is sacred is the mark of a great soul. Truly may it be said of F. Hopkinson Smith, "He loved sunshine and he added to it."

ARTHUR J. EVANS, S.J.

REVIEWS

The Oxford Book of English Mystical Verse. Chosen by D. H. S. NICHOLSON and A. H. E. LEE. New York: Oxford University Press. $2.50.

To Catholic readers the title of this book promises much, but its perusal is likely to leave them dissatisfied. The first mistake the volume's compilers made was failing to give an adequate definition of mysticism. Indeed, they considered it "clearly outside" their province "to venture on a definition of what actually constitutes mysticism and what does not." They only undertook to include in the anthology such poems as, in the compilers' judgment, "contain intimations of a consciousness wider and deeper than the normal." According to that description, it would seem that almost any true poet would deserve a place among the writers of "mystical verse." Another serious defect of the work is the lack of discrimination and proportion shown in the choice of selections. Writers born since 1840 take up more than half of an "anthology" which is consequently rather poor in "flowers" of striking fragrance and beauty. When such writers as Byron, Emerson, Henley, Abercrombie, Meredith, Shelley, Santayana, Swinburne and Whitman are considered "mystics," the Catholic reader naturally becomes amused. The compilers' inability to distinguish between modern pantheism and Christian mysticism is, of course, responsible for the inclusion of such authors as the foregoing. The discerning reader will wonder, moreover, why Christina Rossetti, for example, receives but a page and a half while a certain A. E. Waite is given eleven; or why such seventeenth-century worthies as Donne, Vaughan and George Herbert are not more largely represented.

It is worthy of note that a gratifying proportion of the real poems in the volume, as distinguished from the merely pious verses, are from Catholic pens, and that all the truly "mystical" selections, from "Love Is Life," written by Richard Rolle in the fourteenth century, down to "I See His Blood upon the Rose," stanzas composed by Joseph Mary Plunkett, who gave his life for Irish freedom only last year, are the work of Catholics. This latter circumstance, however, is not remarkable, after all, for it is obvious that no one but a Catholic can be a true mystic. Some readers will doubtless wonder why more flowers were not culled from Elizabethan gardens. For instance, Shakespeare's fine sonnet, "Poor soul the center of my sinful earth," is omitted. More of Gilbert K. Chesterton's verses might well have been included, and why Lionel Johnson was left out altogether is hard to understand. Catholic readers will rejoice to find that Constable, Crashaw, Dolben, Augusta Drane, Hopkins, Mrs. Meynell, Newman, Patmore, Rolle, Southwell, Tabb, Francis Thompson and Traherne furnish the anthology with most of its best mystical poetry. Henry Constable, for example, who lived from about 1562 to 1613, offers the following beautiful sonnet, "To the Blessed Sacrament":

When thee (O holy sacrificed Lambe)
In severed sygnes I whyte and liquide see,
As on thy body slayne I thinke on thee,
Which pale by sheddyng of thy bloode became.
And when agayne I doe behold the same
Vayled in whyte to be receav'd of mee,
Thou seemest in thy syndon wrapt to bee
Lyke to a corse, whose monument I am.

Buryed in me, vnto my sowle appeare,
Pryson'd in earth, and bannisht from thy syght,
Lyke our forefathers who in lymbo were,
Cleere thou my thoughtes, as thou did'st gyve them light,
And as thou others freed from purgying fyre
Quenche in my hart the flames of badd desyre.

and Henry Vaughan, seventeenth-century Protestant though he was, pays in "The Knot" a grateful tribute to Our Lady:

Bright Queen of Heaven! God's Virgin Spouse
The glad worlds blessed maid!
Whose beauty tyed life to thy house,
And brought us saving ayd.

Thou art the true Loves-knot; by thee
God is made our Allie,
And mans inferior Essence he
With his did dignifie.

For Coalescent by that Band
We are his body grown,
Nourished with favors from his hand
Whom for our head we own.

And such a Knot, what arm dares loose,
What life, what death can sever?
Which us in him, and him in us
United keeps for ever.

Such selections as these make "The Oxford Book of English Mystical Verse," notwithstanding its shortcomings, a desirable volume to have at one's elbow.

Philosophy of Education. By THOMAS EDWARD SHIELDS, Ph.D., LL.D. Washington: The Catholic Education Press.

No book is more needed and will be more welcome today than the volume which exposes in clear, popular style the true principles of education. On no subject, perhaps, does there exist in the public mind more doubt and confusion. A careful perusal of the "Philosophy of Education" from the pen of the distinguished professor of the Catholic University will go far to set before the public the correct standards and ideals which must preside over that which may be called the queen and mistress of all arts, that of training and forming the mind and heart of the young.

The book is divided into three main parts. In the first, the author examines the "Nature of the Educative Processes" from various points of view. In this section, two chapters will be of special use to the teacher, that in which Dr. Shields treats of "Education as Adjustment" and the one in which he forcibly brings out the dangers of the "Culture Epoch Theory." In the second section, which many will find the most useful, Dr. Shields treats of "Educational Aims." While of an eminently practical nature, this part of the book emphasizes the true aim of Christian education. And once that aim is determined, attention is called to other aims, secondary to this, such as "Education for Economic Efficiency," "Education for Social Efficiency," "Education for Educational Culture." The third division of the treatise considers the various "Educative Agencies." In this part there are sound and instructive chapters on "The Home," "The Church," "The School." The last chapter of the volume describes "The Teacher and His Training." Even this brief outline will show the comprehensive grasp of the subject everywhere manifested by the author. Dr. Shields has gone to the root of the matter, and has set up in the clearest light the true principles of education and opposed them to the unsound theories of that school of pedagogy whose aim is to prepare men for the battle and the strife of time, social, physical, intellectual, economic, but forgets to look beyond and to recognize that there are spiritual faculties in the child which must be developed, if we wish to educate in the true and only sense of the word. Though occasionally the phraseology of the book is marked by an excessive use of the technical and formal language of modern pedagogy, the volume is pleasantly written and should meet with a hearty welcome from all Catholic educators.

Operative Ownership. By JAMES J. FINN. Chicago: Langdon & Co. $1.50.

The Social Action Series. Twenty-one Pamphlets. Published by the Irish Messenger of the Sacred Heart. Brooklyn: The International Catholic Truth Society. $0.05 each.

In an exceedingly interesting and stimulating volume, Mr. James J. Finn outlines a plan whereby "social justice" may be quickly achieved. The author is no mere theorist. He has an adequate grasp of the social and economic conditions under which in this country a shockingly large percentage of the workers are endeavoring to live on less than a living wage. But he is not moved by this consideration to counsel revolution as a remedy; for he holds that a modified form of capitalism is quite as necessary to labor as labor is to capital. Starting from the just conclusion, that it is as much the duty of the State to protect the economically weak from exploitation by greed as it is to protect the citizen from physical violence, the author proposes that this protection of the worker, take the form of "operative ownership," enforced, if necessary, by State and national legislation. This legislation would, in the author's opinion, eliminate the dangers of Socialism and governmental paternalism, and safeguard social justice by effecting "real union of capital and labor." The argument is presented with much ingenuity, and with a welcome freedom from the unreality and exaggeration which frequently characterize books of the kind.

The pamphlets issued by the Irish Messenger should be brought to the attention of all social students, Catholic and non-Catholic. No doubt the authors would be the first to claim that they are in no sense authoritative, but the assertion would be founded on modesty rather than strict truth. Father P. J. Connolly, S.J., contributes an introductory study, "The Social Question and a Program of Social Pamphlets" which, besides an excellent outline of the whole field, contains a carefully selected bibliography. In six pamphlets, Father L. McKenna, S.J., discusses "The Church" in her relations to labor, to the workingman, working women, the working child, trades unions and social work. Other subjects in this valuable series are "Syndicalism," by Father Joy, S.J.; "Effects of Strikes," by Father Boyd Barrett, S.J.; "The Rights and Duties of Owners," by Father G. Pollen, S.J.; "The Ethics of War," by Father E. Masterson, S.J., and "The Gospel of the Superman," by A. J. Rahilly.

The New International Encyclopaedia, Vols. XXI-XXIII; Shiloh-Zyrians and "Courses of Reading and Study." New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

These three volumes complete the new edition of the International, the original program of publication of which was interfered with by the breaking out of the war in Europe. This now universal conflict is treated in a special article of seventy-five pages given in Volume XXIII. The details of this contribution come down to March, 1916, and under eleven divisions discuss the underlying causes, and the outbreak of the war; the military, naval and aerial operations; the alleged atrocities; the destruction of artistic and architectural treasures; the attitude of the neutral nations; relief measures; financial and economic aspects, and the voluminous bibliography that the great conflict has produced. The delay in the publication of the concluding volumes of the new edition has given the International the advantage over its rivals of being able to include among its articles these facts about the great war which have such current interest. As in the preceding volumes special attention has been given to purely American topics and biographies. A twenty-fourth volume, "Courses of Reading and Study," supplements the regular encyclopedic matter with the purpose of placing the contents of the whole work within easy reach of the student as a general text-book. The material has been divided and subdivided in such a manner as to facilitate self-help and study on special topics. The editors believe that it is in the orderly marshaling of the material contained in the Encyclopædia that its value consists, and that their system is better than a mere index.

The Bird Study Book. By T. GILBERT PEARSON, Secretary, National Association of Audubon Societies. Colored Frontispiece. Pen and Ink Drawings by WILL SIMMONS and Sixteen Photographs. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.25.

Benighted city lads whom the war may send to the farm this summer would be wise to take Mr. Pearson's attractive book with them, for he has packed it with just the kind of information observant visitors to the country ought to desire. For the book tells how to get on friendly terms with the birds, describes their domestic habits, gives facts about their enormous value, explains the bird laws, tells how "bird sanctuaries" are made, and gives directions for systematizing bird-study. Many of the author's own observations are quite interesting. For instance, he found by experiment that a baby robin could in a day eat more than one and a half times its own weight. Another naturalist attests that four chickadees in a few minutes disposed of some 20,000 cankerworm-moth eggs to the great advantage of the neighborhood's vegetation. Mr. Pearson's book will also supply the youthful reader with such titbits of ornithological erudition as the name of the bird that has more hours of daylight than any animal on the globe, an account of the deplorably immoral habits of the cowbird, a list of the birds now extinct and a catalogue of all the birds in the world.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The John Lane Company are soon to publish "The Poems of Charles Warren Stoddard, the Poet of the South Seas," edited and selected by Mr. Thomas Walsh; Allyn & Bacon announce a "Textbook and Exercises in Latin Versification," by Leo T. Butler, S.J.; Longmans have in press "Horace and His Age: a Study in Historical Background," by Dr. J. F. Dalton, of Maynooth; three books that will soon be published by the Encyclopedia Press are a new edition of "A Memorial of Andrew Jackson Shipman, His Life and Writings," edited by Dr. Condé B. Pallen; "The Life of Thomas Maurice Mulry," by Thomas F. Meehan, and "The Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, Kentucky," by Anna Blanche McGill.

Those who enjoyed Kapitan-leutnant Hellmuth von Mücke's "The Ayesha," a book which was praised in our issue of April 21, will doubtless be eager to read "The Emden" (Ritter, $1.25), his account of that German cruiser's remarkable exploits in the Indian Ocean, during the first year of the war. The author describes the ship's voyage from the time she left Tsingtao, the home port of the German East Asiatic squadron, till her destruction by the Sidney off Keeling Island, tells of all the merchantmen the Emden sank, of her success in evading pursuers, and humorously pictures the daily life of the crew. If all German seamen "played the game" as fairly as did Commander von Müller of the Emden the United States would probably have succeeded in keeping out of this war.

According to the Bookman, the six best-selling novels of April were: "Mr. Britling Sees It Through," Wells; "The Road to Understanding," Porter; "In the Wilderness," Robert Hichens; "The Light in the Clearing," Bacheller; "The Lifted Veil," King; and "Wildfire," Grey. All have been noticed in these columns.——"Anchorage" (Scribner, $1.35), a novel by Florence Olmstead, is called "a small-town romance." Quite so. The book is "small-town" in plot, in literary style, in chit-chat, in the characters portrayed. Hilda, who impulsively marries the invalid, Paul Osborne, is one of those attractive, shallow girls who will be true so long as they have their own way and enjoy themselves. When life with Paul grows monotonous, Hilda finds a ready solution. She leaves him. Some years later they meet again accidentally and Hilda cheerfully suggests a divorce. "It's just a form," she reminds Paul. So they go through the "form" and start anew. From sheer love of novelty the author might have found a more dignified and interesting deus ex machina than a commonplace divorce.

"The American Ambassador" (Scribner, $1.35), by Lawrence Byrne, is a story of diplomatic intrigue, constructed on conventional lines. The novel is no better or no worse than many of its kind.——"Enchantment" (Appleton, $1.50), by E. Temple Thurston, is a rather clever book, written in a more or less up-to-date fairy-story style. The plot is not very strong, but there is a good deal of individualism about the characters. There is some coarseness in the book, introduced to give local coloring, but it is only passing in its appearance. The vocation of Patricia to the religious life and its frustration by the "prince" who breaks the spell is pretty much what one might expect from a "heretic," as the author avows himself to be.—— Though the scene of "The Rubbish Heap" (Putnam, $1.40), by "Rita," is laid in an old English seaport, the story is about Ireland and the Irish and its central figure is Mara, the lost child of the "Sorrowful Mountain." The author gives a charming picture of the sadness, poetry and faith of a pure-hearted daughter of Erin, and the two Englishwomen and a Frenchman add a touch of humor to the novel.——"The Gun Brand" (Putnam, $1.40), by James B. Hendryx, is a tale of the land "north of 60." The fair heroine learns by her mistakes what that part of the world has in store for one who tries to raise its standard of civilization.

The reader of "The Fragrant Note Book" (Putnam, $2.50), by C. Arthur Coan, will find in it "tale upon tale of the flowers, in which are myth and legend, folk-lore and history a-plenty, but of horticulture, not a word." The author, who is familiar with a wide range of good books, saunters from May to October through garden, field and woodland and the flowers he sees suggest a thousand apt quotations and felicitous literary allusions. He writes in a pleasant, chatty style and here and there introduces his own verses. The pictures of flowers printed in brown outlines on the book's large pages will perhaps disquiet Kentucky colonels a little, but the natives of "bone-dry" States can of course read the book without misgivings.

Full of up-to-date information, "American Government" (Allyn & Bacon, $1.25), by Dr. F. A. Magruder of Princeton, is more like a year-book than a school-text. Very little space is given to discussion of principles, but the bibliography is unusually good. The questions on the text, and "questions for discussion," appended to every chapter, will, under the direction of a capable teacher, clothe this dry subject with an interest not usually perceived by the young student.——"The Minimum Wage" (H. W. Wilson Co., White Plains, New York, $1.25) is a series of readings selected by Mary K. Reely. Arguments both for and against minimum-wage legislation are presented, and the book will be of great service not only to debaters, for whom it was especially prepared, but to all interested in this important matter.——"Standards of American Legislation" (The University of Chicago Press, $1.50) is a reprint of a lecture course given two years ago at Johns Hopkins University by Dr. Ernst Freund of the University of Chicago. Dr. Freund attempts, and with considerable success, to suggest "the possibility of a system of positive principles that should guide and control the making of statutes," in view of "the long distance we have traveled in the direction of State interference in private affairs." This interference is often due to the fact that unwise legislatures hastily act in response to demands insistently urged by half-baked reformers and parlor sociologists. "Our main reliance for the perpetuation of ideals of individual liberty," writes Dr. Freund, "must be in the continued exercise of the judicial prerogative." The argument against the further encroachment upon the judicial function of government could hardly be stated more strongly.

Most of the verses in the May-June number of the Poetry Review are about the war, "The Harvest" by Ernest K. Challenger and "A Hymn of Honor" by James A. Mackereth being rather long poems that are particularly deserving of praise. But there is nothing finer in the magazine than "Silence," a quite Shakespearian sonnet by Theodore Maynard, which runs thus:

Though I should deck you with my jeweled rhyme,
And spread my songs a carpet at your feet,
Where men may see, unchanged through changing time,
Your face a pattern in sad songs and sweet;
Though I should blow your honor through the earth,
Or touch your gentleness on gentle strings,
Or sing abroad your beauty and your worth—
Dear love, yet these were all imperfect things.

Rather in lovely silence will I keep
The heart's short song no words of mine may mar,
No words of mine enrich. The ways of sleep,
And pain, and prayer; all things that lonely are;
All humble things that worship and rejoice
Shall weave a spell of silence for my voice.

EDUCATION

Rescuing the Classics

THE classic writers of Greece and Rome have fared badly of late. Under the strain of repeated attacks on the citadel where they were so long entrenched, the ranks of their loyal followers have been reduced to a thin, wavering line. But there are champions fighting for them yet, determined not to betray their cause. Their case is too reasonable and just to be given over without a well-organized attempt to win back for them the ground which they have lost.

The Princeton Meeting

THE classics have found no commonplace champions. A great American institution of learning has boldly flung their banner to the breeze and Princeton University has gallantly enlisted under its folds. In doing so the University honors itself, while at the same time, it lends to what seemed to be a losing cause a prestige which no one will dare to minimize. On June 2 the University welcomed a distinguished gathering. The meeting convened to discuss the place of classical studies in higher education, and while it did not entirely exclude the teacher of the classics or eminent classical scholars, it was composed mainly of business and professional men, of lawyers, statesmen, journalists, who have gained a nationwide reputation for their accomplishments in the political, educational, financial, scientific and industrial life of the country. In the statement given to the public, in which Dean West of the Graduate School of Princeton gave notice of the proposed meeting, he left it to be understood that its purpose was a genuine classical "rally," with large and contagious enthusiasms, to make a showing of strength in the form of the most prominent men of the country against the recent attempts, unwarranted, unnecessary and revolutionary, of the Rockefeller General Education Board to reform our present system of education. Dean West, in making the announcement, says:

> The recent attacks on classical studies and on the whole theory of training and discipline of school and college education are well known. Accordingly a public conference on the value of classical studies in liberal education is to be held at Princeton, under the auspices of Princeton University on Saturday, June 2.

The speakers chosen to address the gathering could do so with special authority. Were they nothing but classical experts, that of course would lend meaning and weight to their words. But they were not to be exclusively such. Were they to speak in that capacity alone they might be suspected of partiality. But they were, as Dean West tells us, men from other fields, "modern men" thoroughly in touch with all the complex problems of our age, men who have made their mark in American life, not merely bookmen and fireside philosophers, "but men who believe in the unity of our higher knowledge and the value of broad general training, classics included, as the finest intellectual preparation for life, and as of priceless value to our country, especially at the present time."

Meaning of the Symposium

AS to the meaning of the Princeton symposium, there can be, we think, but one view. With keen insight into our educational problems, its organizers sensed a danger. The spirit of revolution is everywhere active. Not only is the crash of shattered thrones heard, but echoes of a vast educational upheaval reverberate on all sides. The time-honored standards of the mind are flung aside with a contempt which gives wise and temperate men no small ground for misgiving. An attempt is being made on a large scale, the more dangerous because backed by inexhaustible sources of wealth, to upset the methods of the past and to substitute for them untried means and instruments, radical and revolutionary. The attempts thus made are extremely dangerous in themselves, because they have neither experience nor sound pedagogical reasons to back them, and because they are in the case of the encroachments of the General Education Board, an endeavor scantily veiled to regulate and control, according to its own standards and hobbies, the one thing over which free citizens in an ordered commonwealth should most jealously keep watch and ward: the education of their children.

But there is another danger. The dangers before mentioned are of a pedagogical, social or semi-political nature. The danger to which we now refer is of a psychological nature. Men, we know, readily yield to the lure of the untried. They love to launch out on uncharted seas. If they can be enticed by the glamour of large and unexpected gain, they gladly set sail for some visionary El Dorado. But the promise and the picture of the unknown and the hitherto untried too often keep the mind in a state of feverish unrest. The adventurer craves for new thrills every day and is never satisfied to settle down to the safe but hum-drum regularities of ordinary life. He nowhere pitches his tent permanently. New ventures, new fields, new dreams are ever beckoning him onwards.

In the field of education, the same danger lurks. The educational adventurer is abroad. He is not satisfied with the accomplishments of the past in the sphere of education. He is ever trying new methods, disparaging the old, urging experiment and essaying untried solutions. While we have the highest regard for the progressive educator, who attempts educational betterment in every field of endeavor, but does so while building on the experience and the knowledge of former ages. we have but little confidence in those who radically break with tradition and start out on a journey across a treacherous sea, without the guiding lights which the past has put into their hands.

These new ventures are keeping the public mind in a state of chronic unrest. The educational methods of yesterday are flung overboard today, only to be changed tomorrow for others more radical. The minds of educators and pupils alike are kept in a state of ferment. Experiment follows experiment. Methods, standards, studies, programs, courses, are juggled with like so many toys, tucked away and drawn out again, and finally broken to pieces according to the whim of the hour. If this intellectual anarchy is to continue, if the leaders of the educational world do not call a halt to all these revolutionary changes, we shall have a general referendum of the pupils themselves, in which they will, with unanimous and boisterous mirth, pass the decree that they will study just what they like, and suit their own fancy and whims. We can imagine the result.

The Appeal for the Classics

IT is this danger that the Princeton meeting has tried to bring home to the American public. It cannot be said that Americans are markedly conservative. We love adventure. We are fond of the new. Venerable traditions do not always find us in a very deferential mood. We are self-reliant, full of initiative; we boast of our independence. Our disregard of tradition cannot always be said to be well-balanced or tactful. But our initiative, our love of adventure, our restless activity, the manly self-reliance that tries to blaze out new paths, these characteristics, when kept within their proper bounds, are qualities we would not readily see lost or changed. But we are the heirs of the past. We cannot afford to scorn it. If we do so, we do it at our own peril. If in our national life, we cannot cut entirely adrift from the influences, political, constitutional, social and religious which bind us to the old world, no more can we snap asunder those intellectual bonds which unite us with the educational achievements and methods which in preceding centuries have produced such magnificent results.

It is not our intention to extol here the benefits of a classical education, nor even to indicate in the briefest words the influence exerted on American life by the intelligent study of the great masters of the literatures of Greece and Rome. The University which called the meeting of June 2 makes that subject one of the chief topics of the assembly. For it has realized that no matter what may be the influences at work which are endeavoring to uncrown those sceptered potentates of the mind that have so long ruled over past generations, it would not be fair to dethrone them without a word of protest. Their cause deserves to be pleaded with the people before they are ignominiously and finally driven into exile.

And in their hour of need, friends from the most unexpected quarters plead for them. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts; Alba B. Johnson, President of the Baldwin Locomotive Works of Philadelphia; Fairfax Harrison, President of the Southern Railway; Charles R. Miller, editor of the New York Times; President Wilson; ex-Presidents Roosevelt and Taft; Secretary Lansing; Ellery Sedgwick, editor of the Atlantic Monthly; Elihu Root, and others equally well known, champion the cause of these old classics, which in so many ways is the cause of true culture and education. Every friend of that true education will agree with the words of Dean West, of Princeton, when he says that "the ever old and ever renewed forces of commercialism, of ignorance and of confusion, sometimes dressed up like the army of knowledge" are again leagued against these old masters, and that these foes are powerful. They can be summed up in the words "the dislike for training, the pursuit of what is seen to be obviously and quickly useful, and the love of the pleasantly easy way of life." In defending the cause of the classics there can be no doubt, as Dean West says, that we are contributing to the highest welfare of the country.

SOCIOLOGY

The Rural Apostolate: Catholic Literature Again.

IN a preceding paper some suggestions were made concerning the distribution of Catholic literature in rural districts. There remains one feature of this work which can prove marvelously fruitful: the distribution of Catholic literature in foreign languages. Few English-speaking Catholics have an idea of the wealth of Catholic foreign language publications in the United States; yet we often happen upon foreign-speaking families, isolated on farms, who have never even seen a copy of some of the excellent Catholic publications in their own language. Often the more enterprising Socialist journal has made its way into the country home, with disastrous results. By providing himself with samples of such foreign language periodicals as he is apt to find a use for, the enterprising rural apostle, or subscription agent, could often save the faith of an entire family, or a whole countryside. If the Catholic literature is mailed, as in my first suggestion, publications in fitting languages could be sent to any immigrant families that happen to be on the list.

OUR FOREIGN PERIODICALS

MANY of these people, for instance, among the Slavic nationalities, are ardent readers. Moreover, they discuss what they read more earnestly than our more self-sufficient English-speaking brethren. It is easy to recall the image of a hard-working Uniat settler and his wife, as they pore over their weekly Catholic periodical through the winter evenings. Or they have the little daughter read it to them, including every word of the Russian Gospel homily, while the lamplight catches the bright gold and green and red in the picture of the great St. Nicholas, which is the pride of their neat little two-roomed cabin. He has had in his life but six months' schooling, and that in the "old country"; but he remembers and digests what he reads, and brings out new and old bits of historical or economic lore, like a true paterfamilias. From his reading, too, he draws weapons with which to rebuke and silence infidel neighbors.

Again, the publishers of these periodicals have not usually the means of circulating many subscription-agents, and even these may meet with rebuffs from their own people that an English-speaking solicitor would be spared. Among many of our foreign-born citizens there is an urgent need of apologetic literature. The utter simplicity of their faith renders them helpless against the onslaughts of schemers and demagogues. In thousands of cases, a little good reading would have saved them from utter infidelity.

THE LOCAL PRESS

TO these suggestions let me add another, viz., that of introducing Catholic literature directly into the local papers; county papers, for instance, as they are found in many parts of our country. These are the papers that a rural citizen reads, when he has carefully untied his little package of mail, after an eight-mile drive to the post-office, and settles himself down beside the "tin heater" to enjoy his sole purely intellectual pastime: that of disagreeing with everything, word by word, in the George's County Weekly Lighthouse.

These papers are composed of "patent insides," or rather "outsides," and a local section compiled painfully by the local editor, in which anything is published that the printer's devil can manage to set up: mortuary poems, letters from sea-captains on the effects of prohibition, controversies concerning the new State Road route, notices of Bethesda M. E. suppers, and always a number of articles signed "Communicated," or introduced "Printed by Request."

SUGGESTED SUBJECTS

WHY could not a good work be done by furnishing some of these papers with a weekly column, ethically sound and instructive? This would be a valuable antidote to certain types of rural bigotry. A column treating of religion as such would not be welcome. It would arouse useless antagonism, and be unacceptable to the editor. Articles which, though not specifically Catholic, would offer the readers some sound Catholic teaching on ethical or historical matters, yet in such a way as to be as acceptable to the Protestant as to the Catholic, are what is wanted. For instance, a set of little papers on the relations of employer to employee and kindred subjects; on religion as the foundation of patriotism, or of the home, or of prosperity; on the evils of divorce; on proper training of children; on bigotry; the results of infidelity; reasons for believing in God, etc. Such articles would enlighten thousands of minds which cannot be reached otherwise, and fertilize the ground at least, for the eventual reception of the truth. They would serve to offset many historical or ethical misconceptions which hinder the progress of Catholicism. Much of the excellent material which appears in our Catholic college journals could be used that way. A simple statement of some of the commonplaces of our Catholic college classrooms will often make a profound impression, if they can be made plain to rural readers.

Such articles, if not learned or ostensibly "denominational" in tone, would probably be gladly accepted by many a troubled editor. To engage in this successfully, of course, you would have to be in touch with local Catholic residents, and use considerable tact at the start.

JOHN LAFARGE, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Government Ownership of Tracks and Depots

A CORRESPONDENT suggests a government ownership of railway tracks and depots similar to the public ownership of streets at the present time. According to this plan, every railway track throughout the country would be thrown open for traffic to any and all transportation companies willing to comply with the conditions set by the Government. The latter would determine the rates and direct the operation of trains, leaving the tracks themselves free for all competitors under equal terms. This, he argues, would prevent speculative road building and stock gambling. It would likewise provide competition over the same tracks. "A rate per ton per mile would prevent certain cities from being favored and would tend to relieve congestion in large cities, now favored by discriminating rates. It would operate to give the public the benefit of the unearned increment due to increased values in large cities which are the result of present discriminating conditions and, above all, would prevent combinations of either roads or employers."

Children and the War

IN a good paper contributed by Dr. Frank O'Hara to the current Catholic World on "War Experience with Labor Standards," he cites the following facts regarding the increase of juvenile delinquency owing to the war:

> According to a circular issued by the [British] Home Office, inquiries that were made by the police of seventeen of the largest towns, comparing the three months, December, 1914, to February, 1915, with the three months, December, 1915, to February, 1916, the total number of children and young persons charged with punishable offences has grown from 2,686 to 3,596 (an increase of thirty-four per cent), and the increase has been experienced in practically all of the towns consulted. According to the investigation made by the Howard Association, the offences of youthful persons increased fifty-six per cent in Manchester from 1914 to 1915, forty-seven per cent in Edinburgh, and thirty-two per cent in Liverpool. Various attempts have been made to explain this sudden increase in juvenile crime. The character of the British youth is being broken down under the strain of hard work and no relaxation. Families are broken up, and parental control has disappeared on account of the continued absence of the father in the workshop or in the army. The children are earning wages and they no longer listen to the advice of their parents. . . . A similar increase in crime on the part of the youth of Germany has been noted since the beginning of the war. In 1915 there were twice as many crimes committed by children in Berlin as in 1914. During the first three months of 1915 there were as many crimes committed by children in Munich as there were in the twelve months of 1914. In Frankfort there was a decrease in the number of lesser offenses in 1915 as compared with 1914, but there was an increase of forty per cent in serious crime.
> The foregoing figures are recommended to the earnest consideration of those hysterical legislators who have suspended some of the hard-won laws designed to prevent the industrial exploitation of children.

Return of Pupils Urged for Next Fall

THE return of our high-school pupils to their respective classes is urged as a patriotic duty by Dr. P. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education. Their attendance at school, he says, will not lower the productive capacity of the country in any appreciable degree. On the other hand, the longer the war may last, the greater will be the need of trained men and women. The first call of the Allies was for 12,000 engineers and skilled men to repair the railroads of France and England. The demand for highly trained men will soon entirely exceed the supply, if our high schools and colleges are closed. This will be no less true after the war, when the need for men and women of knowledge and training will be greater than ever.

> England, France, Italy and the Central Powers will all be going through a process of reconstruction, and we should be ready to give them generously every possible help. Their colleges and universities are now almost empty. Their older students, the recent graduates, and their younger professors are fighting and dying in the trenches, or are already dead, as are many of the older scientific men, artists and others whose work is necessary for the enlargement of the cultural and spiritual life, and for all that makes for higher civilization. America must come to the rescue. We must be ready to assume all the responsibilities and perform thoroughly and well all the duties that will come to us in the new and more closely related world.

The intellectual and spiritual leadership of the world depends upon the young men and women who are now being graduated, or who will be graduated during the coming years. It is probable, as Mr. Claxton admits, that the higher classes will be smaller than usual next fall, but he adds: "The graduates from the high schools should see to it that the lower classes more than make up for this deficiency."

Missions and the Rich

THE editorial notes of the Catholic Missions for June contain some interesting items. On the authority of a Protestant magazine it is mentioned that the per capita donation of the Seventh-Day Adventists for their mission work averaged $9.08. This is a remarkable sum, since even the principal Protestant denominations consider an average of $2.00 for the missions and $5.00 for benevolences on the part of each member a very generous contribution. Think of the many millions a per capita donation of even $2.00 would secure for our sorely tried Catholic missions. Reference is also made to a young Protestant millionaire who has determined to devote himself and his fortune to the mission cause, and for this purpose recently entered a seminary of his denomination. The incident elicits a rather strong comment from the editor:

> Such an example might well be followed by some young Catholic millionaires. Not a few of them are living useless lives, squandering the money accumulated by their fathers. Would that Catholic parents of means would encourage in their sons a vocation for mission work instead of sending them to universities infected by materialism and infidelity where they lose the Faith. We seldom, if ever, hear of a rich Catholic family giving a priest to the Church. Why? Is it another instance of the malediction which generally follows wealth?

Catholic mission journals, as a rule, waste few compliments upon the rich, who hitherto have rarely shown any intelligent and apostolic interest in the mission cause. Even their wills ignore it, while Protestant testaments "almost invariably contain an important legacy to the work of their Church in distant lands." The recent appeal to our students by the Mission Crusade Bureau should help to remove this apathy.

Defending the Classics

AMONG the half-dozen excellent papers which make the June Atlantic Monthly a particularly readable number is "The Assault on Humanism," an admirable defense of the classics by Mr. Paul Shorey, Professor of Greek, at the University of Illinois. The arguments for the "new education" which Mr. Flexner and President Eliot have marshaled in earlier numbers of the Atlantic are first shown to be as old as the hills and are then torn to shreds. Mr. Shorey is merciless in his exposure of his opponents' feeble logic and shifty ways, for he writes:

> And my demurrer to the logic relates rather to methods which Mr. Flexner and President Eliot have in common with each other and with many assailants of classical studies—the shifting of the issue from one kind or grade of education to another; the fallacy of assigning one cause for infinitely complex phenomena; the postulate of an "absolute either—or," where no such alternative confronts us: the statement of the opponent's case in its feeblest form; exploiting the equivocation of "utility," "practical," "discipline," "science," "culture," and other ambiguous terms; the substitution of prophecy, or unsubstantiated assertion, for fact. These procedures may pass muster in the smooth course of "the readable proposition;" they could not endure the test of an old-fashioned disputation . . . It follows that, in the present state of the question, the principal effort of the classicist who aims at argument rather than eloquence must be to shame his opponents from their unfair tactics, their neglect of the evidence, their preposterous logic, and to urge the educated public to examine the matter for themselves. He must wearily repeat his old list of "must nots" and "dont's." You must not shift the issue by talking about democracy and the masses, and industrial education, and Booker Washington at Tuskegee, and Madame Montessori. That is a mere subterfuge. We are speaking of non-vocational high-school and collegiate education. You must not urge that "They don't get Latin," that Latin is badly taught and imperfectly remembered, unless you can show that other subjects are always effectively taught and not forgotten. And also, unless you confess that the unrest and the unsettlement which you yourselves have introduced into American education is a chief cause of the lack of conviction with which most definite or difficult subjects are taught and studied today.

That last is a Robin Hood shot, and is just what the late Father Timothy Brosnahan, S. J., proved in his renowned pamphlet, "President Eliot and Jesuit Colleges."

Opportunities for Laymen's and Women's Retreats

PLENTIFUL opportunities are offered the laity to make the spiritual exercises at one or other of the many houses of retreat thrown open to them during the summer months. No vacation should be considered complete without a retreat. Arrangements in many instances are such that even the restless business man can avail himself of these opportunities. Thus the retreats at Mt. Manresa, Staten Island, are held every "week-end," beginning Friday evening and concluding Monday morning. During 1916 there were 1,289 retreatants at Mt. Manresa, and 1,007 more in the extension retreats connected with it, a grand total of 2,296. Other laymen's retreats conducted by the Jesuit Fathers begin at Kenrick Seminary, Webster Groves, near St. Louis, July 26 (an English and a German retreat); at St. Mary's College, St. Mary's, Kansas, July 28, August 4, August 11, and a Knights of Columbus' retreat, June 24; at St. Stanislaus House of Retreat, Brooklyn Station, Cleveland, O., July 5 (German), July 26, August 2, 9, 16, 23; and at Campion College, Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 13 and August 10. Retreats are also given in other Jesuit houses. The Fathers of the Divine Word conduct three laymen's retreats at St. Mary's Mission House, Techny, Ill., near Chicago, beginning July 6, July 20 (German), and August 3. At Dubuque College, Iowa, a retreat for laymen is to begin June 15. Opportunities are doubtless offered in many other places, although the dates have not come to our notice. A long list of retreats for women and girls in English, German and French, is offered by the Religious of Our Lady of the Cenacle at St. Regis Cenacle, New York; the Convent of Our Lady of the Cenacle, Boston, Mass.; and the Convent of Our Lady of the Cenacle, Newport, R. I. A woman's retreat is announced for August 17, at St. Mary's College, Prairie du Chien, Wis.; four retreats are to be given for women at St. Ann's Home, Techny, Ill.; a retreat is set for each month from July to November at the Passionist Convent of Our Lady of Sorrows, Carrick, Pa., and five dates are assigned by the nuns at the Convent of the Blessed Sacrament, Yonkers, N. Y. It is to be hoped that more and more Catholics will now avail themselves of these opportunities to make an annual retreat.

Church Schools and Public Schools in the Philippines

IN the course of a speech on "Education in the Philippines," delivered at the Lake Mohonk Conference on the "Indian and Other Dependent People," by Professor E. B. Conant, Esq., of the Department of Law in the University of the Philippines, and now printed in the Conference's thirty-fourth annual report, the following remark was made:

> I have been asked what the church schools are doing compared with the work of the public schools carried on by the Government. Of course they have shown wonderful improvement. At the beginning of American occupation their work from our standpoint was exceedingly elementary. I don't think anyone will take issue with me in saying that they taught little else than the catechism and a few simple branches; but of course the American public school system there has furnished the incentive, the rivalry, and has forced the church schools to come up as far as possible to the American standard.

Is it possible that Professor Conant can be ignorant of the fact that the Benedictine, Dominican and Jesuit Fathers in Manila conducted colleges equal, to say the least, to our American colleges years before the American occupation took place, and that they, as well as the Augustinians, had flourishing colleges in other centers of the Islands? Is it possible that he does not know that the Dominicans are conducting even now, and were conducting prior to 1898, a school of law, of medicine and of theology? Has he never heard that the Filipino members of the Philippine Commission, of the Supreme Court, of the Senate and Assembly, received their education in these "church schools that taught little else than catechism and a few simple branches?" In his simplicity Professor Conant believes that no one will "take issue" with him, yet curiously enough he instantly proceeds to take issue with himself:

> From a university standpoint I hesitate to tell this, but I will admit the fact, as it is all on record, the two men that took the two prizes in the last graduating classes of our College of Law last commencement day were both of them graduates of the Jesuit College, the Ateneo de Manila, and I also must admit, though I am sorry to have to do so, that a year ago, last commencement day, one of the two leaders of the graduating class, the finished product of the College of Law, that had sifted along through the University to its graduating year, was also a graduate of the Jesuit College in the city of Manila. The church schools have come up tremendously.

This is surely a rather striking refutation of his own words, and we do not marvel that he is "sorry" and "hesitates" to inform us of the truth, but "must admit it as it is on record." But is it not equally on record that these church schools, church colleges and church universities were flourishing in the Philippines long before Admiral Dewey went to Manila or before our oldest American university, Harvard, was established? They were great centers of learning before the Professor's native State of New Hampshire could boast of even its little "rural school."

The War.—During the week there has been a renewal of artillery activity in Belgium, especially between Ramscappelle and Dixmude. Though vigorous engagements have taken place in the vicinity of Hulluch, Lens, Monchy and Chérisy, they have left the line practically unchanged. The British, however, succeeded in taking about a mile of German trenches on the western slope of Greenland Hill, north of the Scarpe. Further south the Germans have been making fruitless attacks on the French lines. They occupied some French positions northwest of the Froidmont Farm, but were subsequently forced to relinquish them.

Bulletin, June 4, p.m.-June 11, a.m.

Along the Isonzo the Austrians have shown unexpected strength. They made some progress on San Marco but later retired; east of Goritz, however, they have made some permanent gains; and south of Jamiano they claim to have retaken most of the ground recently captured by the Italians, including most of the Italian positions on the western slopes of Monte Hermada, the village of Flonder, and some positions near Medeazza. Considerable activity on the part of the Austrians has been reported in the Trentino.

The most important military event of the week was the capture by the British of the Wytschaete salient on a front of five miles long and three miles deep. This salient was a very important German position, dangerous to Ypres from the south, consisting of high ground which has given the Germans since October, 1914, valuable observation-points and effective sites for destructive gun-fire. The attack was begun with the explosion of 950,000 pounds of high explosives, distributed in nineteen mines dug under the German lines from Hill 60 to the wood of Ploegsteert. Hill 60 was blown to pieces, the Wytschaete-Messines ridge was torn asunder and large portions of the German defense system were hopelessly shattered.

British Storm Wytschaete Salient

Under cover of a terrific artillery fire and a dense smoke-barrage, British infantry, supported by armored tanks and airships, swarmed up the western slopes and after three hours of fighting had secure possession of the entire ridge. Before midday the villages of Wytschaete and Messines had been taken, and by the middle of the afternoon the British had forced their way down the eastern slopes, occupied Oosttaverne and other smaller villages, and straightened out their line from Hill 60 to Frelinghien. Repeated German counter-attacks failed to dislodge the British from their newly-gained positions, and the entire line, as readjusted, is now securely in British hands.

The visit of the American delegation to Russia, which has for its purpose "to express the deep friendship of the American people for the people of Russia and to discuss the best and most practical means of cooperation between the two peoples in carrying the present struggle for the freedom of all peoples to a successful consummation," has afforded President Wilson an opportunity for restating the objects which the United States had in mind in entering the war. This he has done in a communication to the Russian Government.

The Note to Russia

The position of America in this war is so clearly avowed that no man can be excused for mistaking it. She seeks no material profit or aggrandizement of any kind. She is fighting for no advantage or selfish object of her own, but for the liberation of peoples everywhere from the aggressions of autocratic force. . . . We are fighting for the liberty, the self-government and the undictated development of all peoples, and every feature of the settlement that concludes this war must be conceived and executed for that purpose. Wrongs must first be righted and then adequate safeguards must be created to prevent their being committed again.

Having laid down this platform, the President declares that the United States will oppose the proposal made by recent German propaganda for a return to the state of things which existed before the outbreak of hostilities.

Of course, the Imperial German Government and those whom it is using for their own undoing are seeking to obtain pledges that the war will end in the restoration of the status quo ante. It was the status quo ante out of which this iniquitous war issued forth, the power of the Imperial German Government within the empire and its widespread domination and influence outside of that empire. That status must be altered in such fashion as to prevent any such hideous thing from ever happening again.

Readjustments, the President continues, will have to be made on the following principle:

> No people must be forced under sovereignty under which it does not wish to live. No territory must change hands except for the purpose of securing those who inhabit it a fair chance of life and liberty. No indemnities must be insisted on except those that constitute payment for manifest wrongs done. No readjustments of power must be made except such as will tend to secure the future peace of the world and the future welfare and happiness of its peoples.

Once a settlement has been effected on this high ground of universal liberty, a common covenant must be drawn up by the free peoples, combining their united force "to secure peace and justice in the dealings of nations with one another," and to resist aggression on the part of "autocratic and self-pleasing power." The President calls attention to the fact that these are motives which justify and glorify the expenditure of blood and treasure, and render victory certain if union can only be maintained in the great cause of human liberty. After victory has been secured we can afford to be generous, he concludes, "but we cannot afford then or now to be weak or omit a single guarantee of justice and security."

During the week ending June 11 no great progress was made at Washington in war legislation. Most of the important bills remained in conference. The Senate Financial Committee still wrestled with the revision of the War Revenue bill passed by the House, and there is little likelihood that this measure will be brought before the Senate during the present week. The Committee continued to discuss the question of taxing newspapers and periodicals, incomes and excess profits; it abandoned the proposed taxation of confectionary, revised the automobile tax paragraph; and is disposed to write into the bill a prohibitive tax on distilled liquors, forbidding at the same time their importation. The tax is twenty dollars a bushel on grain used in the manufacture of whisky and other ardent spirits, and five dollars a gallon on molasses and spirits used in the manufacture of rum. At present there exists in the country a stock of whisky which is estimated to be not less than 300,000,000 gallons; this will be taxed according to the present plan at two dollars and twenty cents a gallon instead of one dollar and ten cents a gallon, as provided for in the existing law.

War Legislation

The American Medical Association has officially announced that through its agencies the medical forces of the country have been organized and that there are at least 142,000 physicians and surgeons available for the Red Cross service. Lord Northcliffe, at the request of the British War Office, has accepted the post of head of the British War Mission in the United States. His work, which is to be commercial and not political, will consist in coordinating the efforts of the various British agencies now in the United States and effecting cooperation between the nations of the Entente and the American Government. The heads of the war missions of the other Governments are M. André Tardieu for France, the Italian Ambassador, Count Macchi da Cellere, for Italy, and Professor Bakhneteff for Russia.

Other Items

Reports from the District of Columbia and from twenty-six States show a total registration of 4,716,768. As the districts for which the final tabulation has been filed with the Government comprise about one-half of the country, it is believed that the number of young men liable to conscription will be approximately 9,000,000. This is somewhat lower than the figure given by the census authorities, but in no way indicates that there has been any disposition to evade the duty of registration. Delay has been occasioned by the fact that some neglected to register through misunderstanding, and also because the tabulation of names sent in by mail has been necessarily slower than in the case of those who appeared before the registrars in person. Another reason for the total registration being lower than was popularly expected is the fact that from 500,000 to 1,000,000 men were exempt from the duty of registration, because they are already enrolled in the armed forces of the nation.

Canada.—Just at present the conscription bill is a topic of keen discussion in Canada, both on account of the opposition it has aroused and because, though it is now on the eve of introduction into Parliament, Canadians do not know its provisions. Prophecy concerning its contents and fate are numerous. If rumors be true, both married and unmarried men between twenty and forty-five years of age will be liable to draft without registration. Government organs predict the immediate passage of the bill. The Ottawa Journal says: "The Government expects to get the support of twenty-one Liberals and the whole of its own party, which will give the Government nearly a hundred majority for conscription." The Montreal Gazette declares:

The Conscription Bill

> There are now three groups, Government, Liberal Conscriptionists and Liberal Anti-Conscriptionists. Next week may see these merged, or they may be merged into two parties, Unionist and Nationalist. The Government has emerged from the tense situation much stronger and more aggressive, and Sir Robert Borden occupies a position stronger than any Prime Minister has had in the last twenty-five years.

On the other hand many think that the measure will be defeated, while others again are of the opinion that it will ultimately be submitted to a referendum, only to be rejected by the people. It is expected that Sir Wilfred Laurier, supported by the Hon. William Pugsley, the Hon. Frank Oliver and other equally prominent Liberals, will lead the anti-conscriptionists. The outcome is awaited with great interest by all Canadians.

China.—On June 1 word came from Amoy that the northern provinces of Anhwei, Honan, and Hupeth had declared themselves independent of Peking, through dissatisfaction with the pro-German policy of the Kwo Min Tang, the dominant political party at the capital. Later advices announced that General Shang-Hsun, Military Governor of the Province of Anhwei, came to Tien-Tsin on June 2 and after conferring with the militarists there, set up a provisional government, composed of the following members: General Shang-Hsun was appointed dictator; Wang-Shih-chen, the acting Premier, was made Premier; Tuan-Chi-kuei, brother of Tuan-Chi-jui, former Premier, was named Minister of War; Tsao-Julin, who is believed to be strongly pro-Japanese, received the portfolio of Foreign Affairs, and Tang-Hua-lung, former Minister of Communications, was chosen as Minister of the Interior.

Revolutionary Movements

By June 3 eleven out of the eighteen Provinces of China, it was reported, were no longer recognizing the authority of the Peking Government, but the three southern Provinces of Kwang-Tung, Kwangsi, and Yun-nan were loyally supporting President Yuan-Li-Hung. As the Peking military commanders refused to carry out the President's orders, he could do little to check the revolutionary movement, Vice-President Feng Kwo-Chang handed in his resignation, and Yuan-Li-Hung issued a proclamation urging the factions to unite, and protesting his own neutrality in the internal troubles that are imperiling the Chinese Republic. The seceding Provinces demand the dismissal of the National Assembly, the revision of the Constitution, the dismissal of the President's advisers, the reinstatement as Premier of Tuan-Chi-jui and war against Germany. In Tien-Tsin martial law has been declared, forces from three revolted Provinces are encamped near it, Gen. Chang-Haun has entered the city with 5,000 troops and was received almost like a king. He says that the present trouble can be settled, provided Parliament is dissolved.

France.—The Ribot Government has had to face a well-organized opposition for the past week. But finally after a two days' session, which came as a climax to a protracted debate, it has come out victorious from the struggle. During the latter part of the discussion Admiral Lacaze, Minister of Marine, and the conduct of the navy were under fire, especially on account of the merchant marine losses. But on June 8 the Chamber of Deputies voted confidence in the Government by 310 to 178.

Vote of Confidence in the Ribot Government

In the closing session the attack centered on the alleged laxity of the measures taken to combat the submarine menace. Speaking in defense of the Government, Premier Ribot declared that the submarine war had suprised the navies of all the Allies. But he did not deny the peril and asked for increased credits to meet this new form of warfare. The Premier agreed to the creation of a department of submarine defense. While the debate was going on in the Chamber, the Senate unanimously adopted a bill revising the budget of the Minister of the Navy so as to include more ample credits for anti-submarine measures.

Ireland.—According to dispatches to the New York press, dated from London, June 9, Major William H. K. Redmond, member of Parliament for the East Division of Clare and a brother of John Redmond, leader of the Irish Nationalists in the House of Commons, has just died from wounds received on the battle front in France. He was wounded in action on June 7. "The news of Major Redmond's death," says the correspondent of the New York Sun, "will cause genuine regret both in England and Ireland. He was one of the most brilliant men of the Nationalist party, and while an uncompromising advocate of Home Rule, he was one of the most popular men in Parliament and the country." On the outbreak of the war, he gave his whole-hearted support to the cause of the Allies, and though well over the age limit sought and obtained a commission in an Irish regiment and served with the Sixth Royal Irish Rifles. He sat in Parliament for Wexford, North Fermanagh and East Clare successively, having represented the East Division of Clare since 1892. He was born in 1861, was brilliantly educated and distinguished himself as a barrister-at-law. He was well known in the United States, to which country he made several visits, the last one being just before the war. After Major Redmond's regiment went to France, he made but few appearances in the House of Commons, but these became notable for his continued support of the war and his eloquent appeals for a conciliatory settlement of the Irish question.

Death of William Redmond

Rome.—The Holy Father recently addressed a brief to the Reverend Father Joseph Hiss, the Superior General of the Society of Mary, on the centenary of the Society, soon to be celebrated. In this letter Pope Benedict makes touching reference to the Founder of the Congregation, Father Chaminade, who at the time when the French Revolution was at its height and the clergy who had not taken the schismatical, constitutional oath, were the victims of the sternest persecution, distinguished himself by his fidelity to duty, his zeal for the Divine glory and his charity to his neighbor. The Holy Father recalls the heroism with which time and again this saintly priest risked his own life to bring the consolations of religion to the sick and the dying. The apostle was undoubtedly raised by God to preserve the Faith in Bordeaux in those troublous days. The Holy Father proposes him to all Christians as a model of fidelity to duty and to the inspirations of the Holy Ghost.

The Chaminade Centenary

Russia.—The situation in Russia does not appear to be improving much. Military activity and domestic progress are at a standstill owing to the quarrels between the Cabinet and the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, and owing to the serious labor troubles. The Delegates have the power but the Cabinet the responsibility. The laboring classes have the vaguest idea of economic principles and make the most unreasonable demands. However, fraternizing with the enemy at the front is reported to be less frequent than formerly, and deserters are returning to the lines. Moreover, according to a well authenticated report, the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates issued a letter to the Russian army, stating that the Council had rejected a German offer for an armistice. The armistice was suggested that a way might be indicated by which Russia might obtain an honorable peace without rupture with the Allies.

The Future Still Dark

On June 8 the Congress of Peasants, in session at Petrograd, adopted a resolution calling upon the army to submit to discipline and defend revolutionary Russia. The Congress also announced that

> The peasants aspire to an equitable peace without humiliating annexation or indemnity and with the right of each nation to dispose of itself. International relations and treaties should be submitted to the control of the people interested. Disputes should be settled by an international tribunal and not by force. The congress approves the union of workers and appeals to the peasants of all countries to force their governments to renounce annexations and indemnities.

Minister of War Kerensky has ordered the resolution to be read to all ranks of the army and navy.

Kronstadt, the seaport and fortress of Petrograd, which defied the Provisional Government and set up an independent republic early this month, is now jumping from surrender to defiance. Early in the week it announced its submission; later it renewed its resolution deposing the Petrograd Government. The leader of the revolt was Anatole Lamanoff, a young student of chemistry, who had made himself President of the Kronstadt Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates. Ten representatives from the new republic conferred with the Petrograd Council of Delegates on June 5, and the Socialist Ministers, Kerensky, Tseretelli, Skobeleff and Tchernoff addressed the meeting. The Petrograd Delegates proposed a resolution which summoned Kronstadt to return at once to the revolutionary democracy. Two of the Socialist Ministers went to Kronstadt on June 5, addressed the Council and the crowds in the street, and finally a majority of the Council agreed to recognize the Provisional Government, so peace was made. But this happy state was of short duration. On June 9 the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates sent out a statement to the Socialists of the world, reiterating the slogan, "Peace without annexations or indemnities on the basis of rights of nations to decide their own destiny," and summoning to a conference to be held at Stockholm on "a certain day between June 28 and July 8," Socialist delegates from all over the world. The manifesto runs:

Kronstadt's Revolt

Socialists' Peace Manifesto

> The Council of Soldier's and Workmen's Delegates is of the opinion that the speedy termination of the war and the restoration of international peace on the basis required by the general interests of labor, as well as mankind, can only be achieved if the Socialist Labor parties and trades unions in all countries, belligerent and neutral, will unite their efforts in a stubborn and energetic fight against this universal slaughter.
> The first important step in that direction is the summoning of an international conference, the main object of which should be to arrive at an agreement between the representatives of the Socialist proletariat in regard to the termination of the "party truce" with imperialistic governments and classes, which makes nugatory the real struggle for peace, as well as to carry this endeavor into practical effect.

The manifesto appears to be an invitation to the working classes both of the Allies and the Central Powers to withdraw their support from all the warring governments and set up the rule of Socialism.

Spain.—On June 9 Marquis Manuel Garcia Prieto tendered to the King the resignation of the Cabinet. The Cabinet, of which he was the head, was formed on April 19, in succession to that of Count Romanones. It has been well known for some time the Prieto Ministry has been confronted with both military and economic difficulties. There has been discontent among army officers who desire a betterment of their conditions, and probably the spirit of unrest will reach the rank and file of the troops. There has also been a great deal of dissatisfaction among the laboring classes with threats of a general strike. Sinking of Spanish vessels by German submarines has of late greatly added to the popular restlessness. Marquis Prieto virtually confessed himself unable to bring about the necessary changes in the political and economic status until the various problems facing the nation should be thoroughly discussed in Parliament. One of the last official acts of the retiring Premier was to urge upon the Council of Ministers the convocation of Parliament as speedily as possible, for it was felt on all sides that delay in doing so might precipitate an acute crisis, with which, if not met in time, it might be afterwards extremely difficult to deal. Reports point to Señor Dato as the head of the new Ministry.

Prieto Resigns

But the situation is still confused. There is talk in some quarters of Captain-General Valeriano Weyler being offered the post of Premier. Consulted on the crisis, ex-Premiers Romanones, Maura and Dato were of the opinion that Prieto should remain in power, choosing a new Minister of War. The King himself is said to have requested the retiring Minister to reconsider his resignation. The Conservatives expressed the belief that the Liberals should remain in office until Parliament can meet and furnish a solution of the crisis.

The Second Battle of Princeton

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

ON January 3, 1777, Washington defeated the British troops under Mawhood and Leslie at the battle of Princeton. Strategically and morally the victory was one of the most important in our struggle for independence. It gave our forces control of New Jersey and drove Cornwallis into New York. It heartened the people wearied of the war and made them realize that with a little more patience and a few more sacrifices, a lasting victory would crown their efforts.

The second battle of Princeton was begun on June 2, 1917. This time Englishmen and Americans fought side by side in a bloodless struggle. It was no longer Redcoat against Continental. It has been called "The Battle of the Books." Within sight of the fields where Washington rallied his columns, a blow was then struck for educational freedom and for the highest educational standards. In the halls of the University, a well-generaled and disciplined force, equipped for the fray and enthusiastic for the cause, lifted up the banner of the classics. And as was said in a late issue of AMERICA, it was sound strategy which selected its leaders, not from the dry-as-dust expounders of Greek accents and logaœdic verse, but a statesman like President Wilson, a chemist like Charles H. Herty, an architect like Thomas Hastings, a biologist like H. H. Donaldson, a geologist like William Berryman Scott. If railroad presidents, heads of great industrial concerns, and specialists in science plead the cause of those old masters, and emphasize the truth that the classics are the best instruments for the training of the mind, even of specialists, there is no reason for the rank and file of those who love the classics to despair of their cause.

"This Battle of the Books" has long been going on. It is almost impossible to contribute any new element to the contest. All the ammunition has been spent long ago. Even at the Princeton conference, the weapons, though good and effective were not new. But they were refurbished and polished, sharpened to keener edge and driven effectively home by hands fully conscious of their power.

The end of all true education is to humanize us, to render us as far as possible, rounded and perfect men. If any system or course of study can be found which will train the intellect, the imagination, and the heart; if any masters can be had to purify the emotions, refine the taste and give to all the faculties equilibrium and harmony; if any author or set of authors express in clear, strong, melodious language, the thoughts, the emotions common to all humanity and in a form ever permanent in its appeal to all passing ages; if besides this, the same system, the same authors connect us with a remote but noble civilization from which we derive our laws, our philosophy, our arts the very forms of the epics, the lyrics, the tragedies, the comedies, the historical narratives, which stir our hearts to laughter or tears, or nerve the hand to deeds of heroism, then we claim for them the right to rule, to guide and to teach. Now the classics have accomplished this. In this they stand supreme. Here above everything else lies their excellence. In this consist their power and their educational value. It is true that this is the function of all great literature and that what we say of them applies in some measure to all great writers. In one instance, even —that of Shakespeare—we might maintain that in some qualities he is greater than the greatest among the giants of Greece and Rome. In his almost infallible knowledge of the secret workings of the human heart in its every mood and crisis, and in his imperial sway over the resources of style, he has not perhaps his equal. But in taste, in refinement, in balance and proportion he must yield the palm to the bard of the Iliad or even to other classic authors of inferior gifts.

The poet has said that the proper study of mankind is man. If he means man exclusively, he is mistaken. If he means man in his relations to nature and above all things to God, he is right. The classics of Greece and Rome have made man in this larger sense their chief concern. They have done so with a steadiness and a surety of touch, with an infallible insight into his nature and the problems which press on him from all sides, with a balance and a truth which amaze us. In special lines, in individual sketches, in certain phases of life, in the side-issues of the ever-changing psychology of the human heart, they have been surpassed. But they have gone to the fundamentals of human nature. They have struck those primary but nobly sounding chords of human passion and feeling in a way which has not on the whole been rivaled. They have gazed with clear and steady eyes into the heights and the depths of human life. Humanity is their theme, in the very noblest sense of the word.

Whether it is Homer who sings of the battle on the plains of windy Troy, or Sophocles that depicts the gathering cloud of wrath and ignominy which is to burst over the head of the Theban king, or Plato who tells in style never matched for subdued emotion of the death of the wisest of the teachers of Athens, or Vergil who mourns over the dying Euryalus, it is the heart of man that is laid bare before us, it is his fate, his soul, his destiny, that mainly interests them and us. Humanity is the hero and the protagonist of the masterpieces of Greece and Rome. "Homo sum: humani nihil a me alienum puto," said Terence. "I am a man and all that interests and stirs the heart of humanity interests and moves mine." That might well be the motto of the classics. They were experts in this. They studied man in their philosophy, in the incomplete way of pagans, no doubt, but with rare and blinding flashes of the truth which blazes out from the pages of Aristotle, Plato, Cicero and Seneca. When not led astray by their passions, they spoke of God, of life, of virtue and vice, in words, at times, which Augustine, Aquinas or Bossuet would not have been ashamed to own.

The classics, here is their great excellence, are the voice of the human heart, sweet, powerful, harmonious, true. That voice is natural, sympathetic, never exaggerated or artificial, always under control, and swaying the deep and solemn chords of the deepest emotion and the highest thought. With the exception of the language of that inspired Book which directly bears the impress of the Creator Himself, no other language is so universal in its reach, in its appeal, in its understanding of the secrets, the aspirations and ideals, the mysteries, the sorrows and joys of the human soul as the language of the master spirits of Greece and Rome. They speak a tongue that all men may understand. They are Greeks and Romans, and Greek beauty and Roman strength are carved fair and deep into the structure of their work. But, by a strange contrast, they seem to be without nationality. Splendid as was his genius, and imperial as his sway was over the realm of the passions, there is something insular and local even in Shakespeare. He is Anglo-Saxon to the core. There is in his work a note that does not always appeal to the Frenchman or the Italian. Racine, with all his perfection of form and artistry of verse, is distinctly French and there are strains in his wondrous poetry which do not affect the Englishman or the German. Goethe, Schiller and Heine are thoroughly Teutonic. A Frenchman cannot be expected to surrender completely to their charm.

Not so with the classics. They seem to have divested themselves of the hard and fast bonds of time, nationality and race. Greek and Roman though they were, they appear above all things, men. Hence, their value in educating men. Voicing as they did the fundamental feelings and concepts of the human heart, inventors of the philosophical treatise and founders of the first philosophical systems and schools; the first to lay down laws for the drama, the epic and the lyric, for the oration, the historical narrative and the novel, the Greeks especially, and then their masterful imitators, the great writers of Rome, gave us also the first regular masterpieces in these various kinds of composition. The very names of the molds in which the human thought has been cast, ever since their days summon before us Homer and Thucydides, Plato, Theocritus, Demosthenes and Cicero, Aeschylus and Sophocles. And if the ancients have given us the molds in which men have cast their thought, they have given us also, in their picture of the human heart, types that serve for all time. They have painted man in the many-sided relations of his being and though the pictures were drawn, in one case, almost 3,000 years ago, they are as true to life as if drawn yesterday.

The Achilles of Homer is not only the gallant, headstrong yet generous Greek of the Iliad, he remains the type of the warrior for all time. The Hector, who bids farewell to Andromache at the Scaean Gates, is not merely the Trojan hero and the bulwark of Ilium. He is the soldier of all ages, who in one brief respite from the fray and conscious of impending doom, presses wife and child to his heart, and then because duty calls, rushes forth to die in the forefront of the battle while the tearful wife, soon to be widowed of her hero, watches his receding form. In Priam, kneeling at the feet of the stern Achilles, begging that the lifeless body of his Hector be restored to him for a soldier's burial, we see fatherhood itself, humbling its pride for the sake of the loved dead, just as in Achilles, raising from the ground the old king, who reminds him so much of his own aged sire, we see the heroes of all races and climes, who can be generous to an humbled and fallen foe. In the bloody tragedies of the House of Agamemnon, so terribly painted by Aeschylus, we forget the Greek king and the doom of his house and see in him the criminal, whoever he be, sooner or later overtaken by the wrath of the immortal gods. The literatures of Greece and Rome are a noble gallery, a richly furnished museum, where great artists have painted the character of the warrior, the statesman, the wife, the king, the patriot and the traitor and the child; the sins that stain the soul and the virtues that ennoble and transfigure it to heroic dimensions. The works of those geniuses are the heritage of the human race. They connect our times with the age of Pericles and Cicero and Cæsar, with those golden days when Demosthenes pleaded for the liberty of Greece and Horace prayed to his gods that they might spare his Vergil and bring back to his friendship and love that one-half of his soul. Pagan days, yes. But in God's Providence and decree, the golden days of letters and art.

Will this golden age return? In some measure, yes, if these masters are undisturbed in their rightfully won empire and control over the training of the present generation. But, if we are to be deprived of their leadership, and are only to get at them and their works through the medium of bald and soulless translations, bereft of the beauty of their form and the music of their royal speech; if they are no longer to be our guides in our study of the secrets of the human heart; if by being denied access to them, we are denied contact with that civilization which is the source of so much that is fundamental in modern life, then the outlook is dark and gloomy. But the news that came from the field of the second battle of Princeton, where their cause won and enlisted such well-equipped and gallant champions, makes us hope for better things.

The Great Irish Crisis

SHANE LESLIE

IN the midst of an Irish symposium ably conducted in the columns of AMERICA comes word of an Irish Convention in Dublin's fair city. The Irish in this country do not seem to have realized what a remarkable step towards "what Ireland wants" has been taken. The principles of autonomy, of Ireland for the Irish, of non-interference by English statesmen in Ireland, and of Dublin as a capital are all conceded.

Once a body of representative Irishmen meets in Dublin no power in the world can weaken the moral effect or the practical result. Irish nationality has come out of the catacombs and taken lodgings in Dublin preparatory to reoccupying the noble mansion which was built as the country's symbol.

In my humble opinion a constitutional issue will be evolved and, if ratified by anything approaching a clear majority in session, ought to be indorsed by Irish-Americans whose influence will have helped to bring it about. It would be a pity to condemn the Convention before it begins or ends, because it does not fit into an extreme democratization, which is not even granted in America. America was not allowed a referendum on peace or war. I do not believe it would be any wiser to give Ireland a referendum as to whether she wishes to be a republic or not. The reason in each case must be the same, it would produce political confusion. From a comparative coercion Ireland's best friends do not wish to see her leap into anything approaching the Russian chaos. If every sect and party in Ireland is given due representation a popular vote is not necessary to indorse the findings. At least such is the principle of modern democracy, provided each sect or party is agreed that it is represented.

Such a convention is a great step, greater than the meeting of the Volunteers at Dungannon or the Confederation of Kilkenny, for it is not Protestant like the former or Catholic like the latter. Religious specialization at least has been cleared away.

Neither the Irish Party nor the Sinn Feiners can claim the credit of the Convention or its promise of result. In 1914 John Redmond was within an ace of taking the trick which, in 1916, had a settlement ensued, would have been duly accredited to the Sinn Fein. The present Convention is directly and indirectly due to both, and both must aspire and conspire to its ultimate success. I may add that John Redmond would be the last to attempt to machinate it for the sake of a party whose leadership he has gallantly offered to resign rather than allow any past words of his to be an obstacle to a united Ireland.

Should the Convention decide on a form of republican Government, it would be nothing against the Divine law. It would be binding on both Constitutionalists and on England. I believe it would be a masterstroke on England's part to accept an Irish republic, for the first business of an Irish republic would be to effect a defensive alliance with England against the occupation of Ireland by any foreign foe. A German coaling-station, for instance, would be excluded from Ireland out of friendship for the United States, as well as from the practical consideration that it is not to Ireland's advantage for England to be conquered by Germany. To be frank, it is undeniable that England's losses and difficulties during the war have led her to take a more serious view of Irish claims. But her total defeat would prevent any view being taken at all favorable or unfavorable, for Ireland would be engulfed in her collapse. The reduction of England from the position of "Premier Power" to an equality with France and America in the world's democracy is good for both Ireland and England herself. But a conquest of England or the payment of indemnity to Germany would fall as unpleasantly on Ireland as on the United States. Miserable as it is to think of an English army of occupation in Ireland today, a German army of invasion would be far worse. Nobody has been shot in Ireland for a year; "to give the devil his due."

In his remarkable article replying to mine, Judge Cohalan, whose extreme devotion to Ireland Dublin Castle has certainly tried to justify, gives the impression that his mind tends toward the Apocalyptic view, common to all the Messianic nations, in regard to all Power Imperial. Just as the broken Jews and the persecuted Christians ever harped on the coming overthrow of Babylon and Rome, much of Irish mystico-political writing foreshadows the destruction of England. However, this has been postponed by the action of the United States and it is well to consider the more practical necessities of the situation.

Judge Cohalan recalls the interesting fact that the submarine which has all but imperiled England today, was reduced to a practical form by Holland, an Irishman. Possibly its original aim was that which it has only just, and I think happily, failed to accomplish. It is equally curious that Lord Acton, when occupying as a Catholic the history chair of Cambridge, was once asked to name the moment of England's greatest peril and answered with one of those brilliant impromptus of which his learning was capable: The day that Fulton offered his steamboat to the French Government. It was refused by the latter, but the moral lies in the fact that Fulton's father was born in Kilkenny.

The moral of today is that the submarine jeopardizes Ireland just as much as England. The rightful solution of the Irish problem is as vital to England today as to Ireland. Both are anxious to see Ireland, in the words of the Judge, "freed from the misgovernment of England," while his corollary of "peace for the neighbors of Ireland in Europe" shows a breadth of foresight that we infer would include a peace with a just England.

Neither of these ideas would be excluded from the results of a colonial system! In fact they would both be essential to it. Mrs. Sheehy-Skeffington has answered that "colonial Home Rule" is not what Ireland wants. However, she mentions the name of Gavan Duffy, who though an unsuccessful revolutionist at home, became a wonderfully successful colonial premier in Australia. I have not the slightest doubt he would at any moment have accepted the colonial solution at home.

Irishmen must feel a chivalrous difficulty in crossing pens with Mrs. Skeffington at this moment. It is, therefore, with a profound sense of her tragedy that I offer any comment on her remarks. I distinguish the Balfour régime in the past from the present militaristic condition. My criticism of the Balfourian policy of "killing Home Rule by kindness" is that it recognized the material needs and not the idealistic yearnings of the Irish people, whose national ambitions required other carriage than his famous "light railways." The Irish do prefer freedom and sentiment to bread or butter, as the interest in this idealistic Convention shows.

All that Mrs. Skeffington says is logical and, except in the matter of separation, practical. But I postulate that if Ireland cannot be a nation within the Empire, then the Empire cannot go on being an empire. In fact, it would split into Wilsonian republics. From my present information I believe the British Empire will continue nominally, but practically as a confederation of which Ireland will be one unit. The only excuse for the empires of the future will be that they foster and protect small nationalities. No compulsory system will be tolerated. Therefore, when Mrs. Skeffington writes of Ireland continuing as a pawn, exploited for imperial ambitions, the victim of secret diplomacy, etc., she does not realize that since her trip west the action of Russia and the United States has completely changed the face and future of the world. There will be one ideal of democracy and President Wilson is already its prophet. Peace and war are now in the hands of Russia and of America, as their gigantic resources are alone capable of exerting war power or peace conditions among exhausted combatants.

In the near era there will be no pawns on the chessboard, no Dublin castles, very few kings. No more than Mrs. Skeffington, do we expect the lion to lie down with the lamb, to use her metaphors for England and Ireland, but we think it possible under a colonial system for them to occupy different, though adjoining, paddocks, each with its own tariff lock and employing the same keeper, army and navy, in whatever form future armaments will be permitted to exist.

Ireland will not sell her birthright for colonial Home Rule, says Mrs. Skeffington in a telling phrase. This is idealistic. Ireland is not asked to sell her birthright. It is her deathright, the right that the Sinn Feiners took to die for her, that men of good-will in all parties are now trying to barter—I use the word in its best sense—for a greater measure of autonomy than would have been possible to obtain, had it not been for the events during, and especially subsequent, to Easter Week. We do not want a year of tragedy to go for naught.

It is only due to the Sinn Feiners that those who took the constitutional position should admit the present position. But the Sinn Fein had one great asset on its side from the point of view of moral effect, which wrecked constitutionalism and made "Sinn Fein glorious," Dublin Castle.

As a back number politically and a survivor of a passed generation I have no more to say. The Irish party has done its work, so has the Sinn Fein. Let John McNeill lead the latter into the Convention and help us to extract a parliament. If the Convention demands Canadian Home Rule let it be taken as a settlement during our lifetime. We can only prepare and make the way for an Irish parliament in which we hope the sons of Michael Davitt and John Dillon and Sheehy-Skeffington will sit to guide and rule a united and autonomous Ireland!

Scruples About War

J. Harding Fisher, S.J.

TO what lengths distorted views of right and wrong, gathering momentum from morbid brooding, can lead fanatics, was recently exemplified by a newspaper tale that a young man carried out the resolution announced to his sister in the following letter: "I dread the registration and the draft, and rather than go to war to shoot innocent persons, I prefer a horrible death under a train." The inconsequential character of the conclusion indicates a clumsy forgery or mental derangement; and the concluding words of the farewell message, "I hope all capitalists may go to hell," point rather clearly to a desire to accentuate socialistic principles. However, the story is fit to point a moral. The writer of the aforesaid letter regards war as essentially illicit and taking the life of a fellow-man as under all circumstances morally wrong. It is a curious thing that holding such opinions, he paints his victim a suicide. Moreover, a little knowledge of elementary ethics would have saved him from a further absurdity.

War is not of its nature illicit. Abraham returning from the war he waged against the four kings received high commendation from Melchisedech, the priest of God, who said: "Blessed be Abram by the most high God . . . and blessed be the most high God by whose protection the enemies are in thy hands" (Gen., xiv: 18, 19). When Josue attacked the forces of Amalec, the Lord, at the prayer of Moses, gave victory to the children of Israel (Exodus, xvii). God delivered the King of Bashan with his people and his country into the hand of Moses (Numbers, xxi). An explicit Divine command ordered the chosen people to make war on the Madianites (Numbers, xxiv). Other places also might be cited from the Old Testament as evidence of the fact that God not only approved but actually commanded warfare. It cannot, therefore, be always and under all circumstances wrong.

St. John the Baptist, when consulted by soldiers, did not bid them take off their military belt, as he assuredly would have done had warfare of its nature been evil, but contented himself with laying down rules for the proper conduct of soldiers (Luke, ii: 14). Our Blessed Lord Himself found no fault with the centurion for being a soldier (Matt., viii: 5, sq.). St. Paul praised the heroes of the Old Testament because they "became valiant in battle, put to flight the armies of foreigners" (Hebrews, xi: 34). St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, St. Gregory, and St. Bernard, all Doctors of the Church, when treating of the subject do not find it illicit. Councils of the Church repeatedly declared war against the Turks, and gave their official ecclesiastical sanction to other wars. There are still alive those who remember the last war in which the Papacy was engaged in defense of its rights. And the great philosophers and theologians, with St. Thomas at their head, have one and all taught that given the proper conditions, not merely defensive but offensive war is justified.

The whole world recognizes this principle and has always accepted it, and a large portion of mankind is at present acting on it. The practical unanimity of the men of all ages and all nations is a cogent reason for overruling the opinions of the few individuals who hold the contrary. Aside from the fact that it is worse than foolish for any man to set up his private views against the judgment of mankind in general, it is clear that it is morally impossible for the entire human race to be in error on a matter which concerns in so intimate a way fundamental notions of right and wrong.

The scruples, therefore, of modern fanatics who cry out against war as something essentially and under all circumstances evil and illicit are without foundation. Warfare has the sanction of positive Divine law; it is also approved by the highest ecclesiastical authority on earth. It is, moreover, perfectly in accord with the dictates of the natural law. Nations are like individuals: both have the right of self-defense; both may go to the length of taking the lives of their unjust aggressors when this is necessary, for it is a principle universally admitted that it is lawful to repel unlawful force by force. The State has a right and a duty to protect its own rights and the rights, lives and property of its citizens; and as it has no higher tribunal to appeal to in order to secure justice and to repair grave injuries, and no other means to obtain redress for its wrongs, it may appeal to arms in order to obtain peace, provided it invokes the authorization of its supreme authority, and has a sufficient cause and a right intention.

Reluctance to shed human blood does a man credit; no one who dons a uniform but feels this reluctance; but to let it so overshadow every other consideration as to refuse on account of it to take the only effective means of defending one's country and one's fellow-citizens is a downright perversion of right order. An individual, it is true, may, except in extraordinary circumstances, permit his own life to be taken rather than take another's; but a soldier called to the defense of his country may not licitly do so, for he would thereby jeopardize the lives of others whom he is strictly bound to defend. Charity, which begins at home, demands that we put the safety of those who are linked with us in ties of kinship or nationality before the safety of open enemies; and a man who allows his instinctive horror of shedding human blood so to dominate him as to make him abstain from taking the only effective means of defeating the sworn foes of his country is subordinating right reason to perverse sentimentality. If there is question merely of volunteering, a man will not fail ordinarily in his strict duty, if he does not take up arms; but if his country, giving him no choice, orders him to the front and puts a gun in his hand, he must in conscience shoot straight, with intent to wound, though not with the purpose of killing the foe.

A nation at war is bound to afford its citizens protection of their lives and property, and the only way to do this is by breaking the enemy's fighting strength. To reduce combatants to the state of non-combatants is the prime function of war, and the obvious way of accomplishing this is so to wound them that they will be unable to bear arms. The most merciful war is the one in which this deadly purpose is accomplished with the greatest speed, precision and effectiveness; the nation that does less than this fails in its duty to its citizens, the citizen who does less than this fails in his duty to the State. Any other course is cruelty and cowardice masquerading as kindness.

Nor is the right to inflict wounds on those who are in the armies of the enemy neutralized, or its legitimate exercise restricted, by the plea that one may not "shoot innocent persons." There is a plausibility about this plea, which gives it a show of justice, but is really without foundation. It is a misnomer to call those innocent who are engaged in an unjust war and who are aiming blows, in defiance of right, at the heart of one's own country. Personally they may not be responsible for the initial cause of the war, they may moreover be guiltless of any moral blame in prosecuting it; but they are undoubtedly cooperating in at least a material sense with an act of unjust aggression, they are identified with their country's act, and as a consequence, they can claim no immunity from danger, they must share the common fortunes of war.

Are Maine Yankees Degenerating?

GEORGE F. O'DWYER

THE Rockefeller Foundation, that ever-ready panacea for human ills, imaginary and real, is about to investigate the morals of the State of Maine. Investigators from this national fount of helpfulness are primed to poke their several noses into alleged foul-smelling places of the State and are now awaiting orders to start to the front.

For the news has gone forth to the outside world that "Two per cent of the children attending the public schools throughout the State are feeble-minded to a degree; that the policy of the State in caring for the feeble-minded is indefinite and a cause for criticism; that there is no knowledge of the number of feeble-minded in the State!" All of the foregoing assertions were taken from the Portland Express, a paper which circulates largely in Maine, and they were made, according to the Express, by State Representative Cole before the House of Representatives in session at the State House in Augusta, March 27, last. At this same session, the omnipresent Rockefeller Foundation agreed to help out if a commission was appointed by the Governor. Representative Cole embodied his statements in the form of a resolution "That the Governor, with the consent of the Council appoint three disinterested persons as a commission to investigate thoroughly and to study the condition of the feeble-minded of the State." This resolution was passed to be engrossed under suspension of the rules. Governor Milliken, it is understood, has now in contemplation the appointment of these commissioners and when they are chosen they will work in connection with the Rockefeller investigators. The Foundation, in turn, "has assured the Governor that if a commission is appointed, they will send investigators into the State and will make recommendations for the future."

Here truly is an interesting condition of affairs! Is it possible that Maine, which Americans have always looked up to as the habitat of the sturdy, self-reliant Yankee, which is the birth-place of some of our greatest statesmen and farmers, needs investigation by outsiders, and especially by a social court of last resort like the Rockefeller Foundation? O shades of Veritas, of Tom Reed and Jeremiah O'Brien! Somebody must be wrong!

But let us anticipate the learned investigators of the Rockefeller Foundation a little and look into certain tangible facts. Or, mayhap, the reader has been through some towns and cities of the State lately and has seen things for himself. We shall first consider the State Report of Charities and Corrections for 1916. Take the case of the feeble-minded at the State school in West Pownal, the only one, by the way, in this large State. Here, according to the report, there is a daily average attendance of 264 males and females; the annual per capita cost is $222.99 an inmate, an increase of $44.14 over the previous year. The aggregate expenditure in 1914 for this institution was $87,096.24; in 1915, $126,906.28. The school is now filled to its capacity and, according to the superintendent, there is a waiting list of 150. The school cares for idiotic and feeble-minded males between the ages of six and forty and for females between six and forty-five. The males in this school are in the majority.

Now many authorities say that "eighty per cent of all cases of feeble-mindedness are due to heredity." If this contention is true, then the State of Maine stands convicted, for heredity is the principal cause of feeble-mindedness there; alcoholism being the next contributing cause. But let us consider the State vital-statistics report for 1913, a normal year. We find an alarming condition of affairs here as concerns births, marriages and divorces. During this year, the registrar's office of forty-seven towns showed not one marriage; in eighteen towns, not one birth was recorded! In Aroostook County, where the highest birth-rate was found, the percentage of still-births reached its maximum. Throughout this county, only one town, Houlton, showed by birth and marriage records that the native American woman was fulfilling the primary end of marriage. In the whole State, only thirty-three towns and cities of any size were to be found in which native American women, as a class, proved that they were doing their duty. In two of these, Lewiston and Jay, foreign mothers had a far larger progeny than native mothers. In Ellsworth, Dover, Bangor, Foxcroft, Richmond, Belfast, Rockland, Augusta, Farmington and Gardiner, typical American cities and towns, the birth-rate was lower than the death-rate. The population of the combined thirty-three cities and towns was only thirty-two per cent of the entire population of the State. Maine in 1913 had 15,719 births recorded; 1,534 infants died and there were 689 still-births. In other words, one infant died to every eight infants born that year. During this same year, statistics showed that there was one divorce to every six marriages contracted. The annual average of divorces per 100,000 population in this State is 112, the highest percentage of any State in the Union.

From the following quotation from the Boston Post of March 22 last, the social conditions prevailing at "Sprague City," a settlement near Sanford, may be inferred:

[The county officials] summoned into court four adults with their children. Many more families from the "city" were to be brought into court the next day. "Sprague City" was said in court to be notorious for the deplorable condition of its homes, the poor status of its people, and the general lack of schooling of its children. The people of the settlement, for the most part live in one-room huts, 8x10 feet. The houses rest on the ground. The families sleep on mattresses placed on the floors, have scanty bed-clothing. Attached to most of the huts are sheds that house a horse and cow. In winter the people make hoops and baskets and in summer pick blueberries. Judge John V. Tucker, sitting on the case, decreed that Jesse and Elizabeth Burgin, the children of Frank and Lulu Burgin, of "Sprague City," be given into the custody of the county agent. It was found that the children were ignorant of the alphabet and the names of the days of the week. The other case in court involved George West and Mrs. Matilda Sprague. West testified that Mrs. Sprague is his housekeeper and that she has a husband living. Their three children were given into the care of the county agent. West was charged with a statutory offence. At this point, court was adjourned and bath-tubs brought into the court-room. The children of the above couples were given a thorough bath, dressed in new clothing and taken to the York County Children's Home!

According to the Boston Post, here is another proof of Maine's degeneracy:

Algie B. Whiting, aged forty-eight, and his wife, Lucy, were arrested on the afternoon of May 2 last, in Dover, Maine, charged with the murder of their infant child at their home on a farm on the outskirts of the town, April 4. On the last-named date, Whiting reported to the town authorities that he had found the body of a baby girl on the doorsteps of his home. Autopsy had proved that the child's death was due to exposure, also that the child had lived about three days after its birth. Suspicion was directed at Whiting following his marriage last week to his housekeeper, Lucy Withee.

On May 20 last, Rev. W. A. Bartlett, a Congregationalist minister in Lewiston, Maine, said in a sermon, referring to the new police commission in that city, that "The town, instead of being a center and mecca for drinkers and sellers of rum, may now throw off its shackles. I have been told, on good authority, that the opposition to good government in this town arises from those who wish to break the law, who have no sense of patriotism, but demand the right to drink, to sell rum and to have a condition of prostitution!" This aroused Mayor Charles P. Lemaire, who took the above as a direct slap at him. On May 22, his fiery French-Canadian spirit led him to declare in a public print as follows: "If Dr. Bartlett is not afraid to meet me, man to man, I challenge him to two six-round bouts at City Hall. If he is not afraid to meet me in open argument, I challenge him to a debate in his own pulpit!" Up to the present writing, the Reverend Mr. Bartlett, who has the reputation of being a fearless advocate of temperance, had not replied to the above invitations.

It might be said here that Lewiston is one of the sore spots of the State as regards illicit liquor-selling, and the accompanying condition of prostitution in the city will perhaps give the State and Rockefeller investigators sufficient work for a week at least. Bangor, lying east, and north of Lewiston, has been for the past twenty-five years one of the favorite meccas for female moral lepers, as this town is the main stamping-ground for woodsmen going to and fro, into or out of the big timber woods north. As a result, poisonous drink and immoral men and women have been practically ruining the city. These startling and immoral conditions can be found in a greater or lesser degree throughout the State. Does the reader still doubt? Then let him read this news-item clipped from the Boston Post, for March 23: "South Paris, Maine, March 23.—Albert B. Bean of Waterford, indicted on the charge of murder in causing the death of his eighteen-year-old daughter, Inez, by an illegal operation, was allowed to plead guilty to manslaughter today. He was sentenced to from eight to twenty years in prison."

Reading between the lines of the above startling instances, the reader can probably arrive at a fair opinion as to the moral or immoral conditions of Maine today. There are still many things to be unearthed and the investigators will doubtless pursue their unwelcome task with a due regard for the verities. But the reliance on official statistics, either from town or State authorities, is apt to be misleading. In such an investigation of a whole State, facts are liable to be glossed over, especially if these facts reflect hard on the moral status of the people in the place concerned. According to reports already published, some of the population are already indicted. So the investigators have a very delicate task before them and it is to be hoped that the larger part of the State's population will be adjudged not guilty. The native Maine Yankee and his stock are on trial. We can charitably incline to the hope that his case is not so hopeless as the above facts and figures would lead us to believe.

If the people of Maine are adjudged guilty, then the case lies with the Governor of the State, the legislative bodies and the divorce court judges. Maine, today, should be one of the most populous and thriving States in the Union. It has the most beautiful scenery, the most beautiful lakes and rivers, the most productive land in New England, the deepest harbors for shipping and ship-building, and the most fertile timber lands of any of our States. But in comparison with the people of other successful agricultural States like North Dakota and Oklahoma it is greatly inferior, as regards human productivity. The only hope for Maine, in the humble opinion of the writer, is to open up the deserted farms, lands and islands of the State free, for a period of ten years, to deserving Irish, Scotch, German, Polish and Swedish farmers and their families. There could be a provision that these families must agree to till and cultivate these lands for a period of say, ten years. This is the only hope for the rejuvenation of the State.

Kings and Cloistered Courtesies

H. C. WATTS

THE democratic flavor of that very excellent compendium of breeding and good manners, the "Roman Pontifical," is nowhere more strongly marked than in the section that is devoted to those things pertaining to the solemn reception of secular princes, Christian princes, that is, since the Roman Pontifical is a Christian book. It is a matter for regret that a greater number of enlightened persons do not devote more of their spare time to an earnest study of the Roman Pontifical; it is a matter for regret that more persons do not have at their finger-tips, not only the manner in which a Christian gentleman should comport himself in the presence of a secular prince, but also the manner in which a secular prince should conduct himself when he is in the presence of a plain Christian gentleman.

A case in point that has some bearing on this question occurred recently. His Imperial Majesty the German Emperor, so a dispatch in the Catholic press tells us, a short time ago paid a visit to the Benedictine abbey of Maredsous in Belgium. The visit, so we are assured, was announced to the abbey an hour in advance. But though the imperial guest was treated with all courtesy, he was met with freezing chilliness. On the surface the implication is that the monks of Maredsous forgot, for this occasion at least, that they are Christian gentlemen, and the implication might have been true were it not for one simple fact, the simple fact that there are no monks at Maredsous, for they are in exile at Edermine, near Waterford, in Ireland. So it is possible to understand that the Christian courtesy of the custodians of Maredsous lacked somewhat of warmth when the author of the monks' exile presented himself before the doors of the abbey.

To get the right hold on the situation it is necessary to go back to the days shortly before the war. On Sunday, July 5, 1914, a brilliant company was gathered in the abbey church of Maredsous for the ordination of a monk to the priesthood. It was not just an ordinary function, but an occasion of some little significance. It was, in fact, the ordination to the priesthood of Dom Aelred Carlyle, abbot of the convert monks of Caldey Island, by Monseigneur Heylen, Bishop of Namur. It was an occasion out of the ordinary, and the abbey church was a scene of great splendor. Then a shot was fired in Sarajevo, and afterwards came the fateful month of August, 1914.

Maredsous is situated about half way between Namur and Dinant, a few miles from the right bank of the Meuse, and when the German troops crossed the frontier and poured into Belgium the abbey was one of the first places to fall into their hands. By order of the Commandant at Namur all the German Brothers and almost all the German Fathers were sent away from the abbey, which, by the way, belongs to a Bavarian Congregation. Beds were made ready in the monastery for the wounded, and the monks of Maredsous gave themselves to prayer.

Then Namur fell, and battles were fought all around the abbey, and at one time three separate battles were being fought at the very gates. A fierce bombardment was kept up, and terrified crowds of country-folk fled to the abbey for refuge. At one time there were five hundred persons and the whole community of Maredsous in hiding in the crypt of the abbey church. But at last the abbey fell into the hands of the victorious German troops and their wounded were sent to the abbey to be looked after by the monks. Yet, even so, the monks were left in undisturbed possession of their home until September 12.

On that day a German officer came from Dresden to inquire about some of the wounded troops, and the officer spoke no French. Now the Abbot of Maredsous, the Right Rev. Dom Columba Marmion, O.S.B., is an Irishman; he is also an accomplished French scholar and speaks the language fluently. To the non-French-speaking officer he addressed himself in German, and the officer turned immediately to him and said, very dramatically, "You're English!" The same day the intimation was conveyed to the abbot that his life was in immediate danger. Then began one of the most hazardous journeys ever undertaken by an ecclesiastic.

The cellarer of the monastery was sent to the German military commander at Namur to ask a passport for the abbot, who was preparing to flee to England by way of Holland. The passport was refused. It was Sunday, and after saying Mass, Abbot Marmion left the monastery quietly by auto, for the railway lines had been blown up, and made his way to Namur. He reached the city safely owing to his disguise, one of the most unique that a churchman could possibly think of: the Abbot of Maredsous fled to Namur disguised as a jockey!

It was a journey full of dangers. At every hundred or so yards he was challenged by a German sentry, and when he reached Namur he heard the news that one of his monks, Père Bernard, had been shot by the Germans. He was given no details; Père Bernard had been shot, that is all that was known.

After a great deal of difficulty the pseudo-jockey and a friend obtained a pass to Liège. This time Abbot Marmion changed his disguise and continued his flight as a Dutch professor, making the journey in his friend's car. Something of the courage of heroic Belgium went with the abbot. In his pocket he carried letters from his friends which he had promised to mail for them whenever it was possible to do so: also he carried letters which German soldiers had begged him to mail for them. His friend was a professor at Louvain, who had come to Belgium to investigate some of the cases of atrocities, and with him he had a note-book in which his carefully-gathered evidence was stored.

When the two refugees reached Liège they called at the house of a priest to whom they were both known. Then they applied for a pass to Maastricht, a town on the Dutch frontier, where they knew they would be safe. But they met with disappointment, for the pass to Maastricht was refused, and they were instead given permission to proceed to Aix-la-Chapelle, on the German frontier. The outlook was not cheering; they were merely permitted to leave an invaded country for the country of the enemy. But even that chance was welcome after their recent experiences.

Their troubles were not over, however. They had not gone very far from Liège when they were stopped by a German officer who, seating himself in the car, demanded to see their papers, and indicated by his manner that something was wrong. There was nothing wrong with their papers, but the officer suddenly demanded to know what they had been doing in the house of their friend the curé, and what they had said to him and he to them.

Apparently their explanation did not satisfy the officer and he ordered a thorough examination of the car, their baggage, and their clothes. It was a serious situation, for in his pocket the Abbot of Maredsous had letters from his Belgian friends, letters written in French, and letters written in French were just then contraband, and somewhat damnatory evidence. There was, also, the pocketbook with the carefully collected figures and data regarding the invaders' excursion into Belgium. And the discovery of these articles would have meant the summary execution by shooting of the abbot and his companion.

Abbot Marmion and his companion were certain that their last moment had come, and they were ready to meet death. As the examination proceeded the discovery of the fateful letters and the pocketbook came nearer. So they commended themselves to the mercy of God and waited for the end. Then a sudden inspiration came to the mind of the abbot's companion and he made a last and desperate throw for both their lives. From his pocket he pulled the sheaf of letters written by German soldiers and, brave man that he was, he laughed loud and long. "What further proof of friendliness," he said to the officer, "could you desire than the confidence of your own soldiers, who have trusted me enough to give me their own letters to mail?"

The stratagem was successful and the search was stopped at once, and the two refugees were allowed to proceed on their journey, having escaped from out the very jaws of death. On their way to Aix they came to a place where the road divided; one path led to Maastricht, the town they wished to reach; the other led to Aix, where their passports would take them. They took a sporting chance and led the car for Maastricht, and again placed themselves in the hands of God. It was a dangerous chance to take, for the bridge over the Meuse was guarded by sentries, who would demand their passports. But the Providence that had watched over them so far had not forsaken them. The bridge that led to Dutch territory and to safety was at that moment unguarded. The car was put ahead at top speed and the refugees put all the miles they could between themselves and the frontier. They reached Flushing in safety and crossed to England.

There are, it has been said before, no monks at Maredsous, save a few Brothers who were left in charge of the abbey in the heart of the war-zone of stricken and devastated Belgium. And they may be forgiven if, in circumstances such as those outlined at the beginning of this article, they overlooked some of the finer points of the Roman Pontifical. They may even have had the sense of justice to remember that, after all, the manner in which a secular prince conducts himself in the presence of a simple Christian gentleman has a definite bearing as to the manner in which a Christian gentleman conducts himself in the presence of a secular prince. His Imperial Majesty, the dispatch relates, seemed very depressed, and the dispatch may be believed.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Full National Freedom for Ireland

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Observer of April 15 contains two interesting statements. The first refers to the communication made by the Allied Governments to the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, part of which runs thus: "The Allies see in Russia's decision the triumph of the principles of liberty, which are those of modern States, and are the strength of the nations of the Allies in the struggle which they are carrying on against the Germanic coalition. In addressing to the Provisional Government their hearty congratulations, the Allies desire to declare before public opinion and before the whole Polish people that they feel themselves at one with Russia in the idea of calling Poland once more into being as an integral whole." The second relates the formation at Warsaw of the nucleus of a Polish army. A telegram from the German Emperor "expressed the hope that a Polish army would soon be raised to collaborate energetically for the weal of its Fatherland." A message from the Emperor Charles was also read exhorting the Poles to show themselves worthy of the present decisive times and win new laurels for the glorious Polish eagle. General von Beseler then read an army order saying, among other things: "Polish comrades, I reckon on your obedience and discipline."

Which of these two examples will finally represent the action of England towards Ireland? In one we see the proclamation of faith in the full national freedom of a country as the first security of alliance and friendship. In the other we recognize the imperial claim to raise a force destined for the defense of the Empire by appealing to national aspirations, with a promise of an undefined freedom at some future time. The phrases addressed to the Poles by the two Emperors have a remarkable likeness to those which imperialists have addressed to Ireland concerning the glory of its soldiers and the weal of their Fatherland.

A letter in the Times of April 17 declares that "the Central Powers have not succeeded in raising any new military force in Poland." The army addressed by the General consisted of a Legion recruited for the Austrian army at the beginning of the war, which was brought to Warsaw and given a new name. The Irish, like the Poles, may reasonably prefer the doctrine of the Allies to the policy of the Kaiser. No Englishman can consistently claim a right to blame their decision.

Julianne's Anniversary

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Lest we forget, it is the second anniversary of Julianne's graduation from her fashionable convent school, and nearly a year has elapsed since the writer called attention to the failure, either of Julianne herself, or her teachers, to prepare her to take her place in life as an educated, self-sacrificing, Catholic woman, able and willing to do something "for God, for humanity, for the Church and for self."

When my original onslaught upon the fair Julianne and her cloistered and saintly instructors was published in these columns, the sagacious editors of AMERICA cautioned me to take to a cyclone-cellar without delay. Since then there have been times when I felt the far-reaching vision of the aforesaid editors. Lordly Abbots and Lady Abbesses, as well as lesser luminaries in the ecclesiastical orbit, have called me out of my name more times than I comfortably care to reflect upon. Even now, as I journey back and forth through the country, it is as much as my life is worth to visit certain institutions devoted to the inculation of female piety and learning.

But after all, the game has really been worth the candle, and graduation invitations and prospectuses that are beginning to roll in upon me are encouraging beyond one's fondest dreams. Let me instance one: The Seton Hill Schools, at Greensburg, Pennsylvania, in charge of the Sisters of Charity, have throughout the entire year manifested an extraordinary interest in every form of social service work, both for their undergraduates, and their alumnae. For the coming year they are adding to their regular course a chair of social service work, in charge of a cultured Catholic woman who is familiar with every phase of it, who has had experience in it, and who holds degrees from famous intellectual institutions that guarantee her to be no mere amateur. And the most refreshing part of it all is that these very Seton Hill graduates are the most enthusiastic workers in social service, once they become introduced to its genuine pleasures and its untold possibilities. Mother Seton was a pioneer, and her daughters at Seton Hill, Greensburg, are following closely in her footsteps. Congratulations.

The Break in Christian Civilization

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the issue of AMERICA for April 7 there appeared an article entitled "The Break in Christian Civilization," by Moorhouse I. X. Millar, in which there is the statement: "Archbishop Winchelsey with a Papal Bull in his hand had wrung from Edward I of England the concession that henceforth there was to be 'No taxation without representation.'" I have been unable to locate any account of this fact in the "Catholic Encyclopedia" and I would appreciate your kindness or that of the author in referring me to an authoritative account of the transaction.

Brooklyn. JOHN H. DONLON.

[With regard to Mr. Donlon's request for referrences in confirmation of my statement that "Archbishop Winchelsey with a Papal Bull in his hand had wrung from Edward I of England the concession that henceforth there was to be 'no taxation without representation'" I submit the following from "Essays Introductory to the Study of English Constitutional History," by Resident Members of the University of Oxford, edited by H. O. Wakeman and A. Hassal. The object of the book, as we are told in the preface, is to set forth "the well-ascertained facts connected with the growth of our institutions." The proofs, moreover, were looked over by Dr. Stubbs, the great constitutional historian. As the assumption is still prevalent that constitutional government and modern liberties, despite the Protestantizing autocracy of Tudor and Stuart rulers, owe their origin, in some mysterious way, to Protestantism, I will quote the passage in full with the addition of a few pertinent comments:

> In the great constitutional struggle against Edward I, which resulted in the confirmation of the charters, and the acknowledgment by the king of the principle that taxation without the consent of Parliament was illegal, the Church, under Archbishop Winchelsey, played no small part. It was the opposition of the clergy to the taxation levied by Edward that stirred the opposition of the baronage. It was the combined action of the two estates that forced the king to yield. The motives of the spirituality were, it is true, by no means wholly patriotic. [The writer here is reading history backwards.] By the Bull "Clericis laicos," Boniface VIII had asserted the principles of clerical pretension and caste exclusiveness in their worst forms, by denying the right of the temporal power to tax the clergy at all; [For a correct estimate of this bit of Protestantism cf. Hergenröther, "Church and State," vol. 2, p. 98, English translation, edited 1876.] and the Bishops in supporting him pressed their spiritual allegiance to the Pope further than their duty to their country could possibly warrant. Nevertheless, directly opposition to the royal demands was begun, the clergy found sympathizers with their actions if not with their motives [Cf. "Catholic Encyclopedia," "Clericis laicos" and "England."] from among the baronage, and the question was at once raised to a higher platform, and fought out and decided on the higher ground of constitutional principle, instead of the lower one of clerical privilege. [The writer leaves out of account here the fact that Christendom was then a living reality.] By the institution of Parliament Edward I gave the answer to the great question how it was possible to combine national institutions with monarchical government, and the Church received the reward of her patriotism by the full recognition of the spirituality as an estate of the realm. The power which had taken the lead in the gaining of liberty under John, had done so much to consolidate liberty under Henry III, was under Edward I to form an integral and important part of the institution of Parliament, by which liberty was to be finally guaranteed and developed [Essay VI, "The Influence of the Church on the Development of the State," p. 300].

In conclusion I might add that Lingard deals rather cursorily with this whole question, but, as we learn from his letters, he purposely softened down many points from a fear lest he might antagonize prejudiced minds. (Cf. "Life and Letters of John Lingard," pp. 195-249, by Martin Haile and Edwin Bonney; B. Herder.)]

Cannibalism Among Snakes

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reading Dr. Muttkowski's interesting article on "Maternal Instincts," which appeared in your issue of April 28, my attention was arrested by the following statement: "Cannibalism is widespread in the animal world, and the male, be he mammal, bird, snake, fish or insect, will only too frequently make a luscious meal of his offspring. So the female watches her mate just as diligently as she must watch a foreign foe. Indeed, this probably explains why so many animals will not tolerate their mates after the nuptials."

I do not know whether the inclusion of snakes under this general law is due to Dr. Muttkowski's possession of facts which have hitherto escaped most herpetologists, or whether it is simply an instance of one of those slight errors of hasty inference from which even great scientists are not always free. But, whatever its reason, I must record a modest doubt about the accuracy of the statement as applied to the ophidian order. I cannot find, either in the best authors obtainable or in the range of my own observation, any evidence whatever tending to show that the male snake ever molests either the eggs or the young of the female of his kind, or that the latter ever repels him from her society.

Permit me to adduce a few facts in support of this opinion, gleaned from a rather considerable experience in the capture and observation of living snakes. My experience, it is true, is limited to twenty-one species taken from Baltimore and St. Mary's counties, Maryland; but since this number includes two sub-orders and twelve genera, it may fairly represent the habits of the snake as an order.

First, my records show three instances of female snakes, the common garter snake, hog-nosed snake and milk snake, respectively, kept in captivity together with mates which they had accepted, in two cases subsequent to capture, and in one case previously. None of the females in question ever manifested the slightest hostility towards the male at any time after fecundation.

Secondly, I have reason to believe that the association of the male and the female terminates in the natural course within a couple of weeks after the fecundation of the eggs, even in the absence of hostility on the female's part. In the records of nearly a hundred captures I have only four instances of a pair of snakes being found near together, and all of these are marked by early dates. Two of these relate to oviparous species, namely, a pair of black racers found on May 7, and a pair of hog-nosed snakes on April 23. The eggs of these species would be deposited late in June, and would not hatch before about the middle of August. The other two instances alluded to concern an ovoviviparous species, the common water snake; and the dates on which the pairs were seen were May 4 and May 21. In these two cases the living young would be brought forth in August or early September. In no case, therefore, have I ever observed the male snake in the vicinity of the female within ten weeks before the time for hatching or for bearing the offspring.

Thirdly, the female snake already pregnant may be found alone at a rather early date. From a number of females captured under such circumstances I adduce a few dates of a representative range: common garter snake caught May 7; hognose, May 11; red milk snake, May 28; copperhead, June 20; copper-bellied water snake, July 2; common water snake, July 5; keeled green snake, July 5; worm snake (virginia valeriae), July 8. Of course in these cases, as well as in others not mentioned here, it could not be said with certainty that the male was nowhere in the vicinity of the female; but the fact that his presence was not evident, in contrast with the instances to the contrary already mentioned, makes it at least probable that the couple had parted company before the dates given in each instance. This receives additional confirmation in the light of a fact which I have often observed, that the female snake is usually the more timid and secretive, and therefore less likely to be in evidence than the male.

Fourthly, the food of most species of North American snakes is now well known, and statistics reveal the interesting fact that the greater number of these species are not at all addicted to "cannibalism." Thus, in the twenty-one species which I have had opportunity to observe only eight are certainly consumers of other snakes of any species, and only two others are even doubtfully so.

And, finally, the comparative scarcity of snakes, the small number of the offspring of most species, the multitude of their natural enemies of other orders, and the considerable economic value of about one-third of our known species, all tend to establish an a priori argument to the effect that nature, which "does nothing in vain," and ever tends to preserve the balance of her own marvelous harmony, would scarcely raise up an additional menace to the life of the young snake in the person of its male parent. It is just here that comparison with insect-life, for obvious reasons, must fail.

While, therefore, I am far from contesting the principle which Dr. Muttkowski so well states for the animal kingdom in general, I cannot but think, in the absence of positive evidence, that its application to the serpent order is unfounded.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am glad to see the topic, "Let Them Get Acquainted," come up for discussion. It is a matter in which I have been directly interested, and I hope it will be threshed out fully in the pages of AMERICA. The subject is a vital one, but its significance is much broader than indicated by Mr. Spearman in the original article in the Ave Maria and in your editorial comments, for the problem of getting acquainted exists not only in the colleges but also at home in the parishes.

Many priests seem content with helping their parishioners to become good individual Catholics, while as a matter of fact, this task is only the beginning of their obligations. In the parish the family is the unit, and all problems center around it. If the family continues, the parish continues, and it is the priest's business to see that it continues, as a Catholic family. The pastor should encourage the young's companionship, courtship and eventual marriage; if he does so, he will not have to complain of "old maids, of mixed marriages, and of stagnation." Let us come to the root of the trouble and face conditions as they are. Fact one: there are altogether too many unmarried women in many parishes; fact two: young men marry out of the parish; fact three: there is an astonishing number of mixed marriages; and fact four: some parishes are dying out or becoming stagnant. In one parish I have in mind in a northern city the conditions just outlined are a byword. "More devotions, more old maids, and more mixed marriages than any other parish in the city," they say of this parish, and the situation is approaching a scandal. Yet the pastor maintains a rigid attitude and will not countenance a healthy association of the young folk.

Several years ago in a discussion of the social evil with a number of physicians a prominent surgeon remarked: "Children go wrong because their parents and priests are short-sighted. Ministers of religion can write clever sermons advising people to be good, but when it comes to the practical problems of living and loving they are rigorous incompetents and do untold damage by their unbending views. Youth must play, has a right to play. And the tendency is that if youth cannot play licitly, it will seek illicit diversion. There is the solution: watch the play of the children, and provide opportunity for play. Given decent play, decent courtship and marriage will follow. All fulminations anent the social evil are unavailing, if preventive work does not supplement the corrective work. Fewer sermons explaining goodness, more practical work making it possible, that is what we need." These words apply to the problem of the parish. The criticism is severe, and to be fair I must say that priests are not always aware of the complaints. Why not? The ordinary man, thank God, has such reverence for the priesthood that he dares not object, or even insinuate that his priest may be wrong. But the failure to realize the trouble on the part of priests perpetuates it and does not remedy it. And a remedy is what we want.

You have offered the solution, "Let Them Get Acquainted." But to be effective, acquaintance should be based on mutual respect. And right here we touch a central difficulty. For in our Catholic colleges, one and all, and also in our parochial schools our boys and girls are not taught effectively respect and appreciation for young people of the other sex. The impression is fostered that girls are silly, weak, illogical. Conversely, as a convent girl put it, "We understood perfectly well that a male is something awful, with horns." As for association of boys with girls, Heaven forfend! Girls are good enough to amuse, they may be flattered, petted, tolerated, they may do for a momentary diversion, but they should certainly not be considered competent when it came to serious matters! Yet the same colleges and schools teach veneration for motherhood; they extol the influence, understanding, love, and virtue of the mother. Why then the disparagement of those future mothers, girls in their teens? And pray, whence the miraculous change from the "silly fool of a girl" into a "maternal fount of wisdom and virtue?" Ridicule for the girl, reverence for the mother—is this temporal distinction valid and logical? Yet this decidedly illogical attitude is deliberately fostered by our Catholic institutions. We would set an example to non-Catholics and we permit our own to drift away. We would convert the heathen, whereas conversion is imperative in our very midst. Strike at the core if you would remove the sore. By all means "Let Them Get Acquainted," but let this acquaintance be grounded on mutual respect, otherwise the results will be subversive of our aim.

As an example of what can be done let me refer to the work at the University of Wisconsin. Rev. H. C. Hengell, chaplain of St. Paul's University Chapel, does everything possible to promote the acquaintance of Catholic students. With his aid the Catholic Students' Association arranges semi-monthly Sunday evening socials, besides picnics, lectures, dances, and other recreations at which the students may become acquainted. Father Hengell very sensibly insists that the students attend. "Come to the socials. Meet the boys, meet the girls," he says. In fact he goes further and in humorous words, but with serious intent, he exhorts: "Attend and enjoy yourselves. Boys and Girls, come and meet each other. Let the girls select the boys they like, let the boys select the girls they like. Get acquainted, and then engaged, and do not wait too long to get married. I guarantee satisfaction, for I know of no finer lot of men and women than our Catholic students. Come, make your choice, and be satisfied!"

This is direct, but it is efficient. For an attendance of fifty is regarded as a minimal crowd, and 150 to 200 approximates nearly the usual number present at the socials. Incidentally the number of engagements of Catholic students thus initiated is inspiring. Friends too are made for Catholicism, for students of other creeds come frequently, and the number of converts is on the increase.

No doubt, chaplains at other State universities pursue a similar course with like results, but who will move our pastors to action? Devotions are excellent, but they are not all. The ladies remain unmarried, the men continue to seek wives among Protestants, and the parish goes to pieces slowly but surely.

Columbia, Mo. R. A. MUTTKOWSKI.

The Heart of the Country

THERE were some who doubted, and others, but only a few, thank God, who gloated. The day of registration, they said, with disloyal exultation, would show what the country thinks of this war. Unacquainted with the spirit of democracy, which moves slowly but surely in the ways of justice, the gloaters thought that ranks of peaceful citizens could be transformed into efficient battalions of war, only by the scourge and the mailed fist of despotism. Today there are no doubters, and the gloaters stand convicted of accuracy in their contention, that the fifth day of June would manifest the country's attitude towards the war. It has done this unmistakably; it has proved that the American people, fully realizing the tremendous responsibilities entailed, are one with the Government in its solemn determination to push the conflict for liberty to a victorious close. "These solid lines of young men going to the places of registration throughout the country," said President Wilson in his address to the Confederate veterans, " shall be a signal to the world that all of America's manhood will serve, and that he who challenges the integrity of the United States, challenges their united strength."

There comes a time when it is good for a nation to realize that she must sacrifice. We have prospered and accumulated great wealth. We have come to war. We lay all of our wealth and spend our blood to show that it has been accumulated for the service of mankind. These too are the days of rejoicing, because we see at last why this great nation was kept undivided, and we see the purpose that we were meant to serve. We are to be an instrument in the hands of God to see that Liberty is made secure for all mankind.

Under the inspiration of these noble ideals, the American people have aligned themselves with the President. Authority has spoken, and the American people, forgetting the wild cries of disorderly elements too long tolerated, have returned to their pristine spirit of willing obedience to rightful authority. "We will give all that we have to the Government," wrote the Reverend F. X. McMenamy, S.J., in offering the hospital and the extensive laboratory facilities of Creighton University to Washington. That sentiment today expresses the heart of the country.

The Fall of "Free Speech"

A BAND of men and women in New York, with base imitators throughout the country, are considerably puzzled at the turn of events since the outbreak of the war. There is indeed reason for the bewilderment. Before the war, a soap-box orator might go to almost any length of intemperance, and, in the language of the police, "get away with it." Today he is hardly allowed to begin. To appear in Union Square with a soap-box and the air of one having a "message" is as safe as it would be to enter those sacred precincts attired in the uniform of the Kaiser's favorite bodyguard. The soap-box person is an alien, a suspect, a joy to the secret service and a prey for all minions of the law. Under this intensive espionage, he is rapidly taking his place with the four-toed horse and the dodo.

Few will regret his passing. Many will wonder why he was not long ago suppressed. To allow an irresponsible crank with a ready flow of language, to advise a crowd of oppressed workers to "blow up the L," or to flout the conscription law is really not conducive either to the establishment of social justice, or to the general welfare of the community. The bitter attacks on the American Government, protected by a short-sighted, criminal tolerance during the last few years, are beginning to bear their natural fruit—treason. Perhaps the exigencies of war may teach us, among other things, that free speech, a precious right in a republic, was never intended to serve as a stimulus to disorder or as a shield for lawbreakers. The lesson may cost much, but it will be worth the price we pay.

It would seem that we are beginning to learn. Only a few months ago, even the most disgraceful of these violations of public decorum, were reported by various New York journals of lofty pretensions but small intelligence, as evidence of "the awakening of a higher social consciousness." Today these journals jeer at what they once encouraged, while the formerly quiescent police have adopted a new policy. The "uplifter" is no longer allowed to insult the courts, to defy the public authority, and thereafter be dismissed with a fine, paid at once by some crack-brained admirer. In place of these theatricals, the "uplifter," of whatever degree, is quietly interned in a deep, dark cell, where he will be allowed ample time to reflect on the maxim, that once set in motion, the mills of the law may grind exceeding fine.

The new plan is achieving admirable results. It is a further point of interest to note the identification of a certain aggressive group of birth-controllers with the opponents of the Government's war policy. But today, in the presence of the police, accompanied by stenographers in sufficient number, the once blatant Emma Goldmann-Alexander Berkmann-Abraham Shiplacoff combination is reduced to unbroken silence. In one respect, however, the combination remains unchanged. Even though the meeting has been as placid as a Quaker conventicle, the "uplifters" invariably conclude by taking up a collection.

Coming "To Their Own Again"

DR. ARTHUR ANDERSON MARTIN, a Protestant physician from New Zealand who joined the first British Expeditionary Force, tells in his interesting war-book, entitled "A Surgeon in Khaki," how the Sisters of France have "come to their own again," and pays the following enthusiastic tribute to their efficiency and devotion:

> The nuns at this hospital [Bethune] were simply splendid all through, and I can quite understand how the religious Sisters have come to their own again in France. From the earliest times and up till about eight years ago all the nursing in the French hospitals was done by Sisters belonging to the various Religious Orders. Then came one of the big political upheavals for which France has been so noted in the past, and the nursing Sisters gradually disappeared from the hospitals, owing to the hostility of the State to the Church and all connected with it. The nursing Sisters of these Orders were at the time of this change well-trained medical and surgical nurses. As they were no longer able to exercise their professional skill, and no more of the younger nuns were trained in nursing, it followed that on the outbreak of war only the older nuns were capable of undertaking skilled nursing in the many hospitals. The demand for nurses was a clamant one, for from the very beginning of the war there were large casualties. It was said that the nursing by the lay sisters who succeeded the religious Sisters was not of such a high order as in the old days owing to the absence of the strict and rigid discipline, the very fiber of the life of a Sister in religion. I have heard this both from French surgeons and from visiting British surgeons. . . . It was at this critical phase that the Franciscan Sisters, and the Sisters of other Religious Orders, quietly took their places beside the wounded French soldiers. Just as quietly they opened up their convents, churches, and buildings, warehouses, chateaux, cottages, railway waiting-rooms, and turned them into hospitals for the wounded and sick men. Working tirelessly night and day, knowing no fatigue and shrinking from no task or danger, and glorying in their mission, they performed marvels. The younger Sisters were put to subordinate nursing duties, and so rigorously trained by the elder ones in the principles of nursing. . . . I do not think that any future government of France will ever dare to oust the religious Sisters from the hospitals. These quiet-voiced, simple-robed women, carrying help and compassionate pity in the welter of blood and slaughter, have come "to their own" again.

The "lay sisters" Dr. Martin speaks of were the secular nurses, it should be explained, who took the place of the banished religious, but whose professional skill was not found to be of such a "high order" as was that of the Sisters they supplanted. To the thoughtful Catholic, however, there is nothing particularly remarkable in the spectacle that so impressed the "Surgeon in Khaki." For those noble French Sisters are simply doing now what the Church has been doing all through her history. The gift of irresistible energy and resourcefulness is hers, and nothing can keep her from exercising the Divine mission of teaching, healing and reconciling. If the Church's enemies refuse to let her undertake this work or that, she will meekly turn to another. If she is driven out of a country, she stands just beyond the frontier, and seizes the first opportunity to return and minister to the dire needs of those who banished her. If the Church is not allowed to teach, she will nurse the sick. If she is not permitted to preach to Catholics, she goes forth to evangelize the heathen. The Catholic Church is the only institution in the world that can always afford to bide her time and be patient, for against her, according to the Divine promise, the gates of hell shall not prevail. Not only in France but everywhere else as well, the Church will "come into her own" at last.

The Myth of the Free Press

AN alleged company for the manufacture of automobiles has finally been caught in the toils of the law. The crew of financial pirates in charge of this rakish craft will soon, it is hoped, exchange their quarters for the quiet precincts of some Federal penitentiary. But the real promoters will go scot free. In fact, they will profit by their connection with these freebooters. They are the newspapers which, for a share of the booty, gladly opened their pages to advertise what they must have known to be a plain swindle. In other words, these "guardians of public morality" deliberately formed a partnership with a company of thieves.

The terms may seem harsh, but they are literally true. Without the aid of the newspaper, the financial pirate might unfurl a flag, but he could hardly scuttle a ship. The newspaper is his indispensable ally. It gives an air of respectability to schemes which are lower than highway robbery or housebreaking. It trades on the propensity of thousands to take as true whatever they see in print. It reduces to a system the playful, if inelegant, dictum of Barnum that "A sucker is born every minute," by teaching the thief how he can take advantage of the victim, and find temporary refuge in the dubious respectability of its columns. The editorial page of such publications frequently outdoes the best efforts of the lamented Pecksniff in unctuous piety, but the advertising department is conducted by hypocrites of another variety. These gentry are pastmasters in the art of gracefully inverting a reader for the purpose of emptying his pockets, and in the allied art of first applying a blackjack in case of objection.

Today there are few things, it would seem, that dozens of newspapers, commonly accepted as reputable, will not do for money. In New York the courts have recently sustained the Commissioner of Licenses in his ruling against a malodorous film. It has been instructive to note how the various city and dramatic editors rushed to the defense of the offending film company: a complete course in "How to Conduct a Modern Newspaper" could be had by observing that the heartiness of the attack was in direct proportion to the amount of advertising placed by the film manufacturers. Reedy was right. We have no free press in this country, but we have something that the newspapers like better. It is the myth of the free press. A myth imposes no obligations, and may confer a certain distinction. As long as the receipts in the advertising department are untouched, the press will continue to cherish the myth.

The Banning of Starch

NONE of the decrees issued by the British Food Controller is likely to have more revolutionary effects than his edict forbidding the manufacture from cereals of starch for laundry work. For today are not the usages and customs of polite society based to a large extent on starch? But if the stiff dress-collar, with all its adjuncts, modifiers, concomitants and consequences must go, the changes that may ensue in the field of ethics, economics and literature are sure to be called "epoch-making" indeed. For now that the starching of collars, cuffs and shirts has been declared a felony, tall hats and long coats will doubtless "go out," too, and what is "fashionable" in gentlemen's neckwear and jewelry will be radically altered. After the disappearance of the comfortless collar, the cuirass-like shirt and the sheathing cuff, softer fabrics and brighter hues may come into vogue and men will be as gaily clad as when knighthood was in flower.

The revolution in dress may be accompanied by as radical a change in manners. Whatever laws of etiquette have starch as their foundation may grow obsolete, social intercourse will perhaps be marked by more simplicity and less pretense than now, and conversation, being freed from that stiffness and formality which the highly starched are prone to affect, will be easier and pleasanter.

With the passing of starch from dress, perhaps no further traces of it will be found in our literature, either. An artificial, bookish and pedantic style of writing will be as unpopular as stiff cuffs, readers will insist that the characters in their novels must behave like human beings and talk as naturally. Just what sort of verse the starchless poet of tomorrow will write, no one can predict, though it cannot well be freer than that we have today. Be that as it may, let us hope that the edict which banishes starch from the laundry to the kitchen, or from clothes to character, so to speak, will result in a thorough stiffening of the moral fiber, of the courage and endurance of all, both in this country and in Europe, who are fighting to make the world "safe for democracy."

The Film Fraud

LAST year a young woman, about to appear in the films, adopted the not unusual expedient of employing a press-agent. The lady claimed to be a Catholic and spoke with soulful emotion of her hallowed days at the convent school. These two items were sufficient. Lighting another cigar, the press-agent penned an idyllic story of life in a convent and of the young lady's part in it. Her whole purpose in life, he represented the actress as saying between her sobs, drew its inspiration from cloistered shades. Never had she forgotten the lessons of those early days. Her ambition was not to make money, far from it, nor even to further the cause of art. She would be happy could she only know that, in her humble way, her efforts would bring before the world the sweet and ennobling message of the Catholic Church. Only when all this "stuff" was mimeographed and sent to a number of clergymen, did the press-agent push his hat back on his head and sigh a deep sigh of contentment over work well done.

At the latest accounts, this soulful young woman was sharing with the world the sweet and ennobling message of the Catholic Church by appearing in films which invariably engage the attention of the police and others interested in the suppression of vice.

The lesson is fairly clear. The individual, whether actress or politician, who uses religion as an advertisement is a plain fraud. As a corollary, it may be added that the Catholic school would do well to return a negative to its children who ask the benediction of their Alma Mater upon their histrionic efforts, and to invoke the law when this benediction is assumed, ungiven. Mary Andersons are few today.

The New Prison Reform

A HARD head and a soft heart make an excellent combination. But when the first ingredient is also soft, look out for disaster. Especially, if you are an "uplifter," or a prison reformer.

No one seems to know the precise cause, or causes, of the recent riot at the Joliet penitentiary. Joliet was "a model institution." It had an honor farm, and, within walls, a well-developed honor system. It has also had a rebellion. The results, half a dozen dead and wounded guards and convicts, are plain enough for even a reformer to see.

Sing Sing and Joliet are not strong arguments for the new penology. The extent of maudlin sentimentality at Joliet is clear from letters regularly written to the convicts by a band of women styling themselves "The Oriental Esoteric League." Some of these foolish women have learned what blackmail is. Others, possibly, may soon be subjected to the inquisition of the Federal mail authorities.

Modesty may be only a taboo, but it is something that even prison reformers may well retain.

Literature

THE ONE INGREDIENT: THE STORY

JAMES B. CONNOLLY

TO begin with Homer: Homer's books are made up of stories: of the siege of Troy in one volume, of the wanderings of Ulysses in another. Blind Homer, with his dog on the end of a string, had every night of his life to beguile his bed and board from some innkeeper. Others were also tramping the dusty highways, and most of them with the same beguiling lever—the legends of the gods and near-gods; but Homer must have had a touch the others lacked, else seven cities later would not have been claiming him for their own.

Homer rolled out his hexameters to little groups in small villages; doubtless he strummed his lyre to the more impassioned periods. But as an increasing population developed larger communities, as larger bodies of people required entertainment, the wandering bards passed out of fashion; perhaps their ancient gift was lost. At any rate, the theater came into vogue. Once settled into their seats at a theater, people like to stay awhile; they have spent time and energy in getting there; they do not feel like hurrying away, and so the playwriters had to take Homer's or somebody's tale, pad the dialogue, give the actors a chance to strut, the chorus time to wail, and there you were—an afternoon gone. But always the story.

In Elizabethan days the lamenting choruses were long gone out of fashion, but people still liked to have things explained. They have seen and heard, and they understand, but they wish to be assured in set terms. So the Elizabethan playwrights gave them rounded periods of exposition, sonorous periods wherewith the human voice might have play. But in giving them the periods they never forgot the story, taking it from Bandello or Boccaccio or wherever else they happened to find it. When Shakespeare threw his stories into play-form and swelled them out with large words, it was because he, like the others around him, was accepting conditions as he found them.

In speaking of Shakespeare we sometimes forget that he was the best story-teller of his day. It is always the story; and above all, the story of action. Action, action, always action. Shakespeare gave his audiences the rounded periods, but also he gave them action. In his 'prentice days he stuffed his plays with blood and thunder—the dawning story-teller's notion of action, which, his instinct told him, was the thing needed. When he had learned restraint and become the master-craftsman of his day, he still gave them action, but action that satisfied high intelligence.

And Homer the same. Homer never let his weary wanderer rest; poor Ulysses was forever ending one thing only to begin another, and Vergil imitated Homer. But take it long before Homer. The collections from Oriental days, the Arabian Nights, the Books of Buddha, are jammed with stories of people doing things. The Old Testament is replete with great stories of action. The New Testament is gemmed with stories; i.e., the parables of Christ. Dante planted moving stories all through the Divine Comedy. The best-read history of all times is probably Plutarch's Lives; and Plutarch's was the method of the born story-teller: salient characterization, compact description, swift narration, dialogue which revealed character.

When a widely read Frenchman wrote his best-known novel he did what Homer did in the Odyssey: he wrote a series of action-stories and glued them together with whatever compound would serve the purpose. When an Englishman wrote his chief novel he did what Homer and all the masters had done before him: he wrote a series of stories against an interesting background and charged them all to one character, his hero.

The laborious etching of infinite detail, the stipple work of the minute reporter, the painful studies of the morbid—that never lives past the generation of its birth. The sweep of big people with big ways is what lasts. Of camp or court or busy mart, of wide plains or rolling seas or wind-swept hills, of little towns or crowded alleys they may be; and what people you please—kings or paupers; but always they must have the sweeping stroke of men who not only think, but do.

Old Homer's villages could not read, nor before him could the campers around the desert fires; and so the telling of the story by word of mouth. Shakespeare's audiences could rarely read, and so the telling of the story by word of mouth and action of body. Homer talked to scores at a time; Shakespeare to hundreds. The story-teller of today, through the medium of print, may have his hundreds of thousands for a single recital.

The indispensable ingredient seems to be the story. And the man who held the attention of the desert tribes in ancient days is the same man the magazine editors are combing the country for with a fine-tooth comb today. The story is what the people want to hear—the lisping child pleads for it, the matured mind looks for it. The story is what the ages have always wanted. And, judging by the records, it is the short story; at least, the stories which have survived the ages are all short stories.

BOOK REVIEWS

A Surgeon in Khaki. By ARTHUR ANDERSON MARTIN, M.D., Ch.B., F.R.C.S. ED. Popular Edition. With Illustrations. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.00.

Maple Leaves in Flanders Fields. By HERBERT RAE. With an Introduction by Admiral Sir ALBERT MARKHAM, K.C.B. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.75.

The Land of Deepening Shadow. Germany at War. By D. THOMAS CURTIN. New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.50.

The first of these war-books is an account of a New Zealand doctor's experiences and impressions while serving at the front two years ago. His sharp criticism of the lack of organization that characterized the British Red Cross department in those days should be of service to us now, and his description of a surgeon's duties and adventures is very interesting. "I have not met any one yet who liked the war, except artillery officers," he writes, for they now have countless opportunities, it seems, to bring real artistry to the practice of their profession. He calls Mgr. Bickerstaffe Drew "the bravest of the brave," and is enthusiastic in his admiration for "the Church that can produce such a man as Monsignor." The author bears the following testimony to the revival of religion in France:

> One has only to be a little time with the French troops in the field to recognize and be impressed by their deep attachment to the Catholic Church. I visited many churches in France and Belgium during the earlier stages of the war, and at all hours, and have always found, sometimes few, sometimes many, Belgian and French soldiers on their knees and devoutly at prayer in the sacred buildings. Women, of course, were always to be seen there, but that was not surprising. It was surprising to see so many soldiers. The French soldier takes his religion seriously in these days, and is not ashamed, whenever the opportunity occurs, to enter a church and pray.

"Herbert Rae" is the pen-name of a soldier in the "Pompadours," one of the first Canadian regiments to reach the front. In a light-hearted, "American" way he describes the organization of the contingent at Valcartier, its training on Salisbury Plain and its service in Flanders, where three-fourths of the Pompadours' officers and more than half their men were among the wounded, slain or missing. The author's experience is that "Shrines and crucifixes don't get hit."

Mr. Curtin is a young war-correspondent from this country who entered Germany soon after the present conflict began, and seems to have made good use of his eyes and his head. He sets down in a straightforward way his impressions and conclusions, refuses to believe everything he was asked to believe, and relates his experiences convincingly. The author gives examples of the songs of hate the children sing, and the sermons of hate the ministers preach, has an especially interesting chapter on the perfection of the German spy-system, tells how the "League of Truth" regards America, and gives some important facts about "Germany's Human Resources." Mr. Curtin concludes that a country "where force and only force is held to be the determinant internationally of mine and thine" is a perilous neighbor. W. D.

A Memorial of Andrew J. Shipman: His Life and Writings. Edited by CONDÉ B. PALLEN, Ph.D., LL.D. New York: The Encyclopedia Press. $2.00.

"This volume," says its foreword, "is for a testimonial of the high esteem and admiration in which the late Andrew J. Shipman was held by his friends. . . . It is also, in a measure, the perpetuation of some of his many achievements in numerous fields of activity, as well as an inadequate though affectionate tribute to his virtues as a citizen and a churchman." In the comparatively brief biography the memorial gives of this able lawyer, publicist, philanthropist and writer, and in the selection of thirty-two of his articles and speeches, this intention is concisely, tactfully and conclusively carried out. The readers of AMERICA were frequently instructed and entertained by his contributions on current topics, always authoritative and convincing. Some of them have been included in this collection, which, it is truly claimed, illustrates the depth of his learning, the breadth of his life-work and the clarity of his judgment in working out the details of his many activities. What he did to fix the status of the Catholics of the Eastern Rite in the United States alone would be a monument for any ordinary man, but it was only one of the numerous accomplishments that hard-working, conscientious and thorough effort placed to his credit. Those whose good fortune it was to be brought under the immediate charm of his personality, remembering now a character so faithful and modest, and so considerate and helpful, must lament how heavy a loss his all too early death has been to that lay apostolate so greatly needed in these times. The volume in which Dr. Pallen has gathered the proofs of Mr. Shipman's remarkable mental equipment and indefatigable industry should be an inspiration to many other Catholic laymen. T. F. M.

Social Diagnosis. By MARY E. RICHMOND. New York: The Russell Sage Foundation. $2.00.

An Introduction to Social Psychology. By CHARLES A. ELLWOOD, Ph. D. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.00.

"Social Diagnosis" is another evidence of the trend towards the study of the individual, which is accomplishing valuable results in pedagogy and sociology. In practical social work as in the classroom, there is always a tendency to shirk the unpleasant task of examining minute details and adjusting differences, and to substitute for this intensive work, the easy-going methods which "lean too heavily on rules and formulae." Both rules and formulae may be quite correct, and both, in a given instance, thoroughly out of place. Their proper use depends altogether on the condition of the patient; and no diagnosis is anything but dangerous, if it is not the outcome of an intelligent study of the individual. "No matter how mean or hideous a man's life is," writes Cooley, quoted by Miss Richmond, "the first thing is to understand him; to make out just how it is that our common human nature has come to work out this way." Miss Richmond's main object, it may be said, is to drive home this fundamental lesson. She does not omit careful instruction in methodology, but she knows well that plans, tables, and statistics are merely helps to the investigator, in his work of reconstructing "the broken career." Possibly the part of religion in this reconstruction is somewhat underestimated; on the whole, however, Miss Richmond's book is a contribution of real value to the literature of social work.

The same favorable judgment cannot be passed on Dr. Ellwood's study, based on the assumption that "It is impossible to regard human society as anything more than a development of animal association, just as it is impossible to regard man as anything else than a highly developed animal." This view of man is further stressed in the negative answer to the question: "Is cultural evolution due to the working of an absolutely new factor which we do not find in the animal world below man?" Proceeding from an assumption incapable of proof, it is not strange that Dr. Ellwood soon loses himself in a maze of metaphysical speculations. Insisting eloquently on society's need of religion, it is interesting to note that by "religion" he understands "a religion of humanity, which will make the service of man the highest expression of religion." The contrast between this new concept of religion, and religion which finds its highest expression in the service of God, could not be expressed more strongly. P. L. B.

Hallow-e'en and Poems of the War. By W. M. LETTS. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.25.

Poems and Parodies. By THOMAS KETTLE. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.00.

A Celtic war-note is dominant in these two volumes of verse. W. M. Letts' stanzas on "The Spires of Oxford," quoted in our columns on its first appearance, is one of the best poems the present conflict has inspired. Somewhat similar in theme are the musical lines entitled "July, 1916," which end thus:

Here in happy England, the summer pours his treasure
Of grasses, of flowers before our heedless feet.
The swallow-haunted streams meander at their pleasure
Through loosestrife and rushes and plumèd meadow-sweet.
Yet how shall we forget them, the young men, the splendid,
Who left this golden heritage, who put the summer by,
Who kept for us our England inviolate, defended,
But by their passing made us December of July?

"Ad Mortuum" is the general title of a tender sonnet-sequence, "Rosa Mystica" and "Our Lady of the Lupins" are this High Anglican's tributes to the Blessed Virgin, the praises of "Tim," an Irish terrier, are pathetically sung in two poems, and here is "The Wish" of an Irish sweetheart:

O man of my heart, I have asked this of God,
A little white house that faces the sun
And yourself to be coming in from the fields
When the day's work is done.

I have told it to God, the wish of my soul,
The little white house at the butt of the hill.
With a handful of land and some grass where the goat
Could be eating her fill.

White walls and nasturtiums, the yellow and red
Climbing upwards to cling to the straw of the thatch,
And a speckledy hen with a dozen fine eggs
That she's wishful to hatch.

The two of us there by the side of the hearth
And the dark lonely night creeping up to the door,
Your smile and your handclasp, oh! man of my heart,
I am asking no more.

Personal, Early Poems, Translations, Miscellaneous, Political, and War Poems are the captions under which are arranged the twenty-eight "Poems and Parodies" left by Thomas Kettle, the Irish leader who was slain in France last fall. The best of the "Poems" is his widely-quoted sonnet "To My Daughter Betty," and the following lines, "After Mr. Kipling," are from the author's best parody:

Yes! Sneerin' round at Irishmen, and Irish speech and ways
Is cheaper—much—than snatchin' guns from battle's red amaze:
And when the damned Death's-Head-Dragoons roll up the ruddy tide
The Times won't spare a Smith to tell how Dan O'Connell died.
For it's Paddy this, and Paddy that, and "The Fifth'll prate and prance!"
But it's "Corks and Inniskillings—Front!" when Hell is loose in France,
When Clare and Kerry take the call that crowns and shrapnel dance,
O' 'tis "Find the Dublin Fusiliers!" when Hell is loose in France.

Recollections of a Rebel Reefer. By JAMES MORRIS MORGAN. With Illustrations. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co $3.00.

Mr. Morgan has led a stirring and eventful life, which is reproduced with picturesque detail and all the charm of a breezy and unconventional style in the 480 pages of this autobiography. The author has seen life from many angles and under many skies. An officer in the Confederate navy on his resignation from the U. S. Naval Academy at Annapolis at the beginning of the Civil War, blockade-runner, river fighter on the Mississippi, lieutenant-colonel in the Khedive's army in Egypt, U. S. Consul-General at Melbourne: such have been some of the offices and duties which fell to his lot. In all of them he seems to have been keenly interested. He always writes with evident sincerity and without parade or self-consciousness and everywhere shows himself a true and gallant son of the old South for whose cause he fought when little more than a mere boy.

Mr. Morgan brings the reader to sea with him in the old Confederate sloops and cruisers, and we meet Warley and Semmes. He paints in dark colors the trials of the South in the troublous times of Reconstruction. The book has not the fine literary flavor of Dana's "Two Years Before the Mast," but the style has the smack of the sea in it now and then, yet makes no pretense to distinction or elegance of form. It runs smoothly and just a little saucily, like the Alabama scudding before the wind. The author's picturesque and energetic phrases remind one of the yarns which were "swapped" on deck between watches by the gallant tars of the Confederate ships. We are quite sure that boys and all those who love a story of adventure and daring, and like to get a glimpse into strange countries and meet the figures of the past, will be delighted by the life-story of this gallant and talkative but always interesting "Rebel Reefer." Standards. By W. C. BROWNELL. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.00.

Mr. Brownell is happily conservative in his estimate of life, art and letters. He believes in standards that have been established not by mere feeling, fashion or caprice, but rather in standards that have been formed gradually and normally by the broad, intellectual experience of those who have learned best what a standard should be. Neither life, nor art, nor letters can be given any adequate evaluation by standards that are set up and knocked down easily. Life, art and letters must receive individual interpretation, it is true, but when the objective purpose of things is destroyed on the hearthstone of pure subjectivity, there results only a perversion which can be neither worthily defended nor rationally excused.

It is too bad that Mr. Brownell does not develop his theme with greater clearness. First, he does not start us with a good understanding of what a standard is. For a standard is a chosen exemplar supreme in its order. According as other objects or acts in the same order conform to the exemplar, they take on their degree of excellence. Now, obviously one should not expect these essays to be written after the manner of philosophical treatises. None the less, every serious essay should have its theme clearly stated, and developed with due logic and precision. This the author fails to do. Furthermore the style is unhappy. The author shows, at times, that he can write clearly; but he so often uses involved and disjointed sentences, that there is little pleasure in following his mazes, and less satisfaction. Sentences are the light, so to speak, that guide one to the idea. If the light be dim and uncertain, one goes with difficulty and easily loses one's direction. F. J. McN.

The Former Philippines Through Foreign Eyes. By AUSTIN CRAIG. $2.50; Philippine Progress Prior to 1898. By CONRADO BENITEZ and AUSTIN CRAIG. Manila: Philippine Education Co., Inc. $1.25.

The purpose of these publications is indicated in the opening lines of the first volume's title page, "A source book of Philippine history to supply a fairer view of Filipino participation and supplement the defective Spanish accounts;" and the animus of the compiler, Mr. Austin Craig, appears in the first sentence of the preface to the second volume: "Among the many wrongs done the Filipinos by Spaniards, to be charged against their undeniably large debt to Spain, one of the greatest, if not the most frequently mentioned, was taking from them their good name." In other words, this faculty member of the University of the Philippines implies that Spanish historians could have been fairer in their treatment of the Filipino, that Spanish histories of the Philippines are defective, that Spain did many wrongs to the Filipinos and that Spain took from the Filipinos their good name. While these are all serious charges, only the last one will be examined here. In accusing the Spaniards, without offering a shred of evidence in support of the charge, of robbing the Filipinos of their good name, the author is himself robbing the Spaniards of their good name. He says: "Spanish writers have never been noted for modesty or historical accuracy . . . in order to fabricate a sufficient showing for over three centuries of pretended progress [they were] led to the practical denial of human attributes to the Filipinos found here by Legaspi."

While it would be a simple task to refute Mr. Craig from numerous reliable sources, it will be more entertaining to show from his own compilation that he is really the one who is robbing the Filipinos of their good name. Regarding Jagor, the first of the authorities Mr. Craig quotes, he speaks as follows: "Jagor's (book) is indispensable"; "the most valuable book"; "has never been surpassed"; "excels all its predecessors." Let us listen to Mr. Craig's recognized authority on the Philippines. In direct contradiction to the author's statement of "lamentable lack of progress since the first few decades," which the Spaniards explained "by attributing savagery to the people Legaspi found," Jagor tells us that:

> The greater order which reigned in the Philippines after the advent of the Spaniards and still more the commerce they opened with America and indirectly with Europe had the effect of greatly increasing the Island trade (p. 13). The arbitrary rule of their [the Filipinos'] chiefs and the iron shackles of slavery were abolished by the Spaniards shortly after their arrival; and peace and security reigned in the place of war and rapine (p. 37). It would be difficult to find a colony in which the natives taken all in all feel more comfortable than in the Philippines . . . though legally not on an equal footing with the latter [the Spaniards] they are by no means separated from them > by the high barriers with which, not to mention Java, the churlish reserve of the English has surrounded the natives of the other colonies (p. 34).

A series of short articles entitled "The Beginnings of Philippine Nationalism" (vol. I, p. 118) seems to have for its object to show that the friars were the enemies of the Filipino and that the native clergy were unjustly treated. Mr. Craig begins the first of these articles with the words "The third of a thousand years during which Spain misgoverned the archipelago that Magellan had discovered for her was a period of Philippine preparation." But here is what Craig's "indispensable" authority, Jagor, has to say about the Spanish clergy:

> "The subjection (of the Philippines) was chiefly accomplished by the assistance of the friar Orders, whose missionaries were taught to employ extreme prudence and patience. The Philippines were thus won by a peaceful conquest" (p. 38). "The priests were the only protectors of the unfortunate Filipinos" (p. 117). "They [the friars] were most hospitable and kind to me" (p. 111). "The priests of the Philippines have often been reproached with gross immorality. . . . This may be true of the native padres; but I myself never saw in any of the households of the numerous Spanish priests I visited anything that could cause the least breath of scandal" (p. 114).

Of the Filipino priest Jagor says: "The average native priest, of those I saw, could hardly be called a credit to his profession. Generally ignorant, often dissipated and only superficially acquainted with his duties, the greater part of his time was given over to gambling, drinking and other objectionable amusements" (p. 123). And of the Filipino people the "most valuable book" of Jagor says: "The inhabitants of the Philippines have a great love for strong drink; even the young girls occasionally get intoxicated" (p. 100).

Parallel with this indictment let us quote from De Comyn, the Spanish writer whose article on "The State of the Philippines in 1810," Craig republishes. "The native of the Philippine Islands is by nature so sober that the spectacle of a drunken man is seldom noticed in the streets; in the capital where the most corrupt classes of them reside, it is admirable to see the general abstinence from a vice that degrades the human species" (p. 400). But De Comyn is a Spaniard and according to Craig "Spanish writers have never been noted for modesty or historical accuracy."

Who is it, then, that is "taking from the Filipinos their good name?" The Spaniard who praises their sobriety, or the American Professor at the University of the Philippines who has resurrected the dead work of the German maligner of the Filipino? It may be remarked in conclusion that Mr. Craig's obscure, laboring and ambiguous phraseology stands out in marked contract to the clear, well-written, scholarly article of his Filipino colleague, Professor Conrado Benitez.

Reveries of a Schoolmaster. By FRANCIS B. PEARSON. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.00.

The seasoned reviewer is always slow to align his judgment with that of publishers in the laudatory estimates of their wares: experience has taught him to be cautious. But here he is glad to agree with Charles Scribner's Sons when they say that these "reveries" disclose a charming personality, and that "they abound with keen common-sense, good-humor, and homely art." The essays do not, as the title of the book might lead one to believe, constitute a series of reflections dealing wholly with theories and methods of education. Of theory there is little or nothing, and of methods nothing that is formal and of the carefully chiseled sort. Rather you meet with a novel, homely, genial and refreshing presentation of the truths underlying the time-honored ways of successful teaching; and—thank goodness!—you are not told to a nicety just what manner of brain-waves is set in motion by this or that subject of the curriculum.

The titles of the essays are as original as those in Thring's "Theory and Practice of Teaching," and the essays themselves do not fall short of their titles in suggestiveness. If you would be convinced that knowledge is power, you must by all means read the essay on "Forefingers." You could hardly imagine how anyone could prove his point by an appeal to his left forefinger or his experience with a barber, but the author does succeed in doing so. If you would learn some of the things you should not do, supposing you are anxious to insure discipline, then you cannot leave unread the chapter on "Rabbit Pedagogy"; there you will find one kind of suggestion you must avoid as you would fire. Brer Fox's experience with Brer Rabbit is cleverly introduced to illustrate the advice. You will undoubtedly be the wiser for having read and pondered over the author's commentary on Van Dyke's four rules on the art of living. After reading about the writer's boyhood friend, "Sant," your mind will wonder back into the past to discover how many Sants you were fortunate enough to count among your friends. The essays entitled "Lanterns," "Make Believe," "My Speech" will surely remind you of Lamb's genial humor, and the one on "Beefsteak" is a delicious bit of satire on the theory of vocational education such as Elia himself might have written.

Many of the essays—most, in fact—contain reminiscences of country as opposed to city life, and of the hints that may be gleaned from nature on the art of dealing with living things such as boys and girls. Is this a partial reason why it is considered by many that the ideal university should be removed from the din and smoke of the city? At all events nature has taught this ardent admirer many a helpful lesson. A few touches here and there will reveal to the reader that the author is a Protestant, with a Protestant's ideas of salvation, propriety of conduct, and the like; and occasionally he may meet with just a suggestion of naturalism. But these are only touches, incidental, and affect little the general excellence of the essays. These papers can be heartily recommended to all lovers of the desultory and light essay, as well as to those who have spent some years in the classroom. They are sure to act as a tonic to the jaded mind and a stimulant to reflection on the ways and thoughts of boys.

Sinbad the Sailor: His Adventures with Beauty and the Peacock Lady in the Castle of the Forty Thieves: a Lyric Phantasy. By PERCY MACKAYE. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.25.

Of this dainty opera, described as a lyric phantasy, it is only an apparent paradox to say, despite all its graceful and artistic lyricism, it is in the factor of phantasy as unfolded in the extended stage-directions that the "fine frenzy," in a high order of poetic creation, stands most strikingly revealed. Mr. Mackaye, skilled as he is in pageantry and all the machinery of civic masques, seems to have wrought with an eye single to the possibilities of spectacular presentation. Yet the book is easy and delightful to read. In phrases of a true poet's prose, his directions so easily create background, dramatic settings and an atmosphere of wild but realistic illusion that the reader succumbs perforce to the enchantment.

In a deep forest it is snowing hard; frozen, scraggy boughs, with prickly leaves, writhe mournfully in the blast; for a moment a poor charcoal-burner, supporting the ragged form of a young girl, struggles silently against the storm; such, in miniature is the mis-en-scène. Then, by some wizardry of transmutation, the old man emerges as Sinbad the Sailor with his daughter, Beauty, en route through enchanted gardens, magic halls, vistaed palaces of dream-wrought splendor and magnificence, the moonlit haunts of wraiths and genii, specters and sprites of every name, to meet the Beast who, through some Circean sorcery, conceals beneath his shaggy features the radiant personality of a prince. The action moves apace. However fantastic the conceptions, the dénouement is cleverly contrived, without a sense of extravagance or shock. The piece has all the unwavering, childish verisimiltude of the fairy tale. With never a line to raise a blush, the forty thieves furnish a strain of rollicking mirth; and the gallant Sinbad, despite the spell, retains in speech and manner all the breezy freedom of the seas. Altogether, in breadth of conception and detailed technique, it is a noteworthy book. G. H. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Catholic Convert for June announces that during 1916 more than 40,000 non-Catholics were received into the Church, an increase of about 1,000 over the record for 1915. Mgr. Barnes tells the story of his conversion, Father Calavassy writes on the prospects of reunion between the Greek Orthodox Church and Rome, Dr. Locke continues his "Stories of Conversions," and Dr. Chambers offers "Some Thoughts for Converts."——The reviews in Catholic Book Notes for May are particularly good; there is an account of the annual meeting of the Catholic Truth Society, "the largest and most successful for many years past," and under "The Antidote" is given some interesting testimony regarding the changed attitude of English Protestants toward the crucifix.

Youthful "florinthologists" who wish to learn how to distinguish at a glance a crow from a crocus, a pelican from a panicle, the catbird from catnip, the auk from the orchid, the tern from the turnip, etc., etc., should not fail to procure at once a copy of Robert William Wood's "How to Tell the Birds from the Flowers" (Duffield, $1.00), which is described as "a revised manual of florinthology for beginners," and is full of clever verses and pictures of an indefensibly punsome character. "Not every one is always able To recognize a vegetable" he premises, and then proceeds to give infallible rules for doing so. For example, this is the way to tell the pea from the pewee:

> To tell the Pewee from the Pea,
> Requires great per-spi-ca-city.
> Here in the pod we see the Pea,
> While perched close by is the Pewee;
> The Pea he hears the Pewee peep,
> While Pewee sees the wee pea weep,
> There'll be but little time to see,
> How Pewee differs from the Pea.

An excellent and attractive summary of the biology of flowering plants is at the student's disposal in "The Mysteries of the Flowers" (Stokes, $2.00), by Herbert W. Faulkner. A great number of our commoner wild flowers are described as examples of the general principles of plant-genesis by means of insect activity. The utility of cross-fertilization, the interdependence of plant and insect life, fortification against adverse circumstances, and peculiar devices for attaining specific ends, are some of the subjects treated, always in a pleasing style and with abundant illustrations, some of them attractively colored. Perhaps one or two of the author's more general statements would have lost nothing by an indication of the nature, at least, of the experiments alleged in their support; and his persistent depiction of the plant as working out its own destiny by something like conscious effort is at times a bit fanciful for a work in which sustained personification is somewhat out of place. Nevertheless, as regards the actual phenomena presented, a vast field of interesting research is placed within easy reach of the reader.

In "Human Welfare Work in Chicago" (McClurg, $1.50), Harvey C. Carbaugh refutes the unjust accusation that Chicago is now exclusively devoted to material interests. It may be news to dwellers on the Atlantic seaboard, most of whom know more about Siberia than about Chicago, to learn that the city has the largest and best-equipped art school in the United States, the two largest schools of music, a public library containing 750,000 volumes, with two other libraries, whose combined total is 700,000, a famous symphony orchestra which has its own home and an endowment, sixty hospitals, and 400 organizations for charitable and philanthropic work. No college statistics are given, but one learns incidentally that eight schools of this grade are under Catholic auspices. The book contains an excellent sketch of the Church's work in education and charity. It is rather surprising to learn that there are more children in the parochial schools of the city of Chicago than in the entire diocese of New York.

"His Family" (Macmillan, $1.50), the title of Ernest Poole's new novel, consists of Roger Gale's three grown-up daughters: Edith, a selfish widow with five children; Deborah, a schoolma'am and uplifter; and Laura, a "guilty," shameless divorcee. Their father, an old-fashioned New Yorker, who feels he should keep up with his children, is daily faced with problems he cannot solve and finds the expense of cultivating "simplicity" hard to bear. There are excellent descriptions of the kaleidoscopic, complicated life of America's great metropolis, but nearly all the characters introduced are unattractive, and a doctor, whom the socialistic author apparently expects his readers to admire, deliberately kills one of his patients with an overdose of morphine.——That truth is stranger than fiction has been once again proved, this time by Penrhyn W. Coussens in "The Sapphire Story Book: Stories of the Sea" (Duffield, $1.50). Here is told the whole story of the marvelous voyages of Columbus to a new world; that epic tragedy of the sea, the Titanic disaster, is vividly narrated; the laying of the Atlantic cable is graphically described, and the tale of Nelson and Trafalgar, and the Great Armada's story are also told. Indeed, the thrills of Captain Kidd, whales and sharks and storms and icebergs and fires and everything on the sea that has a story come in for mention in this interesting book.

The current Dublin Review opens with a most interesting paper by Cardinal Gibbons entitled "My Memories." Johannes Jörgensen has a good critical paper on the late Ernest Psichari's "Le Voyage du Centurion." Gertrude Robinson's "The Béguines" is a discerning "study in the vocations of uncloistered women." Father Pollen examines what the Council of Trent decreed concerning attendance at Anglican service. Father Vassall-Phillips points out the blunders made by two novelists that undertook to write about Catholics, and Shane Leslie has an excellent article on "The Celt, the Saxon and the New Scene," in which he offers the British legislator valuable information about Irish-Americans. Among the book-reviews, which as usual are admirably done, is a well-merited grilling of the two final volumes of the "Cambridge History of English Literature." "They travesty what they set out to teach," is the reviewer's verdict, and he justly charges Mr. George Saintsbury with displaying singular density "in his estimate of the literary quality that marks the latest Christian renascence in England," especially in his belittling appraisal of Francis Thompson's poetry. Regarding the disproportionate representation Catholic authors receive in the work, the reviewer writes: "No plan or plea to explain this disproportion is adventured. We are left to surmise uncomfortably that sectarian prejudice, however subconscious, can alone account for it."

Mother M. Paul has written a very useful little book of meditations for religious in "Sponsa Christi" (Longmans, $0.90). It contains many practical reflections put in an original and pleasing way by one who is thoroughly at home in her subject. Not only nuns but directors of retreats will do well to make its acquaintance.——"Christian Science" ($0.15), by the Rev. Cyril Buotich, O. F. M., San Francisco, California, is a spirited attack upon the most noted among the latter-day vagaries of the New England conscience. It is delivered in the form of six lectures, well-planned in the main and calculated to influence the man in the street against the object of the author's aversion.

As a text-book purposing to give a scientific knowledge of life and life-processes and of the interrelation and classification of the animal and plant kingdoms, Smallwood, Reveley and Bailey's "Practical Biology" (Allyn & Bacon, $1.40) is deficient simply because it attempts to cover the whole field of animal biology in 159 pages, of human anatomy and physiology as well as alcoholism, tuberculosis, etc., in 98 pages, and in the next 200 pages all plant biology. It would seem that only a hazy, general knowledge will be the outcome of the study of this book. As is usual in volumes of this kind there is a one-sided presentation of the alcohol question, ignoring the conclusions of painstaking modern investigators like Atwater, and contradicting the experience of the sturdy races of such alcohol-consuming countries as France, Germany and Italy. The statement, not borne out by the facts, is made that "alcohol fills our State hospitals for the insane," yet as is usually the case with intemperate advocates of total abstinence, a few lines later on we read, "no less than twenty-six per cent of the inmates of our State institutions for the insane have become deranged as the result of intemperance." This is a case of a quart filling a gallon measure! Tobacco, too, comes in for a Manichean diatribe and the logic of the conclusions is of the same order as that concerning alcohol.

In "American Literature in Spain" (Columbia University Press, $1.50), Dr. John De Lancey Ferguson has collected considerable information from Spanish books and periodicals which treat of American writers. The author deserves credit for this difficult pioneer work of presenting to English readers the numerous translations and favorable criticisms our American authors have enjoyed in Spain. Wide reading, diligent research, and a thorough knowledge of the Spanish language are striking qualities of Dr. Ferguson's book, though the author might have spared us his occasional disparaging remarks about ecclesiastical imprimaturs, for "Nunc non erat his locus." The volume closes with two bibliographies, one of translations and criticisms of our American authors, the other of Spanish periodicals; but among these latter the author has omitted Razon y Fe, Ciudad de Dios, Iris de Paz, Revista Tomistica, Educación Hispano-Americana, Revista de Archivos y Bibliotecas, Estudios de Deusto, etc., which are more important publications than those he mentions.

"Music and Life" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25), by Thomas Whitney Surette, is a comprehensive exposition of our country's state of unpreparedness in the matter of musical education, that part of national training, which, if proper attention were given to it, would undoubtedly help us to become a better nation, more cultured, more patriotic, and more united. The author, after treating of the nature of music, and comparing it with the other arts as a means of social uplift, gives his ideas regarding the musical training of children, community music, opera and the symphony. His extensive knowledge of these subjects, from the standpoint of music, is evident, and he offers helpful suggestions. But the philosophical treatment of them is not so successful. For instance, he says: "I believe that all the great pictures and sculpture and music lay first in the general consciousness and then became articulate in one man. I believe no statesman, no philosopher, no, not even a Christ, to be conceivable save as he lies first in men's hearts. What they are in posse he is in esse." If by "general consciousness" is meant an universal consciousness, there is no such thing, and that Christ is dependent upon man's powers of conception for his "esse" is preposterous. Divinity can be in no way dependent, and Christ's esse is objectively true to man, not subjectively. The author rides his hobby so madly that he considers man's only heaven to be the pleasure of hearing a symphony.

The volume entitled "The Golden Verses of Pythagoras" (Putnam, $3.00), by Fabre d'Olivet, is translated from the French by Nayan L. Redfield. Though containing the philosophy of Pythagoras, they were composed by Lysis, one of his disciples. They are divided into thirty-six sections by d'Olivet and commented on as so many texts. For any one who is familiar with ancient philosophy the book will have a deep interest. From the book's preface we learn that the commentator who was born December 8, 1768, and died March 25, 1825, was a linguist of remarkable power, having made himself familiar with all the Semitic tongues and dialects and the secrets of the Chinese hieroglyphics. "In 1790, while in Germany, he received his Pythagorean initiation, and March 25, 1825, he died at the foot of his altar." Was Pythagoras a full-fledged idealistic evolutionist? It is somewhat difficult to answer positively from a study of d'Olivet's lucubrations. In his explanation of the twenty-third of the "Golden Verses" he has a comment on Kant which is interesting in view of the fate which befel the philosophy of Kant at the hands of Fichte, Schelling and Hegel, and of Kant's destestation of the idealist's concept of matter. The author writes: "Kant, rising into an ideal sphere there to consider reason in an absolute way, has done precisely the opposite from what he wished to do." He has discovered the essence of matter! But his view is nothing new. Pythagoras held it before him; but would have been appalled at the thought of expressing it so boldly.

Nearly all of Patrick MacGill's "Soldier Songs" (Dutton, $1.00) were written under fire. They describe in verse the events of the trenchman's daily life, they are quite somber in character, and rather reminiscent of Kipling. The following poem, "Off Duty," is one of the best:

The night is full of magic, and the moonlit dewdrops glisten
  Where the blossoms close in slumber and the questing bullets pass—
Where the bullets hit the level I can hear them as I listen,
  Like a little cricket concert, chirping chorus in the grass.

In the dug-out by the traverse there's a candle-flame a-winking,
  And the fireflies on the sandbags have their torches all aflame.
As I watch them in the moonlight, sure, I cannot keep from thinking
  That the world I knew and this one carry on the very same.

Look! A gun flash to the eastward! "Cover, matey! Under cover!
  Don't you know the flash of danger? You should know the signal well;
You can hear it as it's coming. There it passes,-swooping over.
  There's a threat and desolation in the passing of a shell."

Little spears of grass are waving, decked with jewels iridescent—
  Hark! A man on watch is stricken—I can hear his dying moan—
Lies a road across the starland near the wan and waning crescent,
  Where a sentinel off duty goes to reach his Maker's Throne.

SOCIOLOGY

On Being Poor

I NEED not repeat the popular estimate of what it is to be poor. The curt phrase, recalling what Sherman said of war, is slightly uncouth; besides, it is not true. At least, I do not think it is true, although, writing in my lack of nothing, I am very like the aristocrats who philosophized, as the starved mob thundered at the gates of Versailles. "Why don't they eat cake?" was the question ventured in good faith on a famous occasion. "Who wants bread anyway?" Grass, too, has been suggested as possessing sufficient nutriment for the poor, and within the memory of the seven-years' child, it has been delicately hinted by perfumed and rustling committees, foregathered in sociological conference at the Ritz-Carlton, that East Siders and their peers would do well to subsist on rice, leaving potatoes, and such luxurious kickshaws for their financial betters.

Poverty and Destitution

BUT by "being poor" I do not mean a want of food and raiment in becoming sufficiency, or of a roof over one's head. That is destitution, to be borne as a splendid vocation of high spiritual worth by a few chosen souls, but a state not calculated to develop the best that is in the ordinary man. Destitution has its pitfalls as well as wealth; it is a question which may be the more dangerous to the individual, as well as to the community. I can readily share the concept of the tenement-dweller who has "lost his job," that poverty, by which he means destitution, has all the pangs of hell, except the pain of loss. I wonder if we, who so often recommend resignation to his calm consideration, know what we are saying, as the easy counsel drops from our well-fed lips. We have only a dim concept of what it means to hear hungry children ask in vain for a piece of bread. We have never looked upon a wife slaving away what is left of a tubercular frame in a dingy, foul-smelling tenement. It has not been our lot to know that, simply for lack of money, a mere tithe of what thousands spend on luxury and vice in every great city, those dearer to us than life are dying in squalor.

That any human creature should be forced to suffer destitution of this nature and degree, is an outrage upon human dignity, which, in the strong words of Leo XIII, "God Himself treats with reverence." For it is "calculated," again to quote the Pontiff, "to defeat the end and purpose of his being" and "to give up his soul to servitude." It is the desire of God who made man as he is, that "the poor should rise above poverty and wretchedness and better their condition." If this possibility is placed beyond them, if they cannot have rest, suitable recreation, an opportunity to provide thriftily for their families and for the future welfare of their children, they are not poor, but destitute. The inspired writer prayed neither for riches nor destitution, but for those things only which would suffice for his fitting sustenance. That is, being a wise man, he asked for poverty, the nursery of great souls.

The Price of Achievement

FOR if destitution, enforced and universal, is an evil, poverty, as counseled by Christ is a powerful means to positive good. It is not only a passport to Heaven, but a strong factor in the establishment of Christ's Kingdom, with its unbroken reign of social justice, upon earth. It seems to be the Divine economy that nothing worth while is done in this world except through sacrifice. Draw up your catalogue of great men, and opposite each name write what part sacrifice has played in the ascent to greatness. What it meant to the followers of Christ need not be recalled. It was the price that Columbus paid, and Dante, and Harvey, and Stephenson, and Pasteur, Washington in the winter at Valley Forge, and Lincoln, in the dark days when he contended against men who held, with an honesty equal to his own, that it was their duty to rend the Union. We seem to become strong not by keeping, but by giving. It is not a paradox in any department of human endeavor, but a literal truth, that whosoever loses his life shall save it; a forgotten truth which war may yet preach to us with terrible eloquence.

For we have been long teaching, both in our schools and in our plans for social reconstruction, that life may well go along the paths of smallest resistance. Sacrifice has been discounted as an unworthy repression of self. The new spirit has had its philosophy, and appealing it is. There is so much sorrow in the world, it argued in Oscar Wilde's paraphrase, that one may well shrink from adding to the task and burden of even a child. True, yet indulgence is never kind. Spartan training has no merited place in any system, since Christ came to "teach us," in Marjorie Fleming's wise and beautiful words, "to be merciful." Better Spartan discipline, however, both for our children and for us, than Capuan camps. But poverty is the ideal, a bitter medicine at times, yet a panacea.

The Unknown Hampden

WHO has not known in his community, the strong man who through a life of toil and sacrifice, in an humble environment, made his home a center of real social regeneration? The one whom I knew best was a country doctor of the old school, at the beck and call of the whole county, and cheerful under the strain of his beneficent work. He never took a vacation, wore threadbare clothes, and luxuriated in a single dissipation, a corn-cob pipe. Old and worn at sixty, he died, a few years later, from pneumonia contracted on his way home one rainy night, after an emergency call to a patient, who if he had paid a fee, would have paid it "in kind." I have no reason to believe that this true physician's annual income ever exceeded two thousand dollars. He left no debts, about fifty dollars, a wife, seven children, and the adoration of the community. His three girls graduated at the convent school; two now have happy families; one is a Poor Clare. His oldest boy is a foreign missionary, the second is a surgeon, attaining something like fame in an Eastern city; the third is a prosperous merchant, and the youngest, a lawyer of more than local renown. I might mention, too, that this physician had married most imprudently. At the time of that interesting event, he had, like Mr. Bob Sawyer, a number of "gratifying confidences," but very little else. In fact, his whole life was one long imprudence of love and sacrifice. But I think it paid in the end, and that a man of this kind is worth infinitely more to his community than a multi-millionaire who builds libraries on the proceeds of sweated labor, leaving the upkeep to the community.

Mrs. Jeremiah Madden

AN author, new to publishers, Mrs. Katharine Haviland Taylor, has recently taught the beauty of poverty in a charming novel, "Cecilia of the Pink Roses." Messrs. Doran will sell you a copy, cheap indeed at a dollar and a quarter. With an understanding heart does Mrs. Taylor tell of the poor, of their innate delicacy, of the wide range of their quick sympathy, of their pathetic struggles. "One thing made learning easy to her," she writes of ten-year-old Cecilia Madden, the daughter of almost illiterate Irish immigrants. "She loved so greatly that she was often submerged with the loved, and so saw their viewpoint." Throughout the story, Mrs. Taylor, when she views the poor, sees through Cecilia's eyes of understanding.

Poor Mrs. Madden, for instance, in the superheated July temperature of an old-style New York tenement, is dying of cancer. Across the corridor, "some gent is whackin' his kid," while poor little Cecilia is trying to prepare the evening meal against her father's homecoming, and at the same time, to take care of four-year-old Johnny. Plainly, this is a case to be developed by our most up-to-date, filing-case sociologist, as indicating conditions made possible only through ecclesiastical superstition or reckless imprudence. But there is another side to this picture:

"Oh, Gawd!" said Jeremiah Madden. He laid a rough hand on her forehead, and she pulled it down against her cheek.

"Jerry," she said, between long gasps. "I been happy. I want you should remember that I been happy. Awful happy, Jerry."

"Oh, Gawd, Mary!" said the man. "If I'd a' knew how hard you'd a' had to work, I would n't a' brung you."

For only a few years before, Jeremiah and Mary had "stood on a wind-swept moor" in Ireland. "His arm was around her with that reverent touch that comes in Irish love," and in all true love, too, I fancy. "I'll send for you," he said, "after I make me fortune in America." But Mary "had come with him," yet never quite forgetting the soft turf and the gentle drip of the rain of Ireland, to an arid tenement in New York. There hardship awaited them, and poverty that at times almost touched destitution. But they were happy, because they loved much; a fact incredible to the card-index student of sociology.

"It wasn't no mistake," said Jerry, when the end came. It never is.

Father McGowan

THERE is also a delightful caricature of a priest in this unusual novel, and his name is McGowan. Father McGowan believed that it "was rarely necessary for humans to add to anyone's unhappiness by a mistaken sense of dealing out justice," and he modeled his life on his creed. In consequence, he was much beloved by the downtrodden, i.e., wage-slaves, small boys with no place to play, overworked mothers, girls in pursuit of mistaken ideals, and ex-convicts. But why does this good Father, who "had written a book," meet his parishioners with a "Pax tibi," especially when they are palpably plural? And how could any priest in his senses, plot by "innocent stratagem" to obtain entrance into "a fashionable school" for a Catholic girl? And why does he talk, at times, as if he believed the dogma of God's existence a matter open to question? In the amber of this amiable composition contrived by the excellent art of Mrs. Taylor, there are undoubted flies: Father McGowan, I grieve to say, is the most undoubted.

But Jeremiah, who even in his afterdays of affluence, loved to tell at dinner parties, how he "had hit the boss in the ear with a brick," is an unfailing delight, while the love of the little Irish girl for her uncouth father, with "his heart of gold," is one of the many factors in real life which underlie the truth that, whatever the sociologists may make of him, the good in man outweighs the evil. After all, even if we are sociologists, we cannot forget the truth of the Incarnation, in which the Most High God bound man to Himself by a new and wonderful link. And if one fact stands out beyond the others in that beautiful life, it is that He was poor and in labor from His youth.

EDUCATION

Home Economics in the Grades

SHOULD home economics find a place in the grammar grades? Primarily, what is meant by "economics"? This is an interesting question for Americans. As a nation we live under perilous economic conditions, which neither legislation nor time seems able to ameliorate. Economics or the science of economic activities claims a relationship with wealth, and gives as characteristics, "food, clothing, shelter and other desirable things." When we qualify economics with the expressive term, "home," since food and clothing are not minor points of interest in any domicile, it will be admitted that once the scientific word has been so modified, the whole subject assumes a new aspect. We can then remain with the limits of our subject in the confines of the classroom, where it is hoped that the efforts to further the work on "economy," both theoretical and practical, will later prove advantageous in the home.

Its Practical Value

THIS essential branch has found its way into many of our universities, colleges, and high schools; in some places it has been successfully adopted in the elementary grades, and even in the kindergarten. However, there are reasons for and against, which it may be well to consider. According to Professor Mary Swartz Rose of Teachers' College, Columbia University, "Home economics deals with food, clothing and shelter." Another authority says: "It is a course in household problems and demonstrations." Therefore, it includes cooking, sewing, laundering, and domestic work from the standpoint of sanitation, cleanliness, order and neatness. These topics are, of course, considered in detail.

Why should these helpful branches be omitted from the elementary school curricula? By no means can they prove harmful; on the contrary it is an earnest conviction among observant men and women that there is need for them, and that they should be included in the weekly routine. Statistics show that education for the home is specifically authorized in more than three-fourths of the States, and the national Government has not failed to concern itself with the problem. Federal legislation established "land-grant colleges" in 1862, in which provision was made for home education. Even our current papers and popular magazines give ample space to the work as it is conducted in the various schools, and other evidence of its popularity is not wanting.

Its Necessity

IN this busy twentieth century progress has made surprising strides. Those who look with favor on a slower pace are content to inculcate in the little ones a knowledge of the "three R's," and obstinately refuse to become enthusiastic when any such "fad" as home economics is suggested. But there are many reasons for teaching this so-called "fad." Many children must get the larger part of their domestic training from the teacher in the classroom. Nor is this a reflection on the mother or guardian. Frequently, the force of circumstance demands that she leave her place in the home to join the worker's ranks, in order to earn sustenance and shelter for those depending upon her. Can such a parent be expected to educate her children in the duties of home-life in all their details? Certainly not. In view of this fact, why cannot the school supply the deficit? Again, there are mothers totally incompetent to teach home duties, some by reason of health, others because of moral inefficiency, since they allow their social affairs to supplant the duties of the home. Hence, in many cases the development of the "home instinct" devolves upon the teacher. The convent boarding-school has always appreciated the necessity of training for the home from a domestic standpoint, and parents, Catholic and non-Catholic, have shown their appreciation of this ideal.

Some Objections Met

SOME object to home economics in the early classes, on the plea that its introduction will interfere with the fundamental branches, which necessarily require so much attention from both pupil and teacher. The expense attendant upon teaching the work, which must be practical, if success is hoped for, causes it to be in disfavor with others. These two objections can easily be met. The first is a problem that is soon solved, nor need the solution be entirely personal. The Bureau of Education in its publication, "Education for the Home," gives detailed and helpful information. For example, it is suggested that the work of the first six grades be a definite beginning in industrial and fine arts, to the extent of "interpreting ideas and feeling through materials." In the first grade, the work is social, and industrial life constitutes the larger part of the course. The topics considered are: the family, its members and pleasures; activities; material needs, including food, clothing and shelter. As to food, the subject-matter may be: "What to eat; how our needs are supplied; how mother preserves some kinds of fruit for winter use." "Preserving of fruit for the day-nursery, modeling fruit and vegetables from clay, may constitute the practical side of the work." Each of these points can be and should be correlated with the hard and fast spelling, arithmetic, and other branches, and the thoughtful teacher will soon perceive that the subjects presented for the minims need not be divorced from what is required in teaching the domestic side of life.

If we examine the curricula of the schools that are fostering home education "to better the living conditions," we shall not find that they are crowding out the other branches. The maximum time allowed seems to be two hours weekly, devoted to the most practical problems. It is always interesting to children to see their own productions, and to meet the kind and approving glance of parent and teacher for tasks that have been successfully accomplished.

The necessary equipment need not be elaborate. I vouch for it that few if any heads of schools will refuse the small pittance required to aid the little ones, whom they are supervising in their moral and mental development, and it is encouraging to read in educational bulletins of the efforts and the sacrifices that have been made in the rural, suburban and city schools of so many States.

Arrangement of Curriculum

THE courses of the first six years in home economics are general in character, and wisely so. In the seventh and eighth grades the schedule requires that the pupils begin to differentiate; that the problems of the household, the province of the girls, be seen from the technical and vocational point of view, while the boys specialize in the industrial arts. The "Teachers' Manual of South Carolina," in an issue of several years past, appropriately says, "One of the most important services that a teacher can render is to stimulate the natural impulses of the girls in her school toward the improvement of home." Every parent and guardian is keenly alive to the necessity of developing the minds of the little ones whom Almighty God has confided to them. But the generally accepted idea of the vast majority is to have these little children become quasi-storehouses of knowledge, the result of drinking in from books the deeds of the dim past, and hard facts. Truly, information must be acquired, but the children should not remain in ignorance of work that is broadening, and that gives dignity to the duties of home.

Training for the Home

HOME economics, as a subject for the grades, should have the approval of every teacher in our land. The Commissioner of Education, Dr. P. P. Claxton, remarks: "In America, at least, the home is the most important of all institutions, where must be established the children's physical, mental and moral health. Thus, of all the arts, those pertaining to home-making are the most important, and of all sciences, those which find their application in the home, making us intelligent about the home and its needs, are the most significant."

The little ones are not capable of the arts and sciences, but there is a possibility of re-enforcing the interest of the child in the home, of strengthening "home-mindedness," and of imparting the knowledge necessary for sharing later in the activities of the household, and thus making the home "the sphere of harmony and peace."

NOTE AND COMMENT

Mother M. De Chantal Keating

MOTHER M. De CHANTAL KEATING, a recipient of the bronze medal from the Grand Army of the Republic for her devotion to the wounded soldiers during the Civil War, died June 4 at St. John's Home for Boys, Brooklyn, N. Y. She was the oldest Mother Superior among the Sisters of St. Joseph, had been sixty years in the Congregation, and for thirty-four years had presided over the Home at which she died in her eighty-fourth year. Born in Ireland, of English-Irish parentage, she came to this country in 1852 and five years later entered St. Mary's Convent, Williamsburg. Later she was stationed at St. Mary's Academy, Flushing, and when the Civil War broke out went to Wheeling as Mother Superior, where she assisted in nursing the great number of wounded soldiers cared for in the hospital. Two of her nephews are members of the Society of Jesus, one being the Reverend Joseph Keating, S.J., editor of the Month, and the other the Reverend Francis Keating, S.J., a well-known missionary. Her sister, Mother Magdalen, of the Convent of the Presentation, is stationed at Fitchburg, Mass. It may be noted here that although adorned with a medal for the service rendered to her adopted country, Mother Keating would today be barred from again giving her assistance as a nurse to her country's defenders. By the action of the Medical Board of the Red Cross, all ministration of our Catholic Sisterhoods in army and navy hospitals has been rendered impossible. (America, June 2, p. 190.) The Y. M. C. A. has been officially recognized, but almost 1,000 of the best and most devoted nurses have been excluded from service by an arbitrary decree. The memory of Mother M. De Chantal Keating, and of the many noble religious women who like her gave to their country more than it can ever repay, should weigh mightily to bring about an amendment of this un-American decree that denies to our wounded Catholic soldiers and sailors the ministration of these "angels of charity." Even today the most cherished memories of Civil War veterans are of such devoted religious women as Mother M. De Chantal Keating.

The Marist Brothers' Centenary

ONE hundred years ago, in the little village of Lavalla, the Abbé Champagnat began a humble and insignificant work which today has developed into the world-wide society of the Little Brothers of Mary. A small house close to his own, with two disciples uninstructed in the art of teaching or even in the rudiments of learning, was the first establishment opened by the zealous founder. Even then he planned it to be a society for the instruction of boys. God's blessing was upon the enterprise which flourished beyond all expectations, and in 1824 he was able to bless the first stones of what was to be a novitiate large enough to accomodate 150 persons. Though without any visible means, his trust in Providence was boundless, and when on June 6, 1840, his own life came to an end the Society which he had established numbered 280 Brothers and thirty postulants, and was conducting forty-eight schools. On January 9, 1863, it was formally recognized and approved by the Church; and today, in its centenary year, it is spread over almost the entire world. It is divided into twenty-two provinces and has a membership of 6,097. In its twenty-six preparatory novitiates boys from twelve to fifteen years of age are received and trained for the great and noble task of molding the minds and hearts of the young, than which, as the Holy Father says, "there seems to be no work more important for human society." Here, too, under the mighty patronage of the Virgin Mother of God, they are taught to perpetuate in their own lives those virtues of humility of spirit, simplicity and modesty which are "the chief heritage" left them by their Founder. The Divine assistance given him and his disciples "through the ever-present advocacy of Mary," as Pope Benedict XV writes in his centenary message, "is clearly visible in the growth of this Order which has progressed far beyond human expectations despite many almost insuperable obstacles." And he hopes that it will fall to his own lot to bestow upon the Society its crowning glory by inscribing its Founder among the number of the Blessed, "an event that would undoubtedly add greatly to the prosperity of his Institute." The Marist Brothers came to America in 1885 and opened their first school in Iberville, P. Q., Canada. New schools were rapidly added, and in 1905 the Society entered the United States, where it now possesses 238 members, postulants and novices, and is teaching in fourteen schools. Such is the fruit of the humble work of Abbé Champagnat, who "gave earth Mary's Brotherhood: a hundred years of solid good to youth, its ward."

Draft of 1780

ATTENTION is called by the Chicago Tribune to the views of George Washington on the draft plan for raising an army. They are set forth in a letter dated "Morristown, 25 May, 1780" and are addressed to a congressional committee consisting of Philip Schuyler, John Mathews and Nathaniel Peabody. He thus urged his opinion:

> The mode by Draught is, I am persuaded, the only efficacious one to obtain men. It appears to me certain that it is the only one to obtain them in time: nor can the period which you have appointed for bringing them into the field be delayed without defeating the object. I have little doubt that at any time, and much less at the present juncture, the powers of government exerted with confidence will be equal to the purpose of Draughting. The hopes of the people, elevated by the prospects before them, will induce a cheerful compliance with this and all the other measures of vigor, which have been recommended and which the exigency requires.
> Notwithstanding the extension of the Draught which I have taken the liberty to advise, occasional aids of militia will still be wanted, but in much less number in this case than in the other.
> I have entire confidence that the respective Legislatures will be fully impressed with the importance and delicacy of the present juncture and will second the views of the committee by the most speedy and vigorous efforts. With every sentiment of respect and esteem, I am, etc.

There can clearly be no doubt of Washington's views on the draft plan in general, and of its necessity under the circumstances existing in 1780.

The Regular

THE editor of the Greenwich journal, Our Town, describes his meeting with "a young hero and patriot of the kind of which the regular army and navy are full." The latter was very busy at the time, eating his dinner at a restaurant, and his mind was little intent upon the conversation. He was on active duty, and, as he admitted between mouthfuls, was soon to go as a member of a gun's crew in an armed merchantman.

> Inasmuch as I knew that this is the most dangerous service at the present time, I expected him to talk about it. But he did not apparently think it worth remark. When I asked him if it wasn't pretty dangerous, he said: "Huh? Oh, yes, fairly, I guess. Please pass the salad."
> He did not deliver any admonitory remarks about the duties of citizens. He didn't once say anything about "slackers." He did not even express the opinion that we are a nation of inefficient cowards, which just now seems a pretty popular sentiment among the "patriots" who run the New York newspapers, and belong to the various societies that are trying to show the Government how to run the war.
> You see, it never occurred to him that he was a hero or a patriot. He was just a sailor in the regular service of the United States. Personally, he would probably have preferred to stay in the navy yard, where there was plenty of "shore leave." But he was ordered aboard an armed merchantman, and, of course, he would go—"Pass the salad, please."
> He would "do his bit," and if he happened to come out alive he would go about his duty as usual, and not expect a laurel wreath. It was just a part of his job. That is the spirit of the American regular, which makes one of him worth to the nation as much as a whole hall full of howling "patriots" who spend their strength in cheering and waving flags and directing the war.

As the dinner was over and the conversation broke off, the lad's concluding words were: "Good-bye; take care of yourself." "Just as if," remarks the editor, "I were the one, not he, who needed to take care of himself."

Convent-Inspection Bill Passed in Florida

THE convent inspection bill has just passed the Senate in Florida, disguised as a measure providing for the inspection of "all closed institutions." It was substituted for a still more odious bill which had been submitted to the House. Even had the press not clearly designated it as "the convent inspection bill," the debate in the Senate could have left no doubt as to its real purpose. The excuse given for its passage by Senator Fogarty (!) was the ingenuous plea that it was intended to put an end to bigotry in the State. During the course of the debate Senator Johnson left the president's chair to speak against the original House bill. "I am a son of a Methodist minister," he said, "but I believe that if the Protestants will use their religion to teach better living and leave off the agitation against other denominations they will accomplish more good for the people of the State." Alluding to those who were stirring up this strife, he added: "If Catholics go to hell they will have plenty of company from the Protestant congregations. I hope that both of the bills will be killed." Senator Andrews likewise rose to say that although he understood little about Catholics, yet a certain Baptist, with what little religion he had, had given him more trouble than all the Catholics he ever knew. These two Senators were apparently the only non-Catholic members willing to ward off all injustice and indignity from Southern ladies whose sole crime is that they have inviolably consecrated their virginal purity to Christ. Special credit is due to the manly defense made by the only Catholic member of the House, Senator Jones, of Escambia, who thus replied to the arguments drawn from popular ignorance and bigotry:

> If I were to express myself as I feel after listening to the arguments on this floor, I might go too far. The Catholics of America expect and ask justice only, and the right to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience. I protest as a Catholic citizen against the enactment of any such law, as it is not necessary. We do not object to inspection. The present laws of the State provide for all the regulation necessary along that line. Grand juries of the various counties where our institutions are located have inspected such places and in every case have found them to be unexceptional. If any man who calls himself a good Christian knew of the good work accomplished by self-sacrificing women, as I do, it would make his blood boil to hear any person attempt to place a stigma on the character of these godly women.

While the rejection of the House bill by a vote of eighteen to twelve shows that at least a glimmer of light had penetrated the darkness, yet the substitute bill itself was passed by the overwhelming majority of twenty-six to three, and is now left to the Governor for approval.

The War.—The British have had a series of minor victories in the vicinity of Messines, where an advance on a mile front was followed by the retirement of the Germans on a front of two miles and a half from their first-line defensive positions, from St. Yves to the Lys. Later in the week the British made progress in the same region on a front of seven miles. They also captured Infantry Hill east of the Monchy ridge and made some slight gains near Bullecourt. In the Trentino the Italians stormed Monte Ortigara and Corno Cavento and forced the Agnello pass. On the other war fronts there has been nc fighting of an important character.

Bulletin, June 11, p.m.-June 18, a.m.

The Food Control Bill, introduced some time ago by Mr. Hoover in the House has been reported after a long delay in both houses, in the Senate in its original form, and in the House with some modifications. It is extremely drastic in certain of its provisions and has already roused vigorous opposition. It is likely to undergo considerable revision before it passes Congress, but is to take precedence of the War Revenue bill, which is still under consideration by the Senate Financial Committee. A Prohibition bill has been introduced into the Senate by Senator Gore, which is intended to last for the duration of the war, and provides that the manufacture of intoxicants from all grains and syrup shall be strictly forbidden, and that the President be empowered to commandeer the entire national stock of distilled spirits in bond.

Bills Before Congress

After a week's delay in conference, during which the appropriation for the purchase, improvement and equipment of the Jamestown site as a naval base was opposed by the House and favored by the Senate, the House finally yielded, and the War Budget was passed by Congress and sent to the President. He signed the bill on June 16, and it thereby became law. The measure authorizes the expenditure of $3,340,000,000 for the pay of army and navy, the construction of fortifications, the purchase and building of ships, and for other details of war machinery, such as food, clothing, ordnance, lumber and other supplies. The way has now been definitely cleared for the rapid execution of the Administration's war preparations.

The War Budget Law

On receiving the signature of the President, which was affixed on June 16 to the bill finally passed by the Senate four days before, the Espionage bill became a law. It does not contain the censorship section demanded by the Administration, but empowers the Executive Department to exclude from the mails letters and publications which violate the provisions of the act and renders those who use the mails for such purposes liable to a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment of five years, or both. The embargo clause is of especial importance, as it not only empowers the President to trade with the Allies and to obtain the goods of which the United States has need, but also authorizes him to control exports.

The Espionage Law

No supplies may be exported from the United States without a license. The result will be that supplies asked for by neutrals will be limited to a large extent to those neutrals who are friendly, and will be permitted only in such quantities as will meet their strict needs, thus preventing them from forwarding any portion of them to Germany. The immediate effect of this regulation will be to obviate the necessity of the blockade maintained by the Allies. Norway, Sweden and Switzerland have sent commissions to lay before our Government the extent of their needs, and the figures submitted by them, as well as those submitted by Denmark, Holland and Spain will be revised by officers of the United States. Shipping routes will also be under Governmental control. Not only will countries which have been receiving supplies from the United States be forced to procure them from nearer countries, but American ships and those of the Allies can be required to carry cargoes to such places as the United States designates with a view to the effective prosecution of the war. Neutral nations will also be obliged to use their own vessels, which have hitherto been kept safely in port, for the transportation of their own supplies. As a consequence there will be an immense saving of tonnage.

Greece.—In response to the demand of the protecting powers, France, Great Britain and Russia, Constantine I,

King of the Hellenes, abdicated on June 12, in favor of his second son, Prince Alexander. This not unexpected climax was brought about through the agency of the French Senator, M. Jonnart, who arrived in Athens a few days previously as the representative of France, Great Britain and Russia. While calling for the abdication of King Constantine, the Powers specifically eliminated Crown Prince George as his successor, as he was considered strongly pro-German. It is presumed that King Alexander will follow out a policy in agreement with the desire of the Allies. He is twenty-four years old and has been free from anti-Entente proclivities.

King Constantine Abdicates

The climax, which led up to the abdication of the King, came rather suddenly. The French Commissioner, M. Jonnart, was hurried to Athens in order to lay before Premier Zaimis, the aims which France, Great Britain and Russia had with respect to establishing unity of feeling among the Greeks and greater security for the Entente forces engaged in operations in the East. While informing the Premier that he had troops at his disposal, M. Jonnart begged him to use his influence for a peaceful settlement. The troops, according to M. Jonnart's instructions were not to land until the King had given his answer. On June 11, he called upon the Premier and demanded in the name of the protecting powers, the abdication of King Constantine and the nomination of his successor to the exclusion of the Crown Prince. M. Zaimis pointed out to M. Jonnart that a decision could only be taken by the King after a meeting of the Crown Council, composed of former premiers. On the morning of June 12, the Premier communicated to the Commissioner of the Allied powers the King's answer in the following terms:

> The Minister and High Commissioner of France, Great Britain and Russia: Having demanded by your note of yesterday the abdication of his majesty, King Constantine, and the nomination of his successor, the undersigned, Premier and Foreign Minister, has the honor to inform your excellency that his Majesty, the King, ever solicitous for the interests of Greece, has decided to leave the country with the Prince Royal, and nominates Prince Alexander as his successor. (Signed)

Aware of the impending crisis, many Greeks, loyal to the Crown, had gathered for the protection of the sovereign. On the night of June 11, 2,000 reservists formed a cordon around the palace in his defense and a delegation headed by Naval Commander Mavromichaelis was received by the King and pledged the devotion of the army and the people to his cause. The King's only reply was an appeal that they should remain calm. All efforts of agitators to start a manifestation failed and the army officers, obeying the injunctions of the Government, announced their intention to maintain peace.

On June 16, it was announced that the blockade had been raised by the Allies and that the food situation, which for some time had been serious, was improving rapidly. In a proclamation addressed by the High Commissioner M. Jonnart to the Hellenes, in which he informed them of the motives of the Powers in calling for the abdication of the King, he stated that any reprisals against Greeks to whatever party they belonged would be pitilessly repressed, that no breach of the peace would be tolerated, that the liberty and prosperity of every one would be safeguarded and that the protecting Powers had no intention of forcing upon the Greek people general mobilization. One June 18, King Constantine, Queen Sophia and Crown Prince George were reported to have reached Messina, Italy, on their way to Switzerland.

Ireland.—Mr. Lloyd George has announced in the House of Commons the composition of the coming Irish Convention. It is to be composed of 101 representatives. John Redmond, the Nationalist leader, will be invited to nominate five members; Sir John Lonsdale will also be invited to nominate a similar number, and William O'Brien, two members. There will be ten Irish representative peers, five members of the Irish Unionist Alliance, five Sinn Feiners and fifteen members nominated by the Government. The Premier said that the Government would prefer that the Convention nominate its own chairman, but it would be prepared to nominate him and submit his name to the King. He also stated that the Government had invited each county council and each borough council to send its chairman to the Convention. The urban councils had been invited to send two representatives. The churches would be represented by four Catholic bishops, by the Primate and Archbishop of Dublin, representing the Protestant religion, and by Dr. John Irwin, moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly. In addition, the Chambers of Commerce of Dublin, Belfast and Cork, would be represented and there would be five representatives of the Irish labor interests.

Composition of the Convention

On June 15, Mr. Andrew Bonar Law announced in the House of Commons that all the prisoners taken in the Irish rising of Easter Sunday, 1916, would be released without reservation. The Minister stated that the Government felt that by so doing, they would aid in the success of the coming Irish Convention, which, the Government hoped would effect a reconciliation between Irish political parties. In making the announcement, among other things, Mr. Bonar Law said:

Political Prisoners to be Released

> It is . . . desirable beyond measure that the convention should meet in an atmosphere of harmony and good-will in which all parties can unreservedly join. Nothing could be more regrettable than that the work of the convention should be prejudiced at the outset by embittered associations which might even hinder the settlement to which all look forward with hope. In these circumstances the Government have decided they cannot give better earnest of the spirit in which they approach the convention than by removing one of the main causes of the serious misunderstanding of this subject with which it is in their power to deal. They have decided, therefore, upon the release without reservation of all prisoners now in confinement in connection with the recent rebellion in Ireland.

They have not, however, arrived at this decision without careful consideration of two aspects of the case which it is impossible to ignore. They have satisfied themselves: First, that public security would not be endangered by such an act of grace; and, second, that in none of the cases concerned was participation in the rebellion accompanied by individual acts which would render such a display of clemency impossible.

In recommending to the King grants of general amnesty to the persons in question, the Government have been inspired by the sanguine hope that their action will be welcomed in a spirit of magnanimity, and that the convention will enter upon its arduous undertaking in circumstances that will constitute a good augury for the reconciliation, which is the desire of all parties in every part of the United Kingdom.

The announcement of Mr. Bonar Law was received with cheers. Mr. Joseph Devlin expressed his gratitude at the action of the Government, but thought that had they been advised to come to a decision earlier, they would have avoided much irritation and created at a much earlier period the spirit of reconciliation and good temper which they hoped would prevail in the future. Herbert Samuel, for the English Liberals; George J. Wardle, for the Labor members; Eugene Watson, for the Scottish Liberals, and Ellis Griffith, for the Welsh members, also expressed their cordial approval of the action of the Government. The news of the intended measure was received in Dublin with enthusiasm.

The Sinn Feiners of East Clare have decided to contest the seat in Parliament vacated by the death of Major William Redmond. They have chosen as their candidate Edward de Valera, formerly a professor in Dublin University and sentenced to death for his part in the Sinn Fein rising. His sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life.

Japan.—The Japanese Government has expressed its displeasure at the note sent to Peking from Washington on June 4, in which the United States declared that whether or not China should enter the world-war was a matter of only "secondary importance," her "principal necessity" being to "resume and continue her political entity, and proceed along the road to national development" It was America's hope, the note went on, that an end would be put to "factional and political disputes" and that "All parties and persons would work to reestablish and coordinate the Government and secure China's position among the nations, which is impossible while there is internal discord."

Our Note to China Resented

Japan, backed by Great Britain, feels that the note should have been shown to her before being sent to Peking, and has expressed her unwillingness to cooperate with this country in an effort to compose China's internal situation. Japan resents our interference, considering the note prejudicial to her claims of a "paramount interest" in China. The attitude of the Mikado's Government toward China is regarded as similar to ours toward Mexico. Meanwhile it is announced that a Japanese Commission is to visit the United States to arrange cooperation between the two countries. Viscount Kikujiro Ishii, formerly Foreign Minister, is to be chief envoy.

Russia.—The American Commission, headed by Elihu Root, reached Petrograd on June 13. Pro-German agents were reported to be busy trying to discredit the leader of the Commission, so Ambassador Francis issued a statement to the effect that the Commission's only purpose is to devise means "to aid Russia in her efforts to defeat the universal enemy of democracy" and assured the Russians that on the Commission there is "not one person who pursues any personal, financial or commercial aims or who desires to influence Russian internal affairs."

Mr. Root's Reception

On June 15 Mr. Root addressed the Council of Ministers at Petrograd, saying that "The American democracy sends to the democracy of Russia a greeting of sympathy, friendship, brotherhood, godspeed." Continuing, he explained:

> One fearful danger threatens the liberty of both nations. The armed forces of a military autocracy are at the gates of Russia and the Allies. The triumph of German arms will mean the death of liberty in Russia. No enemy is at the gates of America, but America has come to realize that the triumph of German arms means the death of liberty in the world; that we who love liberty and would keep it must fight for it, and fight for it now when the free democracies of the world may be strong in union, and not delay until they may be beaten down separately in succession.
> So, America sends another message to Russia—that we are going to fight, and have already begun to fight, for your freedom equally with our own, and we ask you to fight for our freedom equally with yours. We would make your cause ours and our cause yours, and, with a common purpose and mutual helpfulness of a firm alliance, make sure of victory over our common foe.

M. Tereschtenko, Minister of Foreign Affairs, then responded saying: "The Russians have no imperialistic wishes. We know that you have none. We shall fight together to secure liberty, freedom, and happiness for all the world. I am happy to say that I do not see any moral idea or factor between America and Russia to divide us."

Under the presidency of F. F. Kokoshkine, who belongs to the Duma, a council of sixty-one members met last week at Petrograd to prepare for the elections to the Constituent Assembly, to draft the new Constitution, and to solve a number of pressing problems. The council is made up of constitutional specialists, deputies from the army, representatives from all of the political parties, and from the different races in Russia. The Provisional Government has submitted to this council's consideration a law regarding the way of voting for the Constituent Assembly's delegates. Proportional representation of all parties is proposed, and universal, equal, secret and direct voting by both sexes, the voting age of civilian men and women being twenty and that of soldiers eighteen. The Provisional Government has declared invalid all land transfers made prior to May 14. The Ministry of Justice has submitted a bill guaranteeing the inviolability of the person, the home, and private correspondence; the judges of petty courts are to be elected to office, women may sit as magistrates, and smaller units of local self-government in which all classes may participate on equal terms are to be introduced. The Provisional Government has also issued a decree declaring all acts of military disorder, such as refusal to fight, to be insubordination punishable by imprisonment and the deprivation of property rights. The Minister of Finance has had in preparation a law creating a State monopoly of sugar. Finland has been given the right of legislative initiative, the right to confirm the budget, revoke administrative decrees, pardon offenders, to summon the ecclesiastical council, to decide all State transactions except matters affecting Russian subjects, and to open and close the Finnish Diet. Dating from July 14, a State coal monopoly will be established for the purpose of supplying the internal market, preventing speculation, and fixing prices that will enable the mines to run without loss.

Workmen's Council's Attitude

On June 16 the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates at Petrograd, issued a proclamation citing the receipt of a message from Prince Leopold of Bavaria, in which he proposes a separate peace with Russia that will not necessitate her breaking with the Allies. The proclamation exhorts all Russians "to rally around the banner of revolution and increase the energy of the military power for the defense of freedom." Russia will follow her own way to a general peace, the Council of Delegates asserts, and then goes on to say:

> Russia has undertaken to unite the democracies of all fighting countries in the struggle against world autocracy, but her plan will never be realized if German imperialism is able to utilize Russia's longing for peace, to disunite her from her Allies and ruin her army. The Revolutionary Democracy of Russia is seeking a route to peace through an appeal by the Government created by democratic Russia to the Governments of its Allies and by means of an international conference of Socialists. Let the army by its energy and courage give power to the voice of Democracy.

In an earlier communication addressed to the French, English and Belgian Ministers of Munitions regarding the impending Socialist conference the Executive Committee of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Council made the following statement:

> The council expects from the conference of the Socialists of the belligerent and neutral countries the creation of an Internationale, which will permit all the working classes of the whole world to struggle in concert for a general peace and break the bonds which unite them by force to the Governments and the classes imbued with imperialistic tendencies which prevent peace.

In the opinion of the Executive Committee the only hope of the conferences succeeding lies in having the "Socialists consider themselves, not the representatives of the two belligerent parties, but the representatives of a single movement of the working classes toward a common aim of a general peace." On June 17 came the news that the Duma in secret session had passed a resolution for "an immediate offensive in close co-operation with Russia's allies."

Spain.—The Conservative Cabinet which has succeeded the Liberal Ministry of Marquis Prieto is composed as follows: Premier, Señor Dato; Minister of Foreign Affairs, Marquis de Lema; Minister of Justice, Señor Burgos; Minister of War, General Fernando Primo-Rivera; Minister of the Navy, General Flores; Minister of the Interior, Señor Sanchez Guerra; Minister of Finance, Señor Burgallal; Minister of Labor, Viscount d'Eza; Minister of Public Instruction, Señor Andrado. On assuming office, Señor Dato declared that the return of the Marquis de Lema to the post of Minister of Foreign Affairs was a guarantee that the new Government would follow a policy of absolute neutrality. He also announced that he did not intend to dissolve the Cortes. The present Chamber of Deputies contains a majority of Liberals, but ex-Premier Count Romanones has already announced that he will support Señor Dato. This assures the new Premier a working majority in the Chamber. At the same time, the new Minister of War, General Fernando Primo-Rivera, stated that he expected to settle the controversy which has arisen over the military associations exercising political influence.

The New Cabinet

At the present writing, the situation in the country is problematical. All agree that it is serious. That there is still widespread discontent in the army and unrest among the people there can be no doubt, although the Minister of War has stated that the rumors, rife last week, of military sedition in Bilbao were unfounded. The unrest has spread to the Cortes, who complain that their constitutional rights have been violated because they were not allowed to participate in the grave questions befor the country.

The situation in Catalonia, and especially in its capital Barcelona, is also extremely critical. The inhabitants of the province are aroused against the Government and are agitating insistently for independence. One faction openly declares that it will obey no laws not passed by Catalonians for Catalonians and demands independence at any price. The general economic situation of the country demands quick action by the new Cabinet. Strikes are imminent, especially in the Asturias. The cost of living has advanced fifteen to twenty-five per cent in the last three months. The supply of coal is so scanty that it is almost impossible to operate trains, and the submarines are paralyzing commerce.

"Big Roman Catholics" and Billy Sunday

RICHARD H. TIERNEY, S.J.

FROM newspaper reports it appears that there are big and little Catholics in New York City. The former are very important, the latter count not at all, except perhaps in the eyes of God. On June 9 the metropolitan press announced that one of these bigwigs "hit the trail" in Sunday's tabernacle and in a moment of spiritual exaltation, endorsed the evangelist as follows: "I am proud and happy to shake hands with Mr. Sunday. There was not a word in his entire sermon that any one could possibly take exception to and I want him to know that I appreciate his work."

Forthwith there was the usual commotion, out of which came an inconspicuous repudiation of the aforesaid sentiments, from the "big Roman Catholic," and a flood of letters directed to the office of AMERICA. Some of these communications were calm and dignified, others were high-pitched and hysterical in their denunciation of politicians, Papal knights and of the "aloof," "secretive," "mysterious" editor of AMERICA, who is held accountable for consciences which do not exist, and for the actions of men who are but names to him. The incident might be closed here, were it not for two pertinent lessons to be drawn therefrom.

Thank God, there are "big" Catholics in New York City and in almost every city of the world. The Spirit of God is breathing sweetly over the souls of men and making them bloom as the lily, fair before the Face of the Father. Little children are coming from the altar-rail, with the light of Heaven in their eyes and the music of golden harps in their souls. They are big Catholics, the biggest of all, for "of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." Unknown nuns and Sisters are hastening towards complete earthly oblivion, in prayer and all holiness, alert of eye to catch the first sign of the coming of the Spouse. They are big Catholics. "Blessed are the clean of heart: for they shall see God." "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after justice, for they shall have their fill." Lowly fathers and mothers are sweating their lives away in foul tenements, serving God in humility and meekness and sorrow, in labors above measure, in all privations. They are big Catholics. "Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven. Blessed are the meek: for they shall possess the land. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted." Yes, there are "big Roman Catholics" in New York; the merciful, "Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy," the peacemakers, "Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God," the persecuted, "Blessed are they that suffer persecution for justice sake: for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven. All these are big, big by the measure of God, who reckons not according to cleverness or wealth or title or social distinction or newspaper notoriety or trumpery of any kind, but according to the things of the spirit. God, not man, set the norm of greatness when, through the mouth of Jehu, he asked Jonadab, the son of Rechad, "Is thy heart right as my heart is with thy heart?"

There is the first lesson to be learned from the event that made the wires of the Associated Press hum with twaddle. All men would do well to ponder it, especially those discontented with their lot. The world is passing and they with it, and in the end, when the ships of Tarsus have disappeared, the heart only will count.

The second lesson lacks nothing in importance. Billy Sunday is no doubt a good man; he is, moreover, an asset to disintegrating Protestantism which has sore need of him. But he is not a Catholic, his doctrine is not Catholic, his service is not Catholic, his tabernacle is not Catholic. He is a regularly ordained Presbyterian minister; he is a protest, therefore, against the Catholic priesthood, against the Mass, against Confession, against the Immaculate Conception, against Papal Infallibility, against all save a few shreds and patches of the Faith delivered to the Saints by Christ. His service consists also of prayers and hymns quite foreign to Catholicism; his tabernacle is a Protestant meeting-house, set up for Protestant services, dedicated to that purpose by the invocations of Protestant ministers. Billy Sunday is a minister conducting a heretical service in a conventicle. By what right, therefore, do Catholics attend his functions? By what rule of conduct do they justify their action? Is curiosity their norm? If so, where is the justification? There is no justification, but only a contemptible weakness that does not lead heavenward. Does sympathy with his mission, belief in his partial, mutilated doctrine, lure Catholics to the tabernacle? In that instant they sin against light, against the Faith sealed with the Blood of Christ, and "hitting the trail" is but an external manifestation of treason to the pitiful figure that hangs broken and accursed on the naked Rood, for that He was true to principle. Is compromise the motive for attendance? What is such compromise? How does it differ from an admission that one religion is as good as another? How is it distinguished from a denial that Christ taught a definite doctrine, died for a definite doctrine, committed a definite doctrine to an infallible Church which is to teach it pure to all men that they may be saved?

Why do Catholics attend Billy Sunday's service? Because the curse of an irreligious age is upon them. They have been seduced by the bewitchery of folly, their faith is weak, their wills weaker, their eyes are not on the mountain, which is Christ.

There is need of men both in high places and in low places to cry the message of God fearlessly into their ears, salvation through faithfulness to the truths that Our Lord taught. There is too much compromise, too much sacrifice of principle, too little of the sturdy spirit of the Master who died that we might live by the Word which He sanctified in His Blood.

Men and women whose forbears were witnesses to the Faith flirt with error, forgetful that heresy is a hideous crime by which the sacred Body of Christ is rent limb from limb. The ancestors of these folk threw all their earthly goods into the face of the devil, were driven from their homes like leprous things and worshiped God, in spirit and truth, under hedges or in caves. But their descendants? What do they care for their most precious heritage? What does the Faith signify to them? They send their children to fashionable, Protestant schools and colleges with the sad result that the youth learn to blush for their simple, God-fearing grandsires, to apologize for their religion, to appear before a minister for marriage, to petition a divorce court for legal dissolution of a bond which, before God never existed. History repeats itself. The great-grandchildren of many of our Catholics will be Protestants or agnostics or infidels, every one of them.

The writing is on the wall, it can be interpreted by the history of the descendants of Dominick Lynch and Mathew Carey and a hundred and one others. He who runs may read.

And all because of compromise, all because of the spirit which prompts Catholics to sit at the feet of a preacher and either act a lie or sin against faith. The whip of God is needed and it will come, leaping angrily from our backs, and then nor wealth nor title nor social position, nor aught else that is dross will avail us, but only repentance and courage in God's service.

Luther and Social Life

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

"UNFORTUNATELY the facts can be stated very briefly," says Adolf Harnack speaking of the social work of the Reformation period. "Nothing of any consequence was accomplished. What is more, Catholics are right in holding that not we, but they experienced a revival of charity in the sixteenth century, and that within the province of Lutherdom conditions had soon grown worse than they were before in regard to social provisions." ("Reden und Aufsätze.")

The truth of these words cannot be questioned by anyone who has had direct recourse to the authentic documents of the time. They are fully borne out by the testimony of Luther himself as well as that of his contemporaries when he describes the social and moral deterioration that followed upon his doctrine. In his despair he even went so far as to exclaim: "If God had not closed my eyes and if I had foreseen these scandals, I would never have begun to teach the Gospel" (Walch, Ed., Vol. VI, p. 920.). The cities that received him with open arms became a new "Sodom and Gomorrah," and he marveled that the gates and windows of hell were not opened to "snow or rain down devils." As early as 1529 he proclaimed that social and moral conditions had become seven times worse than they were under the Papacy.

> For after we have learned the Evangel we steal, lie, deceive, practise gluttony and drunkenness and every kind of vice. Now that one devil has been driven out, seven others, worse than the former, have entered into us, as we can see in princes, lords, nobles, burghers and peasants. So they act, and so they live, without any fear, regardless of God and threats." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XXXVI, p. 411.)

No class of society, therefore, was excluded from the general deterioration, and all the leading cities that accepted Luther's doctrine fell, according to his own testimony, into the same deplorable state of complete social and moral disorder. His favorite Wittenberg is described by him in his letter to Justus Jonas, June 18, 1543, as "a plaything of the devil," the students "have been ruined by fallen women" and "half the town is going to destruction through adultery, usury, thievery and deceit." Neither the authorities nor any of the citizens are in the least concerned about these abominations, since "All laugh at them, are parties to them and go and do the same." ("M. Luthers Briefe," De Wette Ed. Vol. V, p. 615.) The brazenness and corruption of the girlhood of the town, as pictured in his letter to the Elector, January 22, 1544, beggars description. It leaves the reader under the impression that the whole city had been turned into a cesspool of impurity and lasciviousness, where women vied with men in open and shameless immorality. (Ibid., p. 615.) Ever since the New Evangel was preached there, he is obliged to confess, "Things have steadily grown worse." He fears that at the end he must hear that "They have never been worse than now." (Ibid., VI, p. 302.)

Lutheran apologists seek at times to excuse these abominations by dwelling upon what they consider the social and moral degeneracy of the Papacy; but Luther's own words are an absolute refutation to all such explanations, since he continually insists, in countless passages that the very worst conditions under the Papacy were as nothing compared with the indifference, laxity and vice that followed where his doctrine had been preached. Those who are specially accused by him of such conduct are not the men and women who remained faithful to the Church of the preceding fifteen centuries, but those who accepted his own doctrines. Thus he states very explicitly: "The good receive the law [i. e. abide in Catholicism] and the wicked receive the Gospel [i. e. Luther's New Evangel]." ("Analecta Lutherana et Melanchthonia," p. 402.)

Everyone admits the many evils of the time immediately preceding Luther's preaching. They called for a true reformer, in the spirit of Christ, such as St. Francis had been in his day. In place, however, of seeking to reform the morals of the men who were unfaithful to the teachings of their Church, Luther sought to reform the doctrine of the Church itself, which Christ declared could never err, since He had promised it His abiding presence even to the consummation of the world, and had given it the assurance that the gates of hell should never prevail against it. Either Luther was wrong in seeking to correct the doctrine, which Christ proclaimed would never need correction, or the words of Christ were false. It is a dilemma from which there is no escape, and which should suffice to bring back into the one true Fold all the souls that still believe in Christianity.

No less unhappy were Luther's economic reforms. The poor had previously been bountifully provided for by the monasteries and the liberality of the Faithful, as well as through the channel of well-regulated civic organizations which had already developed in Catholic cities at this early period of the economic transition. City and church authorities cooperated in a thoroughly scientific way. But the pillage of monasteries and foundations, and the introduction of the New Evangel at once destroyed the flourishing work of charity. Luther hoped that the money taken with his approval might, as he expressly states, be spent in propagating his new religion, and the superfluities devoted to governmental and charitable purposes. Needless to say, his hope was vain. The princes and nobles had joined his revolt for booty and license and the ampler power which, by making them the sole spiritual rulers, it gave them over their subjects. They were by no means minded to bestow upon the poor the riches which Luther had authorized them to gather into their treasuries. The citizens were therefore urged to begin anew to offer contributions, but his ideal system of relief, introduced into Leisnig, proved to be an utter failure, as Luther bitterly admitted. Your true "reformer" has always liked to line his own pockets.

The contrast between the social conditions under the Papacy and those that arose under the New Evangel were indeed so great and appalling that Luther was repeatedly forced to advert to them:

> If we did not have the goods bestowed by our forefathers in mild alms and foundations, the Gospel [Luther's new Evangel] would long ago have been extinct because of the burghers in the cities and the nobles and peasants upon the land. Not a single poor preacher would have food or drink; since we do not wish to do anything but take and rob by force what others have given and founded for this purpose [i. e. for charity and religion in Catholic times]. (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XLIII, p. 164.)

The manner in which lords and public officials gorged themselves with the goods of the Church was "eating away the substance of beggars, guests and the poor." To the latter the wealth of the Church had always been open. "Wo, wo to you," he cried, "peasants, burghers and nobles, who wrest, scrape and scratch together everything for yourselves, and yet claim that you are thoroughly evangelical!" (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XLIV., p. 356.) And so too they were, according to Luther's own doctrine, however much he might protest against them, and however powerful, and at times even beautiful, his exhortations to virtue and charity might be.

His first anti-social teaching is that concerning good works. Even though performed with a supernatural motive, he claimed, they were not meritorious for Heaven. "The most tangible consequence of Luther's doctrine of grace," says Feuchtwanger, "which allowed nothing to human merit, was, for the multitude at least, libertinism and irresponsibility." By a deliberate falsehood, it would seem, Luther persisted in attributing to the Catholic Church the most un-Catholic doctrine that "Christ did not die for our sins, but each one should satisfy for them himself." Her plain teaching had been on the contrary that without the merits of Christ mankind could never be saved, but that good works of every sort induce God to apply these merits of Christ to our souls, according to the Divine promise. "This do, and thou shalt live," Our Lord had said in reference to good works. (Luke, x:28.) To these and similar words of Christ Luther opposed his own destructive doctrine, which he thus briefly expresses:

> Those pious souls who do good to gain the Kingdom of Heaven, not only will never succeed, but they must even be reckoned among the impious; and it is more important to guard them against good works than against sin. (Wittenberg Ed., Vol. VI, p. 160.)

The choice, therefore, between Luther and Christ, is open for all. We cannot follow both.

The second anti-social doctrine of Luther is his teaching regarding sin. "There is no longer any sin in the world except unbelief," is his dogmatic assertion. The stench of all other sins committed by the Faithful passes unnoticed by God because of their faith. The exact wording of the passage itself (Erlangen Ed., Vol. IV., 2, p. 131) cannot be quoted here owing to its indecency. If therefore on the one hand he inveighed against sin, on the other he thus removes from it all terror:

> You see how rich the Christian is [i. e. the follower of Luther], since even if he wished it he could not lose his salvation, no matter how many sins he might commit, provided he will believe. No sin can bring about his damnation except unbelief alone. All else is swept away by his faith the moment it returns or clings to the Divine promises made to the baptized." (Weimar Ed., Vol. VI, p. 529.)

This is comfortable doctrine, but is of no avail to restrain the passions of men. Luther's counsel for those who are troubled with doubts about the truth of his new religion and with similar temptations is to indulge in sensuality, in thoughts "of a beautiful girl, of money-making, of drink, or of some other vivid emotion." ("Colloq." Ed. Bindseil, Vol. II., p. 299.) In his letter to Melanchthon, August 1, 1521, he wrote:

> God does not save those who are mere imaginary sinners: Be a sinner and sin boldly, but believe more boldly. . . . It is sufficient that through the riches of the glory of God we have known the Lamb which taketh away the sins of the world. Sin will not tear us away from this even though in a single day we commit fornication and murder a thousand and a thousand times. . . . Pray boldly, for you are a very bold sinner. ("Briefwechsel," Vol. III, p. 208.)

Explain such passages as we may, they cannot be excused. We have quoted enough of Luther's language to show how perverse his teachings were; but there is another phase of his New Evangel more ruinous perhaps than all these.

The third anti-social doctrine in Luther is that of "the slave will." According to this teaching, man is not responsible for either his good or his evil actions. Here as elsewhere Luther's practice contradicts his doctrine, for why preach at all if men are of necessity compelled to sin or to be virtuous? But Luther's hearers were more consistent than he, and many of them did not fail to act upon the logical conclusions to which his dreadful doctrines led. No teaching is more essential to Lutheranism, as propounded by him, than that of the slave will. God and the devil, he tells us, in his most characteristic passage, are struggling with one another for the human soul. When God is in possession it is not possible for us to will anything except what is good, but when the devil has gained the upperhand we can will only what is evil. Thus he paints the awful and blasphemous picture, which represents neither more nor less than the ancient pagan dualism:

> When the stronger comes upon us and makes us his prey, in wresting us from our former ruler, we become his servants and prisoners in such a way that we wish and gladly do whatever he wills. Thus the human will stands like a steed between the two. If God mounts into the saddle, man wills and goes according to God's will, as the Psalm has it: "I am become as a beast before thee: and I am always with thee." If however the devil leaps into the saddle, man wills and goes as the devil wills. It is not in his power to run to one of the two riders and offer his service to him; but the riders themselves struggle with one another for possession of the animal. ("De Servo Arbitrio," Weimar Ed., Vol. XVIII, p. 635.)

If virtue or vice do not depend upon human agents, and if human beings, as Luther teaches, are predestined to hell or heaven independently of any will of theirs, why seek to be good at all? Why not follow the way taken by Luther's practical disciples, in all the cities where his Evangel was accepted, who after hearing his teaching went and gave themselves over to the gratification of their passions, regardless of God or neighbor? Why labor to be virtuous if, according to Luther's doctrine, God damns even such as do not in the least deserve it; "immeritos damnat"? (Ibid., p. 730.) It does violence to sane reason, he admits, to say that "Merely according to His good pleasure God forsakes men, hardens and damns them," but his only answer is that "No application of our intellect, no matter how hard we try, can ever save the holiness of God." Reason must simply bow to the inevitable. (Ibid., p. 719.) Such abhorrent doctrines will confirm the sinner in his sins, as Luther clearly foresaw, but he added that it did not matter, since in His proper time the Spirit of God would transform into His children those whom He predestined to save.

Could any teachings be more destructive to social and moral life? Out of his own mouth Luther stands condemned. In vain did he strive to excuse the evil effects of his preaching, when forced to offer a defense, by saying that the morning star was now risen and sin had become more apparent than before. He had too often contradicted this assurance. Lutheranism, as taught by him, hardly outlived his own day; but the Pope, whose death he boasted he would be, is today encompassed by the glory of new triumphs of the Faith, and the center of the greatest social and moral renewal of all things in Christ.

The Justice of Conscription

J. Harding Fisher, S.J.

MOTIVES, many in number, lofty, high-minded, inspiring, have been put before the American people during the past few weeks, for taking part in the war. Defense of honor, rights and country; the spread of beneficent democracy and the extension of the surpassing gift of liberty; the extirpation of militarism with its constant menace to the peace of the world; and the glory of laying down life for one's native land—these and other considerations, mingled unfortunately with inducements more sordid, have been urged on us as reasons for taking up arms and rallying round the flag. They have stimulated recruiting at home and have reminded peoples abroad that the United States is not unmindful of the traditions that cluster round the days when our country was in the making. Our people owe a debt of gratitude to President Wilson for having given permanent and worthy expression to the highest ideals of the land of liberty; and it is confidently expected that these ideals will fire the hearts and strengthen the arms of our soldiers on the field of battle.

Yet, although some scope has been allowed for their free play by the opportunity which has been afforded for volunteering, the Government has wisely chosen to rely, for the formation of its armies, not so much upon the strength of their inspiration as upon the stern duty of obedience. Our forces, by the deliberate choice of the people, manifested through the action of their representatives at Washington, are to be organized not on the principle of free enlistment but on that of compulsory service.

The country, profiting by the disastrous experience of the Allies, has determined to insist on universal service. The whole nation in one way or another is to be laid under contribution for the prosecution of the war, and all will be called on to do their share in carrying it on to a successful completion. Happily there has been shown in every quarter a marked and gratifying disposition to second the Government's plans. Few of the resources of the country, industrial and agricultural, will be wholly free from governmental control, and most of the activities of the people will be subject to the supervision of the Chief Executive. The extent of that control and supervision has not yet been finally determined, it is still waiting on the decision of Congress, but the general outline is falling into shape and only the details remain to be worked out.

Haphazard methods, it would appear, are to have very little sway in our conduct of the conflict; and it is not unlikely that selective conscription will eventually have a very wide application, especially in our industrial preparations. Already it is showing its efficiency in the formation of our armies. Military service, except in the case of the 70,000, more or less, vacancies in the regular army and the militia, is not to be left to individual choice and initiative but is to be regulated by selective draft. Irrespective of personal inclination and preference, those who are chosen from the registration list will be forced, unless they are officially declared exempt, to join the ranks and to take their part in the fighting. The calmness and grim determination which characterize our preparations, although they involve some delay and are not calculated to arouse great enthusiasm, are making for surprising effectiveness, and lend great weight to the assurance given a few days ago by General Pershing to the people of Paris that America may be certainly counted on to do her full share in the colossal struggle that is now at hand.

It cannot be denied that the law which has legalized conscription has dampened the glow of personal enthusiasm; but what has been a loss of sentimental satisfaction to the heart of the individual has been a great gain in strengthening the heart of the nation. Moreover it has left the essence of patriotism untouched; for this consists in marching to the defense of the country, and it is purely accidental whether this be done in response to a free appeal or to a strict command.

The spirit of loyalty with which millions of our young men have registered indicates very clearly that there is little likelihood of a repetition of the anti-draft riots which took place in the Civil War and were aimed at resisting conscription. The few attempts at such treasonable agitation have been promptly dealt with by the authorities, and the revolutionary speeches which have advocated such resistance have met with universal disapproval. Throughout the land there is an overwhelming recognition of the justice of the cause to which we are committed; and over and beyond this, the nation as a whole is convinced of the right of the Government to command the service of its citizens in any sphere of just activity it may deem necessary and in particular to draft its citizens for service in the army.

Catholics, one and all, are persuaded that they owe unflinching obedience to the commands of the Government. Others, like the contractualists and the evolutionists, who have built their theories of the State on false foundations, may find difficulty in obedience except as a means of avoiding punishment; but the Church, which finds in the legitimate laws of a country the expression of the voice of God, is quite clear as to the fact that disobedience to the State involves sin against God.

Arguing from the standpoint of common-sense and reason, the Church holds that all authority is from God. The social nature of man, it teaches, impels him by a spontaneous impulse of his being, which is only another way of saying by the ordination of God which we call the natural law, to live in society, for it is only in society that he can attain in a fitting way the end and perfection for which he was created. Society therefore is a Divine ordinance, and as such has from God all the requisites postulated for its stable existence. Now, stable society is inconceivable without authority. It follows as an inevitable consequence that God has given to society civil authority, and, as a consequence, has enjoined on the members of society obedience to legitimate rulers in all that is included within their proper jurisdiction, which means that disobedience to them is nothing less than disobedience to Him.

St. Paul expresses this truth in a number of places, for instance when he says to the Ephesians, "Servants, be obedient to them that are your lords according to the flesh . . . Not serving to the eye, as it were pleasing men, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart, with a good will serving, as to the Lord and not to men." (Eph. VI: 5, sq.) The same doctrine is inculcated in his letter to the Romans, whom he addresses as follows: "Let every soul be subject to higher powers: for there is no power but from God; and those that are, are ordained of God. Therefore he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. And they that resist purchase to themselves damnation." (Rom. XIII: 1, 2.)

Conscription is now a law of the land, it is clearly not unconstitutional, and it is clearly not opposed to the law of God. Some men may still think it unwise or inopportune, but they are not justified in resisting it on either of these grounds. Those on whom they have conferred the right to legislate for them have enacted it, and once it received the signature of the President it became binding on the conscience of every citizen of the United States. No one can escape the obligation of submitting to its operation by appealing to his own private judgment. An appeal to be valid must be made to a higher law than the State, for the law of the State is the highest merely human authority on earth. Granted therefore that war in itself is not illicit, that the part of the United States in the present war is not evidently unjust, and that compulsory military service does not conflict with the inalienable rights of man, and all these must be granted, it follows that Congress has a right to enact conscription, that the President has authority to enforce it, that every citizen is under an obligation in conscience to submit to it.

"God the Invisible King"

THOMAS F. WOODLOCK

ON the last page but one of "Mr. Britling Sees It Through" Mr. Wells announced in plain terms to the world that he had found "God" and would shortly tell about it. That was only a year or so ago. Now we have his confession of faith presented by him in propria persona under the title "God the Invisible King." As a phenomenon and a portent of the times his book demands attention.

Mr. Wells would, without doubt, himself be the first to admit that he has no particular competence in the domain of scholarship and, if pressed, he would probably plead, with perfect truth, that he has been far too busy writing books and articles, for thirty years or more, to have had time to acquaint himself with the fundamentals of the matter of which his latest book treats. If "God the Invisible King" were a system of religion invented by the author himself there would be no occasion for anyone to expend much time upon it. But Mr. Wells is not merely a sincere reporter of things seen and heard, he is also an uncommonly clever one and he himself expressly notifies us that the creed which he presents is one which he has found and not made. He further points out that his own profession of faith in it is of quite secondary importance. The important thing is that he finds people around him professing this creed and that he has only performed the office of "scribe to the spirit of my generation." Allowing for the fact that it is apparently impossible for Mr. Wells wholly to refrain from philosophizing on his own account and allowing also for the fact that apparently he has no acquaintance with metaphysics, a deficiency which causes him at times to surround his statements with an impenetrable fog, his description of his functions is seemingly correct. What then is the "new religion" that he has found?

The central article in the new creed is belief in a "personal God" who is finite in that He had a beginning in time, who is limited because He is a "person" (!) who is imperfect, changes, has "moods and aspects," is in conflict, as we are, with forces that He does not control, who "is the best of all of us" and yet is a "Being in Himself" and who is not the maker of the universe nor the author of "life." The "new religion" has no theory of cosmogony, for it "does not reach behind the appearances of space and time" and it falls back upon the "unknowable Absolute" of Spencer for the origin of things, about which neither the new "God" nor man knows anything. Mr. Wells speaks of this "unknowable Absolute" as a "Veiled Being" from which "proceeds" the "Life Force"—in which one recognizes our old friend the élan vital of Bergson—in some "manner altogether inconceivable." To what extent the Wellsian "God" is transcendent and to what extent immanent is uncertain. There is a succession of sentences on this subject (pages 61-63), from which the present writer cheerfully admits that he can extract no definite meaning. The thick haze in which the matter is shrouded suggests that the "new theology" made famous a few years ago by the Rev. R. J. Campbell has at some time or other engaged for a few moments the attention of Mr. Wells.

Now this "God" is known not by reason and not by revelation but by "experience," according to the Jamesian acceptation of the word. Mr. Wells is a devoted disciple of James. The process of conversion is sudden.

> This cardinal experience is an undoubting immediate sense of God. It is the attainment of an absolute certainty that one is not alone in oneself. It is as if one were touched at every point by a being akin to oneself, sympathetic beyond measure, wise, steadfast and pure in aim (p. 23).

After we are converted "Our lives are changed. God is with us and there is no more doubt of God." (Ibid.) Then there remains only "to learn His purpose with us and to live our lives with Him" (p. 24).

A good half of Mr. Wells's book is devoted to a concept of the world as the "Kingdom of God."

> In our philosophy, he says, there are no human things that are God's and others that are Cæsar's. Those of the new thought cannot render unto God the things that are God's and to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. Whatever claims Cæsar may make to rule men's lives and direct their destinies outside the will of God is a usurpation. The new conceptions do not tolerate either kings or aristocracies or democracies. Its implicit command to all its adherents is to make plain the way to the world theocracy (pp. 96, 97).

This part of the discussion is the least important part of Mr. Wells's work, for it is more evidently Mr. Wells's own invention and much of it is reminiscent of "New Worlds for Old." We may absolve ourselves from the duty of studying it.

A "personal God" whose will is to be the supreme norm of the human mind is enough to make one rub one's eyes and wonder! It is true that the Wellsian "God" is a very anthropomorphic concept, little more, indeed, than a rather super-super-man. Nevertheless out of a jumble of William James, Herbert Spencer, Bergson and, no doubt many other "minor prophets" there emerges something which is at least in violent conflict with the materialistic philosophy of the times and which gives at least the semblance of food to satisfy the religious hunger of men's souls. It is not hard to see whence the "new religion" springs. The great mystery of evil has always stung the unphilosophical mind and usually driven it to one or other extreme, either denial of God or denial of evil, just as the influence of a great calamity has always operated to sharpen the desire of men for a God whom they could trust and love and to whom they could turn for help. The "new religion" seeks a compromise and finds it in a "God" who is not omnipotent, and who must fight and struggle, as do men, against blind forces that He cannot fully master. It is truly a pathetic compromise. But, even in the face of Mr. Wells's absurdities, illogicalities and whimsies presented as they are in a fashion most dogmatic, and, it must be said, frequently in shockingly bad taste, it is impossible not to be tolerant and even sympathetic toward the spirit of the book. It is this spirit that is the portent of the times, and it may be welcomed as perhaps the beginning of a movement toward the truth—blind, groping and feeble as it is and devoid of logical coherence. Though this is not much to be grateful for, it is something, and anything is better than the hopeless negation of the drab Victorian days.

The Dignity of Submission

FRANCIS J. MCNIFF, S.J.

STERN necessity has made the soldier a very familiar sight these days. And you may have observed that he never passes by quite unnoticed. His goings and comings are not rated like the incidental transits of the mere civilian. Rather they are taken to be something like an event which one should not ignore, but should recognize by an admiring gaze, a complimentary word, or a salute. The truer, if a body of troops goes marching by. They are "our boys," and it is a brave sight to watch them swinging down the street, every movement instinct with youthful vigor and manliness. They are our protectors, strong and brave, trained to the minute, and ready to do their "bit" unflinchingly for God and country. But who, as he watches the passing of the troops, with all their arms and accouterments, thinks of them as the slayers of our enemies? We put that thought away. We could not admire our soldiers under that horrible formality, because we cannot forget that our enemies are our fellow-men with hopes and fears and home and country, even as we have. The unjust aggressor must pay the penalty; yet we put away the thought that our soldiers represent the lawful exactors of punishment for wrong committed, and, explicitly, at least, we admire them and honor them for other reasons.

In the end, we shall find that we mostly admire and honor the soldier, because we see in him the hero of duty. He is the man of unquestioning obedience to right authority. He has learned to forget himself, and to sacrifice his individual interests, his likes and dislikes, the better to serve the common good. Now, without discipline there can be no effective arm of defense, and discipline means obedience.

Parents may not always take kindly to their sons' enlistment in the service. But they never fail to be proud of the improvement made in their boys by a few months of training. The poise of mind and body has become so much finer. The lad no longer slouches, but walks like a man who has learned his worth, who knows he has an honorable place in life, and a high duty to fulfil. It is not a matter of small conceit, either. The young man may feel a little vain because he is admired, but that is a very venial failing, and wears off with the newness of his uniform. Small conceit cannot explain the change. But the fact that he has learned to obey like a man, to take orders respectfully, even eagerly, to seek hard tasks and to perform them with a man's sense of responsibility, to do what he is told, and when he is told, and just how he is told; the realization that his obedience means the defense and honor of all he holds dearest—this it is which has changed him, and gives us the reason why the careless youth has developed, almost suddenly, into a trustworthy man.

In the estimate of sensible people, therefore, due submission and obedience do not connote any such idea as a lowering of man's natural dignity. On the contrary, the dignity of man consists in doing well the business proper to a rational creature. All may not command; else who is to carry out the orders? No organization can persist if there be not superiors with the right of bidding others what must be done; if there be not subjects ready to come when they are called, and go whither they are bidden. Every form of social life calls for subordination and coordination. Indeed, it is daily made clear that only the few can fill capably positions of command, and that the many cannot work out their own destiny and that of the race except by joining their efforts with those whom nature, education and experience have fitted for the higher tasks of planning and executing. Authority is more than the natural bond that holds together every social body. It is further the head which directs the free action of the subject, and aids him in attaining more easily and securely the ends for which society has been formed. "United we stand," "In union there is strength," "E pluribus unum" are recognized national mottoes. And one of the pleasant paradoxes of nature, at the same time one of her sarcastic thrusts, too, at those who turn their back on her, is that even anarchists cannot get on without copying the forms of the civil organization which they disclaim. They may cry out against presidents, but they never fail to install certain officials, particularly a trustworthy treasurer or two.

A crisis is a great revealer of hearts, and trouble a begetter of sober thought. By the blessing of God, we have been a happy people. Our territory is immense. No land ever held so great a treasure of gold and grain. Prosperity has lured us on, musically enough, and has enriched us from her store of plenty. But, like every siren, she has her price. She did not stint milk and honey, she lulled us into carelessness, and into the dream that prosperity would never fail us. She has made us fancy that, whatever befell other nations, there would be for us no interruption of our pleasant afternoon of peace and material success. Perhaps only the rude shock of war could have roused us from our moral narcosis. But we are beginning to see how we went astray, and what is the cause of our erring. We are beginning to realize, as an eminent professor has said, that:

> We are a loose-minded and a loose-mannered people. Money-making and fads . . . are the only things we take seriously. I share the conviction that this deplorable state of mind and behavior is in no small measure the consequence of our fatuous custom of letting our young people "go on the loose," instead of holding them to tasks, duty, discipline and achievement.

We are beginning to see that there is no dignity in treason, and no promise of good in those who oppose lawful authority. We are beginning to value the worth of obedience and loyal submission. We are beginning to be convinced that only the law-abiding man is the good citizen, and that the welfare of the country is in the hands of those who reverence our lawful governors. We are beginning to call things by their proper names, and to distinguish liberty from license. The conviction is growing with us that anarchy in all its forms is but a virulent kind of iconoclasm whose principle is first to smash something that sane men revere, and then, if needs be, to trump up a lame excuse for the smashing. Iconoclasm is an acquired taste, and an appetite easily whetted. But then it requires no excellence in the chef to spoil a succulent chop, and a dunce with a bludgeon can ruin a masterpiece.

Since so much of the truth has come home to us, we must go further. Obedience is a virtuous habit. A habit is acquired by the frequent repetition of the same act. Obedience is a habit acquired with difficulty. Withal, nature has made it the foundation from which all true progress uprises. Our boys and girls have incentive enough, Heaven knows, to be self-willed and unruly. We cannot hope that they will be obedient citizens if they have never learned to obey at home. We can hardly expect them to realize the natural necessity and Christian dignity of honoring the law and its representatives if, during their most impressionable years, they have not been schooled in a well-ordered household. If they can do as they please at home, they will argue that they can do as they please anywhere. The home ought to be a seminary of reasonable submission and obedience. Parents are the natural superiors, teachers, and protectors, of their children. Now, what are our parents doing in their homes to make their children realize daily, by word and example, the great truth that St. Paul urged on the Christians of Rome? "Let every soul be subject to higher powers; for there is no power but from God; and those that are ordained of God. Therefore he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God . . . Render therefore to all men their dues. Tribute to whom tribute is due; custom, to whom custom; fear, to whom fear; honor, to whom honor."

William Redmond, Statesman and Soldier

JOSEPH C. WALSH

ONE night, five years ago, William Redmond was recounting episodes in a long career of agitation. One story concerned the raising of money for a candidate who was supposed to be rich, and the critics were more numerous than the subscribers. I asked him "Could you do that now, if it were to be done over again?" "No," said he, "I could not. You have to be young for the kind of fighting we went through." He was then fifty-two, but at the time I remember feeling that, despite the calendar, he would always be young. His enlistment in the army proved it. He felt there was an example to be given, and he followed his impulse just as truly as when he went into an Ulster riding. And it was like him that once in he never turned back.

He had the gift of making friends. Not that he tried to; he took very little pains about that. But he had a way of keeping his flag flying at all times, asking no favors, harboring no enmities. On July 12, 1913, Sir Edward Carson was to have gone to Belfast, but did not. On the afternoon of that day he walked over to the place where "Willie" Redmond was sitting in the smoking room of the Commons, and for the best part of an hour they chatted, mainly over the fortunes of men who were young when they were young. The spectacle was too much for many a stolid English member passing by, and a mystery was suspected. On the day the Home Rule bill got its third reading for the third time, it was quite a sight to see Tory member after Tory member search Redmond out on the terrace and after congratulations whose heartiness lacked nothing in appearance at least, he felt called upon to explain that this, that or the other felt under an obligation to him for having asked a convenient question or made a comment that each would like to have made himself but for the deterrent of social consequences to be apprehended. Such a scene helped to explain the tone he sometimes took with the House, which pretended to be shocked when, as he doubtless knew, it was only embarrassed. "Solitary confinement for wearing a shamrock" was a phrase he flung at the House and kept on flinging at the House until for sheer shame the wrong complained of was undone.

When he first went to Australia the central committee used to get requests for speeches from the Redmond brothers but with a preference expressed "for the one who was a member of Parliament." One day "Willie's" coat was stolen from a restaurant, and against his will he was dragged to court to testify. On the way he read a telegram just received. The lawyer, not above making use of the prejudice which in those days existed, tried to get an admission that he was an itinerant agitator, and on being told he was a member of Parliament said "Since when?" "Since yesterday," was the answer. The cablegram had told him all he knew about it. The first time he was arrested he was going for his morning dip in the surf at Rosslare. "I suppose you can wait till I've had my swim," he said to the police-sergeant. "If you don't swim to Wales," was the response. The last time he was arrested the police took him to Kilmainham earlier in the morning than the jailer thought fitting. There was a long argument between jailer and sergeant until Mr. Redmond, chilled through, went up to the hole in the door and begged not to be kept waiting all day. "And is it you Mister Willie," said the jailer; "why didn't you let me know? Come in then and welcome," And welcome he was, Mrs. Redmond supplementing the best the prison had from the basket of dainties she brought him daily until the farce of imprisonment was ended.

He had a certain pride that was part of his knightly disposition. He never took a penny of party money on any of the trips he made for the service of Ireland, and these trips took him far and lasted long. He sought no one's friendship, but when he was threatened with non-election at a Dublin club he went through with it for the sake of his friends, and won. He used to tell with glee of how almost immediately afterwards, when the atmosphere was still glacial, he drew the winning horse in the club sweepstakes for a great race, and considered himself amply revenged.

Between him and his brother there was the most beautiful relation. "My brother," it sounded like "me brother," was the way he always spoke of the party leader. He did not always agree with his brother, nor adopt opinions because they were his brother's. But on whichever side the decision was taken it was loyally adhered to. His friends in adversity were his friends for life. I know of a case where a working machinist was the man who stood by him in the difficult days of the "Split." Long afterwards it was suggested to him that there might be a delay in starting a meeting until some highly placed people arrived. "I'm well enough with what are here," said he, stepping over beside the machinist.

A singularly self-centered man, because of the intensity of his convictions and the ardor with which he maintained them, his dependence upon Mrs. Redmond was like that of which a French writer speaks when he describes the solicitude of the French mother for her children, above all for her eldest, who is her husband. Mrs. Redmond had no other. He went nowhere without her. Even to the field she followed him as far as she could. She was the judge of his speaking. When she thought he had spoken long enough he would hear her quiet cough and presently would close. Eleven o'clock, in whatever corner of the world they were, was their hour for the rosary. His death was of a piece with the life he chose and the fight he fought, but the hearts of all who loved him go out to her who has made this last great sacrifice for the cause in which together they had made so many.

Organized Discussion of "America"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Let me suggest to members of Catholic societies that a splendid way to keep pace with the swift march of world-events and to maintain the Catholic viewpoint would be the organization of inner circles within their societies, in which groups of thinking laymen would meet every week for intelligent discussion of AMERICA.

An American Masterpiece

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The promise made by AMERICA of a series of articles on American contributions to Christian art suggests the question, How many people are aware that a masterpiece, called "The Light of the World," the work of S. J. Kitson, is to be seen at Dunwoodie Seminary, Yonkers, N. Y.? It is a study of Christ, which embodies the perfection of the Redeemer's manhood and shadows forth the light of His Divinity in a way unsurpassed by any other work on the same subject. And yet it seems to be quite unknown, for it is not given the recognition it deserves.

Systematic Charity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We are constantly hearing remarks like the following: "There are so many calls for contributions for the relief of suffering nations and for various missionary works that one cannot give to all." Quite true. But the question for each one to settle is whether he is contributing to any cause; and, if so, whether he is contributing systematically, regularly, and generously, observing a due proportion between the sum he gives in charity and the amount he wastes on vanities. If ever there was a time when such a reckoning should be made, that time is the present, when destitution is so widespread.

What Ireland May Get

To the Editor of AMERICA:

People on this side of the Atlantic would do well to be cautious in espousing either the Home Rule or the absolute independence theory in reference to the present position of Ireland and England, unless they have been kept unusually well supplied with information from the Emerald Isle itself. With the close censorship on all mail arriving and leaving Ireland, even those in close communication with home and friends can expect little knowledge of the true situation.

In the words of Colonel Harvey, "If you cross-examine the average American at all closely, you will find him an encyclopedia of ignorance on almost everything that is of serious purpose in the Ireland of today." That this is not as it should be, does not make it any the less true and shows us that before taking up any agitation for Ireland, we should first find out what our friends in Ireland do really want. Mr. Shane Leslie in his recent article "What Does Ireland Want?" has made some pertinent remarks which should prove interesting to many Irish-Americans who, from long years of residence away from the Emerald Isle and from much reading of the events centered around Limerick in '98, the famine years, the Act of Union and other deeds perpetrated in those dark ages, have become more anti-British than the dwellers in Ireland themselves. Much thinking on the events connected with the year of grace, 1916, has also made them inclined to a morbid hatred of England despite the fact "That democratic principles have been at work, even in England, for several decades past and that the English people as a whole are not averse to Ireland's attaining what she has so persistently demanded." Mr. Leslie has eloquently stated these demands: "She [Ireland] seeks to possess and enjoy the full colonial independence enjoyed by Canada and of which the principle is assured to the world by the entry of America into the world-war. She cannot ask less, she need not want more [italics inserted], at least in this generation."

These two statements, quoted from those who have no doubt personal knowledge of the case both in Ireland and England, must be true. Although a neutral observer, after reading the events of 1916, may be permitted to doubt whether the democratic principles that have been at work in England have been allowed to spread to Ireland. It may be stated further, that the English people, as a whole, at all times know as little about Ireland as the people of the present time in America, and care much less regarding Ireland. Therefore, it may be supposed that the will and wishes of the English people will influence the settlement of the Irish question as little now as in former times. However, the question deals not with the English people but with the Irish people. Consequently we in America should view the matter from the Irish point of view, if at all.

Mr. Leslie tells us plainly that Ireland wants a position in the Empire similar to that of Canada or Australia, and, regardless of what she wants, that is all she will get. We are thankful for plain speaking even if we may still have a very small doubt as to what Ireland really wants. It is, however, a great gift for the Irish people to be able to confine their wants to what they are able to get. But it would seem a poor aim for a country already rich in history when the neighbor island was still a Roman outpost, to desire to become nothing but a colonial possession of that island. It would indeed seem a pity to us in America, with whom the ideal of independence is part of the very marrow of our bones, to see a country that has sacrificed so much in freedom's cause in every land and clime content to remain a dependency.

Viewing the question without passion or prejudice, and judging from the strides toward improvement made in Ireland from 1782 to 1800, when she enjoyed a certain measure of independence, it would seem to us far better for Ireland to have Home Rule than the present martial law, even though Home Rule brought not one Irishman into the English army instead of releasing "to the standards of the Empire thousands of fighting men" as English advocates of Home Rule contend. This contention is essentially selfish and would not sound particularly pleasant to Irish ears, even if this much-lauded Home Rule gave Ireland a freedom similar to that which Canada now enjoys. The facts, however, are vastly different, as one could very easily see from a careful perusal of the amended Home Rule now on the statute books. Under this act Ireland may not deal with the following matters which come under the jurisdiction of the other colonial governments: (1) Public debt. (2) Trade and commerce (external). (3) Postal service (external). (4) Military and naval service. (5) Navigation, shipping. (6) Quarantine. (7) Coinage, currency. (8) Banking. (9) Naturalization, alienage. (10) Weights and measures. (11) Collecting of taxes, appointments of tax-collectors. (12) Tariffs, bounties. (13) Export tax. (14) Customs on articles not taxed in England. (15) Trade-marks, patents, copyright.

No American will deny that these matters are very near the heart of liberty. In fact Justice Goff stated the matter succintly when he said, "There is not a board of supervisors in any county in the United States that has not greater power than that conferred on Ireland by this Home Rule."

Now that it is known what Ireland wants and what Ireland can get, a copy of the act, as it now stands, would show what Ireland may be about to get. This would be a great help to many who want to remove the stigma of colossal ignorance that is now upon them.

"The O'Connellite View of Ireland"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reply to Father Fay's recent article in AMERICA, I beg to state that mere constitutional means have gained nothing for Ireland during the past 150 years. Grattan and Flood "accomplished something" after they had armed Irish Volunteers, and not till then. Parnell "accomplished something" when he had the Fenians at his back. O'Connell did not win Catholic emancipation by constitutional means. Wellington and Peel, who were at the head of the English Government which conceded it, said they granted emancipation through dread of civil war. It was the Chartist movement in England and the secret societies in Ireland which produced this dread of civil war through which resulted the so-called emancipation. I say so-called emancipation because when emancipation was granted the forty-shilling freeholders were disfranchised and many of them were evicted, being useless as voters to their landlords. The minority, the wealthier Catholics, were emancipated, but the majority of the nation remained in serfdom. O'Connell got good positions for his sons and friends. It was the Clerkenwell explosion and Fenianism, according to Gladstone, which disestablished the Protestant Church in Ireland and gained the first Land act. Ireland has won nothing from England except in so far as she walked on the brink of treason-felony.

"Hospitals and Animal Houses"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A nurse from a Georgia hospital objected in AMERICA, June 9, to calling hospitals not managed by Sisters, "animal houses," and the editor explained that he did not say that all hospitals not conducted by Sisters are animal houses. The nurse worked for years in the Johns Hopkins Hospital, in Baltimore, and she says she found that hospital anything but an animal house. She must have missed something.

I have had much to do with hospitals for the past twenty-eight years in Europe and America, and every one not conducted by Sisters was an animal house, Johns Hopkins included. I have seen a few conducted by Sisters which were not much better, but that is a side-issue.

There is not a non-Catholic hospital staff in the United States which will not murder a baby on "the drop of a hat" to save a mother's life, Johns Hopkins included. See the text-book on "Obstetrics," by the professor of obstetrics in that university hospital. The same is true of New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and other places. There are five medical schools in Philadelphia, and all teach the kill-the-baby doctrine, and practise it.

All our leading non-Catholic obstetricians and gynecologists must do their work in hospitals for the most part, and to a man, they kill unviable infants to save a mother, or merely to relieve symptoms; they mutilate as "a precaution"; they induce abortion in tuberculous women; and so on through the whole litany of horrors. These men not only advocate all this animalism in lectures to students, at medical congresses, and in text-books, but they accuse us Catholic physicians of malpractice when we refuse to imitate them. While our smug hypocrites are spouting from editorial pages, pulpits and hustings on our "civilization," the number of children murdered annually in the United States in these "animal houses" is ten times greater than the number of soldiers killed in three Anglo-German drives.

Most non-Catholic hospitals let priests in to visit the sick, but I know a few that manage to insult every priest that enters, and I have known this to be done by nurses even while the priest was administering the Last Sacraments. This last exhibition was given in Philadelphia at the Methodist Hospital.

Catholics and Civic Interests

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am interested, and honestly so, in the line of argument which Mr. Stephen J. Hannigan, of Brooklyn, N. Y., would use to prove his assertion that the laity of his city are blameless for the conditions at which he hinted in his communication, appearing in your issue of June 2. "Parochial timidity" hints at a cause, which seemingly would challenge proof. Mr. Hannigan expressed a wish for a discussion relative to the alleged habitual non-participation of Catholics in local civic movements, which have for their object the promotion of the general civic welfare. It cannot be denied that the alleged aloofness would result in the serious loss of many precious opportunities, and certainly an honest discussion of reasonable length would be timely, and no doubt, profitable.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The ball set in motion by Frank H. Spearman's paper in a recent Ave Maria, and accelerated by your editorial, has gathered to its periphery several inches of facile comment. Mr. Spearman put his case well: your letter-writers shoot wide of his mark. The latter seem to think that the mixed marriages problem is the greatest question in the world, and that college authorities can settle it by putting dances and five o'clock teas in the curricula. Let us transmit what, to their mind, is the important question, and also, the solution they propose. In doing so, however, let us ask them to consider that the widespread evil of mixed marriage does not find its chief or most numerous offenders among college men and women. These are, I say it confidently, though not with statistics at hand, only as two to ninety-eight. And, alas, for that constant two. Secondly, let them consider that the convent-college dance and five o'clock tea are not the preventive panacea. I do not apply the old adage here, Ab uno disce omnes; but I cannot refrain from noting that a college which I know, and which had a rather full program of social inter-meets with a nearby convent school, saw more of its "old boys" go into mixed marriages than another school, which I know well, too, in which the conventuals saw the ball games, dramatic performances and musicales a longe. Let me add, sotto voce, that a little correspondence was managed between a Romeo and a Juliet by means of the chaplain's hat. Romeo inserted his note under the band of the said hat, and politely handed it to the Father; and Juliet, politely taking the hat at the convent portal, inserted a note of her own in answer to one that came the previous morning. Romeo is a lawyer with a large Catholic family in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, and Juliet is a Sister of Charity in you'll-never-guess-where.

And now, having transmitted the problem and the imagined solution, let us note a consideration which suggests itself on reading the writers on this topic. The interests of the world find ready speakers, but other-worldliness too often exhibits silent advocates; they have the simplicity of the dove, but not the cunning of the serpent. To speak with greater directness, your correspondents, mothers among them, have pleaded, "Let them get acquainted," so that the social advancement of their young sons and daughters may be assured. Let college socials be more efficient to that effect. Yet other mothers are silent upon the ambition which is a daily prayer in their hearts, namely, to see at least one of their children serve God at the altar or in the convent cloister, school or hospital. Mothers with this high hope are as ninety-eight to two of the others. Still the two hold the floor. Perhaps the ninety-eight are solicitous for the maintainence of collegiate conditions which will safeguard a most important period of life, the elective years of vocation. They invite, to be sure, a due amount of social entertainment for their sons and daughters, but the high hope and the earnest prayer remain. They are Catholic; they yearn to say with Simeon and Anna their Nunc dimittis in a happy hour; or with the mother in Father Shealy's powerful ballad:

"Enough, enough, to speak my name,
When Christ is in your hand."

It is necessary to pause here to forestall inferences that will erroneously be drawn from the foregoing. I do not argue on the point of more or less social activities in school circles. I leave that to the authorities, who legislate in their spheres, who regulate the social hours of their students not on a priori grounds, nor upon European precedents, nor upon the whims of the hour, but upon a knowledge of human nature in American environment, upon the prime purposes for which an educational institution stands, upon the files of correspondence which parents send to the deans and presidents in the interests of their sons; and upon a score of other reasons better than I can advance. No, not even in the face of the Divine desire of the Church and the sacred hope of parents to see the altar and the cloister remembered, do I offer a pro or con upon the question of enlargement or curtailment of collegiate sociabilities. I know full well that great vocations in religion are possible even in pagan environment, that if Julian the Apostate fell from Christianity after going to the University of Athens, the great Basil, with an Athenian diploma, became one of the Fathers of the Church. Even a few graduates of Harvard have become priests, have become Jesuits. And I know, too, that there are Catholic colleges where religious vocations flourish in the midst of ample opportunities for "getting acquainted." Let me instance Boston College, with the sanction, I hope, of its President and Dean. Boston College, whose school of arts, together with its high school, numbers nearly two thousand students, alert in all the excellences of academic performances, and in the forefront of athletics, continually shows a round of social hours, brilliant and distinguished in every way, class festivities, Philomathea dances and alumni gatherings. Yet Boston College, thank God, sends more candidates, in proportion to its size, to the Church, including both the secular and the religious priesthood, than any other college in the country, omitting, of course, the little seminaries.

Returning, then, to your correspondents, let me say, not with scorn but with pity, that the interest they display in safeguarding the Sacrament of Matrimony is Catholic indeed, but over against their two voices there are ninety-eight just as zealous, though not in public print, in their hope that a ward or child of theirs may hearken to the Voice, "If thou wilt be perfect, go sell what thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow Me." They are Catholic, who will gainsay it? And blessed is the home and the college which fosters opportunities for hearkening to the call of that Voice. And in such an environment even the Sacrament of Matrimony has assuring safeguards.

Finally, and I hope the two will not deem this ironical, the tone of their letters seems to hint that educational institutions are primarily marriage-bureaus; the following verse of a very undignified ballad may be chanted over their darling, if he casts his books and athletics aside, and pines too much for salons and the Fairy Queen, whom Edmund Spenser did not write about:

He doesn't drink, he doesn't smoke,
And a game of cards he never plays,
And once or twice he took advice
From the great Y. M. C. A.'s.
He never yet has made a bet,
For gambling is a crime;
But, O, say, Mister,
He falls for the ladies every time.

Side-Lights on Socialist Philosophy

A SOCIALIST is a man with one mad passion—himself. For that reason, his practical philosophy changes with his moods and the advantages to be derived by a shift from one doctrine to another. Professionally the brethren hate war, practically it is quite otherwise, always of course with an eye to personal aggrandizement. In New York where their skins are safe from enemy scars, they clamor against registration, conscription and the militaristic Government; in Germany where French and English bayonets seem likely to threaten their comfort, they throw their political cap high in air, in exultation over the War Lord and all his works and pomps; in Mexico where loot is plentiful, they shoulder guns with joy, shoot at God and women and children and bring down civilization.

Now they are for war, now against it, but no one will ever accuse them of failing to take advantage of any conflict, however despicable. Guns may be capitalistic, but blood is spilled for Socialism only.

The latest illustration of this contention is thus summarized in a recent "News Bulletin" of the Wall Street Journal:

TRYING TO LA FOLLETTIZE RUSSIA

WASHINGTON.—Lincoln Steffens, who recently wrote the major part of the confiscatory Constitution of Mexico, is now in Russia, making an effort to render similar service to the new Government there. Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin, was largely responsible for Steffens' trip to Russia. While La Follette has not been making much headway with his theories in the United States, he is trying to plant the germs of his idea in the countries torn by revolution. He and Lincoln Steffens hold sympathetic views. Charles R. Crane went to Russia at the same time as Lincoln Steffens, and Crane, also on the ground, was appointed a member of the Russian Commission headed by Elihu Root. It will be remembered that Crane in the 1912 pre-convention campaign helped to finance both La Follette and Wilson, and when asked why he played two candidates in rival parties, he indicated that he wanted to back a radical for each fight. If Steffens, himself a Socialist, is able to help the Socialists of Russia, he will do so. If the Socialists should get into power, he will probably be authorized to write the Russian Constitution, and if he plays true to form it will be an exceedingly radical doctrine, providing for the dissipation of capital and the removal of secure foundations from under foreign enterprises in Russia.

Poor Russia, if it is Steffenized, its last fate will be worse than the first: a new barbarism, all the more disgusting because it comes forth from the soul of a group of undisciplined doctrinaires, will convert the land into a valley of fog and dripping bones, where God will be a jest and woman, the prize of the strongest male animal!

Diplomas and Programs

THESE are the rare June days, when with hopeful hearts and ribboned diplomas, our graduates are going forth to conquer the world. God bless the young, and in particular these girls and boys, the flower of our flock. "The world looks bright to inexperienced eyes"; but may no depression of the hope that now beats high, ever bring with it a shattering of the ideals that in June seem so alluring and easy of attainment.

Our young people, as a rule, are anxious not only to succeed in the temporal affairs of life, but to engage in the work of spreading the Kingdom of God upon earth. But alas! what encouragement is offered them by us, their disillusioned elders? Only too often we damp their zeal by a shrug of the shoulders, a permission grudgingly conceded, a deadening, "Go ahead and try it. You probably won't succeed, but I don't think you will do much harm." In the face of this discouragement, the brightest optimism will soon be dulled unless it has been based upon some definite program of action.

The graduating class of Our Lady of Providence Academy, Chicago, has guarded against a common source of failure by providing a modest and thoroughly practicable plan of campaign. The class has formed itself "into an association for the express purpose of doing social work and of advancing the cause of the Catholic press." Individually, the members pledge themselves to visit the poor or to teach catechism for one hour a week, to subscribe for at least one Catholic magazine and newspaper, and to send papers, when read, to some Catholic social center. Finally, a committee will be appointed "to secure the introduction of Catholic periodicals and newspapers into the public libraries."

With characteristic wisdom, these young damsels of Chicago have avoided the error of trying to do too much. They do not expect to convert the world, but that their zealous labors will make their part of the world a great deal better for the fact that they have lived in it, we do not doubt. May they find many imitators.

"Child Life as Usual"

IN vetoing the Brown bill Governor Whitman did much to turn the tide of war-hysteria. As the Governor says, no reflection is cast upon the patriotism of Senator Brown by this executive action. But the Senator's mistaken zeal would almost certainly have broken down the legislative protection of women and children, won by many years of hard fighting. His plan was, essentially, an emergency measure proposed in a time when an emergency neither exists nor seems even probable.

It is to be hoped that the example of New York's Governor will have many followers. Now that the danger of conscripting children has been averted, the ordinary citizen may well look back and wonder how a scheme of such pernicious wastefulness was able to win so many advocates. The farmers did not want the children, nor did the manufacturers. School authorities, experts in child-culture, protested the measure, and the clergy were quick to point out the manifold moral dangers which the young workers could scarcely avoid. Yet, despite the plain facts urged by delegations representing these classes, the bill was adopted by both branches of the legislature. Happily, the arguments lost on these Solons availed with the Governor.

It will be time enough to think of calling the children to the fields and factories after every slacker has been put to digging ditches, and every contributor to non-productive luxury has been taught to shoulder a gun. At any time, but particularly during the cramped circumstances of war, the spectacle of children at hard labor, while a small army of servants minister to the ease of a parasitic millionaire, is an anomaly not to be tolerated in a democracy.

The country's wisest war-policy will insure that the children be kept under the normal influences of home, church, and school. To close these institutions or to lessen their power, simply "because of the war" is a short-sighted patriotism. Better far to prepare the child of today to meet and overcome the difficulties of tomorrow than to set his weak and futile fingers at work in a munition factory.

Painted Full of Tongues

ON a July dawn last year, a huge quantity of dynamite and shells, stored near Jersey City, suddenly exploded. In the immediate locality the effects of the shock were considerable. Most New Yorkers, however, did not know of the accident until they saw the headlines of the Sunday-morning extras. But across the ocean the affair expanded to huge proportions. An English journal announced that a large part of the city had been reduced to ashes by the Germans. A yet more enterprising moving-picture manager displayed on the screen what purported to be a picture of the ruins of the Woolworth Building. Anxious New Yorkers abroad wondered if ever again they would look upon their familiar domiciles. Rumor, painted full of tongues, had made an entrance, and for the moment occupied the center of the stage.

During the last few weeks Rumor has been stalking in our midst with a marvelous tale of a great defeat in the North Sea. Sixty American and English battleships had been sunk, said Rumor, and on meeting a more credulous hearer, immediately doubled the number. The New York hospitals, Rumor continued, were crowded with wounded sailors who had been rushed for treatment three thousand miles across a sea choked with corpses. Rumor's authority was an old woman who had been allowed to visit her son in a Brooklyn hospital, or a senile surgeon who shook his head, as one who might reveal volumes, were his lips unsealed.

The inherent silliness of these reports should have been their best refutation. But they were not, and Secretary Daniels has issued a formal denial. "No such engagement has taken place," writes the Secretary. "The American fleet has not been in action. No ship has been lost. There are no wounded sailors or marines in any hospital. . . . If disaster comes, no effort will be made to minimize it."

This plain statement is the hook that pulls Rumor off the stage. Meanwhile the Secretary's reference to "this campaign of rumor that is so plainly the product of disloyalty" may be pondered by some with profit. Rumors of this kind are not only disloyal, but the height of cruelty to those fathers and mothers who have bravely given their sons to the service of our common country.

The Juvenile Bench

CHICAGO'S CHIEF OF POLICE has a grievance. His city is not so free from crime as it might be, and the Chief thinks that he knows the reason. He admits that law is not an absolute deterrent. To his purblind vision, however, to allow the prospective criminal to believe that he can violate the law with impunity is even a poorer way of lessening crime. "The law-abiding community is the community that fears the unyielding enforcement of every law. Until the law is enforced and the 'sob stuff' eliminated, we will have plenty of trouble."

Two principal sources of "trouble" are indicated by this guardian of the municipal peace, the first of which is the juvenile court, conducted on the theory that every youthful culprit is a little angel, temporarily under a cloud raised by calumny. As an example, the Chief cites a Chicago youth, sixteen years old, haled before the court on a charge of larceny. After hearing the testimony of fourteen witnesses who positively identified the boy, the Solomon on the bench decreed: "Impossible! a mere child could not have done these things!" If this young Fagin does not end on the gallows, it will be no fault of the judge who sent him back to the streets, a hero who had defied the law, and gained much glory thereby.

The juvenile court is one of the most promising agents at the community's disposal in reconstructing the boy or girl who has "gone wrong." The most direct way of ending its usefulness is to put a "sob sister" on the bench, or to confine the selection of probation officers to members of this lachrymose sorority. At least ninety per cent of our juvenile courts justify their existence by their results; appointments to the bench should be made with the utmost care, if this standard is to be maintained, and the court's usefulness extended. It is exceedingly difficult to build up any social reconstructive factor, but very easy to tear it down. The best agent of destruction is a large, sappy person, noted for ready emotions and an atrophied intellect.

The True American

NOT long ago a college-bred descendant of the Puritans was arrested in New York for promoting an anti-conscription movement. Though she would have hotly maintained, no doubt, that she is a true American, her conduct certainly smacked of treason. In striking contrast to the dispositions of that highly un-American American of pre-Revolutionary ancestry are the words of an "illiterate" Polander who indignantly exclaimed, as Mr. Frederick Palmer relates in his stimulating little book, "With Our Faces to the Light":

> These old Americans talk as if they had all the patriotism. I'm sick of their telling us newcomers at their preparedness banquets that we foreigners, as they call us, have got to be Americans. America means just as much to us as to them. They were born here; they had to be Americans. We make ourselves Americans because we want to be, and we are just as good Americans as they are—and we'll fight for America, too.

That was well said. Though the college student, like her later ancestors, was "born here," she proved by furthering an anti-conscription propaganda that she did not "have to be American" at all, notwithstanding the fact that the United States happened to be the country of her origin. But the very patriotic American who chanced to be born in Poland but became a citizen of the United States by deliberate choice, showed by his words and actions that he was not only a far truer American than our college-bred Socialist of "irreproachable" New England ancestry, but even than many of the well-fed patriots who rise at preparedness banquets to give "foreigners" eloquent but inexpensive advice.

Lord Northcliffe

IN the tragedy of universal war there is sometimes vouchsafed a little measure of comic relief. This is necessarily supplied by individuals draping themselves in lion-skins, while whole communities step into anonymous death. Such was the case when the loudly advertised automobile of Lord Northcliffe swept down the line of the Allies in France and delivered a series of salutes to the living and the dead. The countless sufferers that lay along the via dolorosa might have preferred to strain their ears to catch the rumble of God's chariot wheels, who also rideth the ridges of war and taketh terrible and as yet not to be published note. But it is the peculiar bitterness of modern warfare that the whole world bleeds that the journalist may write, and the people would have it so.

The very mountains are in travail, the Continent belches with flame and the mouselike car of Lord Northcliffe creeps through the ruins!

Not the least of the astounding results brought about by the advent of the war is the renewed relations of England and America and once more the figure of Lord Northcliffe takes ship upon the laboring waves.

Northcliffe began life near Dublin at Chapelizod, which is famous as the home of another Irish humorist, Tim Healy. Escaping from the troubled and thankless Dublin of the eighties, Master Harmsworth struck the sour soil of English humor with a comic paper. He has since been trying to live down that highly successful venture. But in vain has Pelion been piled upon Ossa and the Times heaped upon the Daily Mail. Napoleon began as an engineer and Lincoln as a rail-splitter, but their biographers could never have canonized a comic paper! And Lord Northcliffe as the superman of England's press is one whose heart is set on deeds. He has been busy playing the external parts of a great man's life. He has played the Tory one moment and the Progressive another. He has pitted Irishman against Irishman to make a British holiday. He has run Carson with rebellion attached and now he is running Home Rule with Lloyd George lightly attached. Long before his papers scented the German peril they were sniffing at a French bogey. During the war he has fretted and fumed, sometimes with very good result. In the absence of great men he has assumed a paper-dictatorship, without ever losing the guise of a king-maker. He is the "movie-man" of the English scene. He has spent his ebullient nature in moving cabinets, moving ministers, moving the War Office and now as a melodramatic finish he is to move the United States.

Incidentally he has made strenuous efforts to move the British Ambassador in this country towards more spectacular efforts. His ideal of trans-Atlantic diplomacy was doubtless a Dernberg feat.

It is a little difficult to appreciate the precise nature of Northcliffe's mission. Possibly he has been sent to try conclusions with William Randolph Hearst, though he who sups with the latter requires the length of a very long spoon. It will be curious to see if the man who Americanized the English press can succeed in Anglicizing the American press in turn. He will have to be careful not to disturb the very delicate equipoise which has already been established at Washington. This country has Irish even more than English interests at heart. A false note by an amateur may echo further than professional harmony. However, Lord Northcliffe has wisely studied the feelings of America on the Irish question. An editor's pen can be as dangerous or as useful as a king's scepter. His inkpot may radiate farther than a regal orb and his special correspondents be as disturbing an element as the secret diplomatists. If the world is to be made "safe for democracy" and the possibilities of engineered hatreds between unsuspecting peoples removed, then yellow journalism must pass away in Germany, England and America. In the new era all that is fickle and shallow and perilous in the press will be swept aside with brooms which will sweep all the cleaner for being made of the heartstrings of dead and innocent men.

Literature

ALEXANDER POPE

WITH Thomas Hood we can regretfully exclaim: "Our Pope has been excommunicated." Time was, in the reign of Queen Anne and the Hanoverian Georges, when he was well-nigh infallible, and when his literary decisions were looked upon as oracles by the wits, courtiers and statesmen of his age. Those days are gone. He has suffered a dreadful sea-change. He has been banned with bell, book and candle from the company of the hierarchs of song. A dreadful interdict has hung over him. It may be impossible to lift that interdict entirely, but it is fair to try and restore him partially at least to the favor and good graces of the faithful. He may not be restored to all his former honors, yet it may be shown that he merited some at least of those which were once so lavishly bestowed upon him.

That Alexander Pope could be mean, intriguing, secretive, waspish, jealous of the greatness of others; that he used to publish letters he never wrote to the persons to whom they are addressed; that he worked out, as Professor Lounsbury says, a bit of "cheap and particularly villainous melodrama"; that he could be violent and coarse of tongue even to those whom common decency, if not the love he once professed for them, should make him respect; that he was cold, selfish, vainglorious and proud: all this can scarcely be denied. There are a few pages in his life which, for the sake of the dignity of human nature, we would wish to skip entirely.

But the man, who in the height of that supreme dictatorship which he so long exercised over English letters and, on the whole, for their lasting good, ever clung to the Faith of his fathers, his persecuted and ridiculed Catholic Faith, and whose love for his mother was never for a single moment dimmed or lost its tenderness or devotion, had undoubtedly some sparks of genuine manhood in his soul. In the persecuted Faith of his fathers he died. At his command, Richardson, one of the best artists of his time, painted his mother's picture. To her he writes constantly and when she is under his roof, no matter in what bright company of wits and statesmen he is found, he gives her the place of honor and all a devoted son's marks of affection. "I send you my daily prayers, and I bless you, my dear." That mother's blessing still plays as a halo around the head of the poet and its brightness dispels many a cloud and shadow which his human frailties may have gathered around it.

Our age has well-nigh forgotten Pope. Who reads him but the prosy and the old-fashioned? To profess admiration for him is to acknowledge ourselves far behind the times. Yet Pope might be read with profit by our generation. No one can make him out a great poet. There is no eagle's sweep to his wing, no swan-song or skylark note in his heart. He is not swayed by any fine frenzy of the soul. No overmastering passion lifts him to the zenith of inspiration or sinks him to the nadir of despair. Of the poetry of those wide-ranging spiritual intuitions, and heart-revealing experiences, either personal to himself or to the beings of his creation, there is nothing in Pope. Of the ecstasy of the soul there is not a trace. But he is the poet of the understanding. As such, he is in the first rank of the great English writers. And if the "Essay on Criticism," the "Dunciad," the "Moral Essays" were lost, an irreparable gap would be visible in the citadel of English letters. Pope is not a great thinker. He has no philosophical system. He does not unfold his thought with coherence and logical force. He thinks by jets and sprays, not in the steady and solid stream of Dryden, the master he admired so much. But in spite of all these defects, he is a great writer.

He is the champion of common-sense. He waged a ruthless battle to defend its rights. He believed with Horace that it is the foundation of all good writing. Seeing on what miserable substructure so many of his contemporaries tried to build their little temples of fame, he spared neither epigram, lampoon, or coarse attack at times to make them give up the attempt. In that respect his influence, wide and pontifical as it was in the eighteenth century, has lasted to our own time. And if he is the champion of common-sense, he is also, in spite of the occasional coarseness which stains his pages, the champion of sound morality. Though suspected of Deism, like that of Lord Bolingbroke, it is undeniable that the influence of that Catholicism which he at heart professed and believed, can be seen in his writings.

He is a master of diction and of form, and the peerless wielder of the instrument he selected to convey his thought, the heroic couplet. In artistry of terse, clear and forcible expression, in lucidity, in brilliancy, pungency and point, his verse is almost unrivaled. It is at times incorrect in language and rhyme; but with what a swing those splendid couplets march by, file after file, regiment after regiment, eyes front and with an alignment and a martial and faultless tread that would satisfy the heart of the most exacting drill-master. The footfalls of the lines of marching troops after a while become monotonous and their music palls, but there is power and mass in the ordered squadrons which amaze the beholder. At times they sweep by with the long stride of conquering troops and then, as in the last lines of the "Dunciad," they produce the effect of a splendid and dazzling pageant. In the mechanics of expression, Pope is still a safe guide. It would pay our writers to learn from this splendid drill-sergeant some of the secrets of the tactics of words and the strategy of speech. His "Iliad" may not be Homer's. But to read it through, and to hear but the faint echo of the mighty battles on the plains of Troy, booming in his clanking couplets, must be an inspiration to the young or they are dead to the thrill and drum-beat of martial words.

Pope has been denied all the highest poetical gifts. Yet "The Rape of the Lock," with its airy machinery so ingeniously used, proves that he had imagination and fancy. It is built out of fairyland, its texture is rich filagree and delicate gossamer. But we think of Pope mainly as a satirist and as such his name is secure. He belongs to the stock of Horace, Juvenal and Dryden, the wielders of the whip and the lash whose hissing thongs fall thick and fast on the drones, parasites, misers and heartless fops and worldly dames of a corrupt society; affected dunces, coxcombs and charlatans of the republic of letters. These Horace maddens with a smile, Juvenal topples over with a two-handed sword, Dryden knocks down in true English fashion with his fist. Pope scarifies them with his rapier and stings with his stiletto, and lets the unfortunate victim writhe in agony and bleed to death. As Francis Thompson says, he loves the work and revels in his own dexterity with his terrible weapon. "He is like Ortheris fondly patting his rifle after that long shot which knocked the deserter over, in Kipling's story." Sometimes his blows reached a friend, but to his credit they nearly always found the right target. Though it is not the noblest kind of work that a poet can do, it is sometimes necessary. In his self-imposed task of Lord High Executioner, Pope was swift and merciless.

Admiration for Pope, it has been said, comes with advancing years and a larger measure of experience of men and society. The men of his times Pope knew thoroughly. Man, in spite of his "Essay," he does not know so well. The young, the romantic, the imaginative, those who look for deep feeling and emotion, will not turn to the serried squares of his ordered verse. They desire more liberty of movement, more color, more enthusiasm and dash. For those who appreciate brilliancy, epigram, and point, who have an ear for regulated harmonies, for whom good sense, correct taste and polished diction compensate for the absence of higher qualities, who can lovingly linger over the clean-cut gem of a polished couplet, who like to see their own foibles castigated in the person of other offenders, and love a fighter who, in the main, strives bravely against many odds, Alexander Pope must have a strong and permanent appeal.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

REVIEWS

Character Sketches of the Rt. Rev. C. P. Maes, D.D. Written by the SISTERS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE. With a Preface by CARDINAL GIBBONS. Baltimore: John P. Murphy Co. $1.00.

When, on May 11, 1915, the soul of the third Bishop of Covington went to its reward, the American Hierarchy lost one of its most learned and zealous prelates. Bishop Maes, as all who knew him will testify, was preeminently a man of God, whose one aim was to spread God's Kingdom in the hearts of men. To that end he labored with pen and voice for thirty years in his diocese, but his influence soon spread far beyond the limits of Kentucky. His pastorals, filled with the good sense and sweetness so characteristic of St. Francis de Sales, were frequently quoted; before coming to Covington he had written the life of one of Kentucky's pioneer priests, Father Nerinckx; with all the cares of his diocese, he found time to contribute to such periodicals as the American Ecclesiastical Review, and to historical reviews at home and abroad. He was the founder and protector of the Priests' Eucharistic League of America and of its official organ, Emmanuel, which he edited for many years. In some sense Bishop Maes may be said to have preceded Pius X, with whom he was preconized as bishop, in spreading devotion to the Blessed Sacrament; and the decrees of that great Pontiff were received by none with greater joy than by the Bishop of Covington. He was called the "Bishop of the Blessed Sacrament," and in 1907 represented the American Hierarchy at the Metz Eucharistic Congress.

Bishop Maes' zeal for education may be measured by the rule in his diocese, "No school, no church." To the time of his death he was secretary of the Executive Board of the Catholic University, and, in the words of Cardinal Gibbons, "Few played a more important part than he" in its foundation. Bishop Maes had unusual gifts as a director of souls, and every Thursday and Saturday found him in the confessional. "Do not spare your priests," he said to the people. "Keep them in the confessional. Go to Holy Communion until their arms drop through weariness," and nobly did the Bishop set the example to his clergy. "Tell my best friends to pray for me," he said when informed that the end was near. "Especially, have the little children in the schools pray for me." Bishop Maes still lives in the hearts of the people for whom he spent himself. Both as a book of real devotion and as a contribution to the history of the Church in Kentucky, the present charmingly written little volume may be heartily recommended.

The Story of the Acts of the Apostles: A Narrative of the Development of the Early Church. By DENIS LYNCH, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers, $1.75.

Our modern age is keenly interested in the origin of religion. When based on a correct analysis of the documents, nothing could be more praiseworthy. But often, instead of resting their researches on the objective evidence, the historians of the present day are satisfied with surmises and hypotheses not warranted by the facts. To Christians and Catholics nothing could be more fascinating and at the same time more inspiring than a thorough knowledge of the first days of the Church of Christ, of the labors of the Apostles, and of the growth of that grain of mustard-seed destined by Our Lord to expand into a mighty tree. Yet, though the authentic records of those early and wondrous days is given us in the Acts of the Apostles, it is much to be feared that even Catholics otherwise well-informed on all that concerns their religion could not tell offhand what the labors of St. Paul were in Macedonia, at Athens or Corinth, or of the main incidents of the Council of Jerusalem.

"The Story of the Acts of the Apostles" should make it easy for every one to fill up that gap in his knowledge of church history. It is an illuminating commentary on the masterpiece of St. Luke. Taking the text of that admirable historian, so simple, dramatic and classic, Father Lynch makes us live through those momentous days, when Saul was smitten on the road to Damascus, when Peter had the vision in the house of Cornelius, and Paul stood before Felix and Agrippa and the sages of Athens. The book is written with ease, with accurate knowledge of the subject, but without any undue obtrusion of the scholarship everywhere manifest in its pages. It is written in the spirit in which St. Luke should be explained. The difficulties of every kind, geographical, chronological, historical, which meet us in the "Acts" of St. Luke are clearly exposed. Thanks to Father Lynch's close adherence to his text and to his keen sense of the difficulties lurking there, a clear view is given us of the sequence of events in the heroic epic of the early Church. The simplicity, combined with a certain manly strength of style, the earnestness of purpose everywhere manifest, the power of selection and emphasis on the right fact and interpretation, greatly enhance the value of the work. If brought into our schools, Father Lynch's "Story of the Acts" will stimulate and instruct both the teacher and the pupil.

Matthew Arnold: How to Know Him. By STUART P. SHERMAN, Professor of English, University of Illinois. With Portrait. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.50.

This latest volume of the "How-to-Know" series, of which Will D. Howe is, most fittingly, the general editor, and preceding numbers of which have been commended in AMERICA, is chiefly valuable for its just appraisal of Matthew Arnold's services as a literary critic. "Character and Career," "Poems of the Personal Life," "Poems of the External World," "Literary Criticism," "Education," "Politics and Society" and "Religion" are the chapter-heads under which Professor Sherman arranges the comments on his subject's varied writings and activities, and many quotations both in prose and verse from Arnold's works run through the volume. Particularly good are the author's pages on the functions of criticism. He tells what judicial, impressionistic and historical literary criticism is, and gives full credit for all that Arnold's writings have done to correct and reform the taste of his own and the present generation. That great critic strongly urged his readers to develop so delicate a "literary conscience" that they could be sure they "were right" in admiring this or that work of the mind, and as for the mission of criticism, Arnold has made such truths as these commonplaces: "Its business is . . . simply to know the best that is known and thought in the world, and by in its turn making this known, to create a current of true and fresh ideas." Its "best spiritual work" is "to keep man from a self-satisfaction which is retarding and vulgarizing, to lead him towards perfection, by making his mind dwell upon what is excellent in itself, and the absolute beauty and fitness of things."

Catholic readers of Professor Sherman's book will know how to discount what he says about the value of Arnold's writings on religious subjects. In that field this promoter of "sweetness and light" was himself a hopeless "Philistine," superciliously instructing both Protestants and Catholics about the absurdity of their beliefs. Matthew Arnold is one of the few poets of the second rank who knew when to stop trying to write verse. He once remarked in a letter:

> People do not understand what a temptation there is, if you cannot bear anything not very good, to transfer your operations to a region where form is everything. Perfection of a certain kind may there be attained, or at least approached, without knocking yourself to pieces, but to attain or approach perfection in the region of thought and feeling, and to unite with this perfection of form, demands not merely an effort and a labor, but an actual tearing of oneself to pieces, which one does not readily consent to (although one is sometimes forced to it) unless one can devote one's whole life to poetry.

When Matthew Arnold discovered that his own poetry began to have more form than substance he stopped writing verse. Would that more of our poetasters would imitate him!

Criminal Sociology. By ENRICO FERRI. Translated by JOSEPH I. KELLY. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $5.00.

Rightly rejecting the assumption that society is the sole cause of crime, Ferri advances the proposition that crime is "a biologico-social abnormality," which has "its origin in an anti-social biological constitution, organic or physical," and is "the resultant of anthropological, cosmic, and social factors." Under the first category, Ferri groups anomalies of the skull, brain and viscera, and "other bodily characteristics, such as physiognomy and tatooing," an obvious borrowing from Lombroso; to the second he assigns anomalies of "intelligence, feeling and the moral sense," while under the third he places "certain biological features, such as age, race, sex, civil status, profession and education." Allied with the cosmic factors are "climate, length of day and night, meteorological conditions and agricultural production," and the social factors will also extend to "density of population, morals, the police and, in general, the legislative, civil and penal organization." With all this premised, it need not be said that Ferri rejects absolutely the doctrine of free-will. Man is simply a creature of the elements, subject to them, and reacting to their gradual but uninterrupted evolution. "Positivistic physio-psychology has completely destroyed the belief in free choice," he writes with characteristic dogmatism, and what appears to be the result of choice is, in reality, "a special manner of reaction against exterior environment," a reaction which demands "physical and moral determinism." Moral culpability is a metaphysical figment.

Why, then, it may be asked, are certain individuals deemed "criminals," and why may they be "punished"? To these questions Ferri has an easy but unintelligible answer. What we call a "criminal" is simply an entity that has failed to react properly to "exterior environment." But why? And why "punishment" for something that was inevitable? One does not blame salt and pepper for refusing to form a chemical compound when mixed. At this point Ferri breaks down completely. He suggests, indeed, the existence of a "penal function of society," but for it he can offer no rational basis whatever. In the face of notorious facts, not even Ferri can maintain that society is physically or morally predetermined to inflict punishment in a given instance; his attempt, therefore, to justify "punishment" while denying free-will and culpability has no basis in reason. The alleged analogy of the criminal and the invalid simply begs the question, even were it admitted to be an analogy, which it certainly is not. Only a crazed brain can reduce the assassin and the man suffering from smallpox to a common denominator. The first may be a murderer because with intelligent foresight he plotted the taking of human life, while the other is in the pest-house, in spite of his most skilled efforts to avoid the disease.

Neither the scientific criminologist nor the moralist will be inclined to deny the influence of "exterior environment" in lessening or even destroying moral culpability, should this environment induce mental instability or paralysis. But not all of us are insane, and we generalize not from exceptions but from the type. One cannot escape the impression that Ferri too often makes words serve in place of ideas. Scholastic philosophy, of which he is wofully ignorant, is dismissed to the limbo of rejected systems by the curt statement that it is "spiritualistic." Even if the term be allowed, might it not be well for one who boasts his scientific accuracy first to prove that "spiritualism" is untenable?

Lollingdon Downs and Other Poems. By JOHN MASEFIELD. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.25.

A Lonely Flute. By ODELL SHEPARD. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

Lyrical Poems. By DOROTHY PLOWMAN, $0.60; Verses. By ELIZABETH BRIDGES. $0.50. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

These recent volumes of poetry, viewed in one dimension, to wit, the number of their pages, are very thin; but pure gold is always capable of great compression. In "Lollingdon Downs" Mr. Masefield departs from his metier of rhythmical ballad-making, and seems to essay a flight upon a Pegasus of philosophy and theology. The lyrics in which he advances his "thought" are done with his usual skill, but his cosmological problem is nothing new, for poets from Lucretius down to Omar Khayyam have played the little compass of their notes upon it. The possession of an esthetic faculty seems, in Masefield's philosophy, to make man worth while. He apotheosizes beauty, and while reminiscent of the Persian and the old Latin poets just mentioned, he has not descended to the sensual epicureanism of the one or the blank despair of the other. Yet if his contentions were pursued to logical conclusions he should eventually stumble into the sloughs of Lucretius and Omar. Tennyson in the "In Memoriam" would be a helpful cicerone for him, if he cannot walk with Dante.

Similarly in "A Lonely Flute," Mr. Shepard goes on a perilous task when he labors on the far-fetched thesis of the last poem, "The First Christian." The Divinity of Christ and the motives which led His followers to believe in it are topics which many, as St. Paul said of the Scriptures, wrest to their peril and perdition. To say of Mary, the Mother of Jesus,

> Even she who bore thee,
> Seeing the man too nearly, missed the God,
> Erring as fits the mother, is to make so brilliant an error that a child with the penny catechism would condemn it as readily as would a profound inquisition. Mr. Shepard even errs historically in his title to this poem; for surely he is aware that Peter, to name no other "first Christian," confessed that Christ was the Son of the living God long before Magdalen came to stand at the Cross. In the other poems Mr. Shepard finds safer ground to travel; for his themes are within his comprehension and his art does not suffer from overstraining. In the songs about the goldfinch and the orioles his rhythms catch the short undulating motion of the one and the bright treble thrills of the other. His goldfinch, for instance:

Clear as a bell at each dip as he flies,
Bounding along on the wave of the skies:

and his oriole:

Now at an airy height
Pausing a heart beat
Quite at the twig's tip,
Pendulous, bending.

And in pictures, as well as in sound, he is oftentimes felicitous.

In Miss Plowman's "Lyrical Ballads" there is much in matter and manner for commendation. The lines and strophes are written with swift vehemence and healthy enthusiasm. A great delight in scenic glory and landscapes of domestic traditions is manifest. She sings romantically of the bright adventuring of the ships of the sixteenth century, and then back to the corner of the world which is known as Piccadilly Circus:

From east and west about your feet
And south and north the roads come in,
The traveler roads you love to greet,
Since all that wanders is your kin.

She makes a contribution to literature's supply of utterances of old thoughtful Ulysses in this verse:

Sailing by this, the chart the gods have given,
To my soul's eye the course is heavenly clear.
Across your sky unfaith's thick clouds are driven;
You cannot see the stars by which I steer.

But there are charts which Miss Plowman does not know, or, if she knows, she does not steer aright. In some of her pronunciamentos she attitudinizes for the apparent purpose not of hearing the voices of her own heart, but of being overheard in little salons of doubt and unfaith.

Miss Bridges, who is the Poet Laureate's daughter, presents in this second volume of hers a sheaf of lyrics which are the result of exquisite and artistic elaboration. The light sensitiveness of moods, her delicate nuances in sound and color, and the symmetrical developments of her themes run through the pages. She is not vexed with a desire to utter preachments, like the writers above noted, nor to mar her work with errors against science and the laws of thought. Like a skilled tapestry-weaver, she is content to make her fairy webs from threads which she knows in every particle of their fiber. M. E.

Church and State in the Reign of Louis Philippe. By JOHN M. S. ALLISON. Princeton University Press, Princeton. $1.00.

This is a dissertation presented to the Faculty of Princeton University by an instructor in history at Yale, with the view to gaining the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. What proportion a superficial account of the historical facts without any discussion of principles can bear to the Doctorate in Philosophy, we leave to Princeton University to explain. We may presume its Faculty was satisfied with the dissertation and that the candidate won his degree, otherwise the Princeton University Press would hardly have published this book. It is surprising, then, to find on the first page the Duc d'Orléans assassinated instead of the Duc de Barry. One may call this a mere slip of the pen, and urge that both were royal dukes, and that a Duc d'Orléans, Louis Philippe's eldest son, met a violent, though accidental, death some years later. Still in one professing to be familiar with the period such a slip is almost as astonishing as would be that of a Frenchman who, writing about our Civil War, should put Secretary Jefferson Davis for Secretary Stanton, and then plead in excuse that the former had been Secretary of War also. Dr. Allison thinks it difficult to understand just how the name of Louis Philippe was proposed for the crown, and thinks that the accounts given are fictions of historical romance. This is rather hard on French historians. But the story is a very sordid one, and Dr. Allison takes the easiest way of getting round it.

It is a mystery to the reviewer why the affairs of the Catholic Church have such an attraction for people quite unequal to the discussion of them. Perhaps it is an effect of the supernatural drawing power, her inheritance from Him who said: "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all things to myself." However this may be, Dr. Allison should at least know that the term "Petite Eglise" did not designate the "'Parti prêtre' composed of Ultramontanes and Jesuits," this last a vicious partition in more ways than one. During the Empire and the Restoration the Petite Eglise consisted of those few who would not accept the rearrangement of episcopal sees provided for in the Concordat of 1801. So far from being Ultramontane, it was essentially Gallican, and by 1830 it was virtually extinct. If Dr. Allison wanted a nickname for the Catholics, he could have found it in Congréganiste, the usual one, though hardly just, as there were many Catholics knowing nothing of the Congrégation. It is an extraordinary assumption to make the Church in the reign of Louis Philippe consist of Lamennais and his party and afterwards of Ozanam and Lacordaire and their disciples. It is incorrect to put the former down as Ultramontanes, and the Catholics, designating them the Petite Eglise, as Gallicans. Indeed, in this latter, Dr. Allison contradicts himself. If the terms be used as understood in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Gallicanism was dead practically, to be found only in the expiring real Petite Eglise, while neither term could be applied to Lamennais, who was simply a child of the Revolution. If taken in their nineteenth-century sense, whatever may be said of individuals, Gallicanism could not be predicated of all the Catholics, least of all of the supposedly omnipotent Congrégation, and which Dr. Allison seems to confound with the Petite Eglise, while Lamennais was again anything but an Ultramontane. It is a calumny to assert that Ozanam and Lacordaire resumed the work of Lamennais, and the sneer at the inconsistency of the Holy See, that permitted them to do so, is not only unjust, but a sign of deplorable ignorance. Once more, iniquitas mentita est sibi. Dr. Allison's French is not immaculate. Hardly a quotation is free from orthographical blunders, and he gives us twice le pêché, an extraordinary monster of the mixed moral and material order, not to mention such impossibilities as Lèttres. His Latin, whether in quotation or in translation, is worse than his French. All this is not creditable to the Princeton University Press, which, for its own sake, ought to have a competent reviser. H. W.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"The Maguires of Fermanagh" (Gill, 3/6) is another contribution to the rich output of Irish literary documents which are happily appearing in our day. The volume's 140 pages are equally divided between the Gaelic text and the English translation and notes, and give "a fragment of the conquest and of the life of the children of Donn Mor, son of Raghnall MaGuidhir." The scribe says that he began it on the 26th of March, 1716, and wrote it "out of the old historical book by John MaGabhran." A thorough historical study of the text and of the history of the Clan Maguire is given in the introduction; and this part of the book itself is worthy of a student's attention. The narrative, which also displays considerable literary ability, presents in broad outlines what is doubtless a true historical picture. There are many allusions to the native customs and settled institutions in Ireland when it was under the Brehon system, and glimpses of the jovial hospitality so characteristic of Irish social gatherings even in the darkest days of her history.

The reputation for intolerance and stupidity that Florida's Preacher-Governor has so easily acquired, and the fact that the legislature of that State has recently passed, by a large majority, a Convent-Inspection bill, make particularly timely and important Father John Conoley's excellent paper on "The Present Position of Catholics in Florida" which appears in the current Catholic Mind. He shows how the ministers and the politicians are responsible for the disgraceful exhibition of ignorance and bigotry that that State is now giving the world, but he also tells how the persecution has thrown the Catholics back upon themselves and made them value their Faith more than ever. "Clergy and people are united as never before; men and women long away from the Sacraments have not only returned to the normal practice of their religion, but are foremost in every good work. The whole sordid business has been as good as a mission." In this same issue of the little fortnightly is an explanation and defense, from a French-Canadian priest's point of view, of the language-question in the Dominion. So much has been published in this country on the English-speaking Canadian's side of the controversy that judicious American readers will be glad to read "F. C.'s" forceful exposition of "The Canadian Miracle" and to learn just why the French-speaking Catholics oppose "Regulation Seventeen." These two papers make the current Catholic Mind a notable number.

"The Royal Outlaw" (Dutton, $1.50), by Charles B. Hudson, is a sterling example of the wealth of dramatic material to be found in the Scriptures. It is at the same time a thrilling romance of military adventure and an accurate Biblical narrative. Taking as his theme that portion of David's life when he was exiled by Saul, the author has built around it a story that surpasses the purest fiction in incident and imagination. David, the heroic character of the ages, is strongly drawn as the paragon of all virtues. In dark contrast to him is the Jewish populace, stubborn and faithless, with whom the author seems to have little sympathy. Intermediate between them are those noble, faithful companions of David in his wanderings, who supply most of the action and all of the whimsical humor with which the story abounds. The book might well be read not only for its own intrinsic interest, but also for the local coloring of Oriental scenery and imagery that it gives.——"An Unwilling Traveler" (Herder, $0.80), by Mary E. Donovan, is the tale of a little girl abducted in America to become heiress of a large estate in England. The book shows marks of clever observation, but in plot, development and narrative it is somewhat amateurish.

"The Master's Word" (Benziger, $3.00) is the title under which the Rev. Thomas Flynn, C.C., has grouped together in two volumes a course of sermons on the Gospels and Epistles for the Sundays and feasts of the ecclesiastical year. There are two special features that recommend this addition to the homiletic library. First the author weaves together the Epistle and Gospel in one discourse and makes them throw light upon each other. The second feature is that he has arranged the sermons in such an order as to cover practically the whole ground of the Christian's life. This secures unity and at the same time adds the renewed interest of endless variety as the year proceeds. The enumeration of the six heads under which the sermons fall will make clear this latter characteristic: (1) the work, which holds up the ideal that should be the aim of the Christian's life; (2) the workers, which describes the qualities of soul that must correspond to the ideal; (3) the helps supplied in the example, sufferings and grace of Jesus Christ; (4) the Master Himself, a diversion which sets forth His human character, His authority and methods; (5) the results of all these in building up the Christian character; (6) the duties which explain the practice of Christian virtue. The sermons are simple, forceful and suggestive.

In "The Heart of the Balkans" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50) Demintra Vaka describes in a graphic, straightforward manner a journey she made through the Balkan States. Being Greek herself, she is able to interpret well the inner spirit of patriotism and self-sacrifice that marks those proud and fiery nations of the Southeast. Touches of home-life, intermingled with sketches of character, make the volume very readable.——Writing in the first person, Walter Flavius McCaleb tells for children the life-story of "Happy" (Harper, $0.75), an amiable honeybee of his acquaintance. Happy describes all the adventures he has from the day of his birth till death from old age is impending, and gives young readers a deal of exact and interesting information regarding the manner of life the inmates of the hive are accustomed to lead.

From a little book called "Si Briggs' Folks" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25), by Madeline Yale Wynne, and suitably illustrated by Gluyas Williams, it is clear that the free-verse movement has even invaded Yankeedom. The caustic-witted Si thoroughly knows the peculiarities of all his neighbors. He tells, for instance what happened to Scruggs's wife, who was a Second Adventist, what Mercy Buntin' said when her husband, Hezikiah, up and died, describes the Deacon's swearin' tone, and gives the following account of how Maria adjusted her New England conscience:

'Lanson Smith married Almon Hubbel's half-sister
Maria, the one Almon Hubbel's wife
Said she didn't care if she never see her ag'in.
Maria was a dose, but she done her duty,
Once she seen it.
  She was Orthodox to the core,
  And he was a Unitarian, and rather sore
  On this subjec' 'cause he had turned coat the year before.
Folks ast her where she'd worship now,
Seein' she'd got married;
  And she said as how They'd fixed it up that she Should go to his church, every other Sabbath,
  And on the off Sunday he
Would go to hern.
"I shall worship," says she, "in the Orthodox pew,
And just set in the Unitarian."

"Bab, a Sub-Deb" (Doran, $1.40), by Mary Roberts Rinehart, is a series of amusing stories about a very original "sub-debutante," who is possessed of so much temperament that whenever she returns for the holidays, she contrives to throw her whole household, and most of the neighborhood as well, into a commotion. She is so feminine that her sympathetic father, who is her best friend, assures Bab that if she were more so even he could not stand it. Among her escapades are a fictitious love affair, which lands her back in school at the request of the community in the middle of her vacation, then she attempts to capture a burglar and in doing so thwarts her dearest wish, namely, to marry off her sister and so clear the way for her own emancipation; then a patriotic resolution to aid her country in war-time almost ends her life; and so the book runs on, always wholesome and always entertaining. "Bab, a Sub-Deb" will fill an idle hour very pleasantly and is perhaps the best work the author has done. The heroine's phonetic spelling is quite as amusing as she.——"The Definite Object" (Little, Brown & Co., $1.50), by Jeffery Farnol, is one of the author's characteristic stories, marked by romance, the intrusion of the underworld and by pages which approach the line of indiscretion. There are two redeeming characters in the story, but the author revels in delineating the workings of a group of gangsters. Of course there are several fights and a happy ending. The story is interesting, but is scarcely up to the standard of Mr. Farnol's best work.

To the June Poetry Journal Agnes Kendrick Bangs contributes these lines on "Our Lady of the Trenches":

They have shattered thy chapel walls and the belfry, Rose of the World,
They have quenched the silver lamp that burned before thy shrine;
Incense is spilled from the censer, and the broken bells are dumb,—
The Seven Sorrows of France, O Mother of Grief, are thine!
Altar for thee have we none, save the trodden grass by the trench,
Nor priest nor acolyte, nor choir to chant thy Name;
Thine incense, Virgin adored, is bitter smoke of the cannon,
Thine only votive taper, the campfire's smouldering flame.

Yet dost thou bring us some comfort, now on the field of our pain,
As when in the gray stone abbey, we knelt at thine altar rail;
Here the dim eyes of the dying may fall on the Babe in thine arms—
Here the faint prayers of the dying, unheard shall not falter and fail.

Ave Maria, Mother of God, Our Lady of Many Mercies
Borne scatheless out of the ruins, tell thy Holy Son.
We bear our wounds for love, e'en as for love He was wounded,—
Pray Him to look on France, and see if it be well done!

EDUCATION

Music in the Grades

THE subject of music in the schools has for some time engaged the attention of educators throughout the country. They wish to place this study on its proper basis, arguing that if in former times music was numbered among the seven liberal arts held necessary to a good education, it should have as honored a place in our modern curriculum. Its reinstatement has been warmly advocated by many able musicians, notably by the late Edward MacDowell. His earnest desire was to see a correlation of music and the other arts with the sciences in the universities. His theory was based on the ancient systems of education, especially on that of the Greeks, the highest exponents of pagan civilization. The failure to realize his dream was to MacDowell a keen disappointment.

Pedagogic Requirements

THE history of Christian schools attests the importance accorded the study in the educational scheme, where it is mentioned on equal terms with Latin and mathematics, and the inventions of Hucbald, Guido, Franco of Cologne, and others, prove with what enthusiasm music was cultivated in medieval monasteries. Conceded that music should form an integral part of education it rests with educators to place the study on its proper basis. If music is in disrepute with many of the school authorities, it is owing to the inefficiency of the system or to the little time allotted it.

In order that the study may bring about the best results, (1) it should conform to the modern methods of language teaching, (2) there should be a daily period for sight-singing, (3) the grade teacher should be equipped to impart this instruction, (4) regular examinations should be held, (5) efficient supervisors should be maintained.

Supervision is perhaps the keynote to progress in the development of a unified method of teaching. Many of our Catholic schools have to a certain extent adopted a system of supervision, with gratifying results. This encourages us to anticipate a special course for music supervisors, for the purpose of establishing a uniform and efficient system of teaching, and of keeping in touch with new ideas and methods.

Primary Steps

MUSIC is a language, but before we can read its message we must be able to decipher its symbols and interpret its idioms. The opportunity to do this should be given to all children, so that to those who may never be able to produce it themselves, the appreciation acquired through its study, may prove a source of enjoyment and uplifting influence. Music is preeminently the language of the emotions; therefore, the educator must watch that this potent factor be directed aright, that by its power the child may be led into noble, artistic, and heavenly paths.

Because singing is the most natural medium for its expression, and the voice the most universally available instrument for its production, music in the schools has come to mean education in music through some system of sight-singing.

Beginning with the primary grades, the child should be taught many pretty rote songs: nursery rhymes, songs of child-experience, that instil moral and religious lessons, all within its comprehension. If these be linked with simple but attractive melodies, how the child enjoys them! The sparkling eye, the responsive gesture tells us that the imagination has been aroused, thought stimulated and a new idea awakened in the child's consciousness, which is a germ for future development.

The second step is to utilize these rote songs by taking from them a motive or phrase to represent a tone-word or tone-phrase, and presenting them to the eye, in their proper staff notation. Every music lesson should be made vital and delightful, and the child led, step by step, to the conception of the logical construction of a composition, and to an intelligent appreciation of its musical content.

Part-singing is a wonderful stimulus, and its practice should be encouraged as soon as some facility in sight-reading is attained. To be able to sing an individual part, and conceive of it in combination with the others in a chorus, is a step towards the intelligent appreciation of the great oratorios and orchestral symphonies, the distribution of the parts for the various instruments in these being based on the principles of voice-leading.

If our modern curriculum requires an early study of the English classics, it should also require that our children be early initiated into the beauties of the great tone-poets. Good music, like good literature, does not disclose its beauties so readily as does the popular variety. We must dig to find a hidden treasure. The construction of a dance tune, on the contrary, is so simple, its rhythm so evident, that only the wholly unmusical are unable to grasp it at once.

Counteracting Bad Influence

IN view of the amount of "rag-time" and vulgar popular music which has invaded the home and flooded the streets, and is being rolled off by millions of music machines, and even lisped by the innocent lips of babyhood, it becomes the duty of educators to assume the responsibility of counteracting this bad influence. Shall it be left to those alone who love music for its artistic merit to foster and propagate the best? The professional standard as exhibited in our symphony orchestras is very high, and the fact that these concerts, as well as grand opera, receive liberal patronage cannot be denied. But even among concert-goers how many there are who prefer popular music, simply because they have not been educated to understand the classics. Among the many means of cultivating a taste for classical music which are already in use in some of our schools, and which should not be despised, because so easily available, is the graphophone. Excellent records have been made by virtuosi for the purpose of familiarizing the young with the beautiful folk-music of different countries, with movements from symphonies, and with excerpts from the great operas and oratorios.

The inspiring music of the Church, which the children should learn to appreciate and practise with enthusiasm, should be taught, not as isolated matter, but in the regular sight-singing classes, and in accordance with the highest artistic ideals. Hymns should be chosen for their intrinsic merit, both as to text and setting. It is an encouraging sign of the times that ever-increasing interest is manifested in raising the standard of English hymns.

Opportunity

THE zeal of our bishops in carrying out the requirements of the Motu Proprio has borne fruit in various directions and notably in the multiplied opportunities afforded for expert instruction in the Plain Chant. A happy idea, originated by Bishop Schrembs, has taken form in a simple system of presenting Gregorian Chants in a notation within the grasp of the young. What a joy to the heart of Mother Church if the rich store of sacred song be made the common possession of her children, and whole congregations unite in singing the chants of the Church, a mighty chorus responding to the Sursum Corda of the priest. The music course published under the auspices of the Catholic University, Washington, is another movement in the right direction. The prospect for the restoration of music to its former rank in the school and in the community, is encouraging.

SOCIOLOGY

A Great Social Reformer: St. Francis Regis

THERE is no dust in the great library of Georgetown University. I may not, therefore, in truth employ the stereotyped phrase so dear to the bibliophile who would tell you, all aglow and breathless, of some new treasure "found in a dusty corner of the library." But it was a happy moment when, browsing through the library of our oldest University, I suddenly came across a long-sought volume, "The Life of S. John Francis Regis, of the Society of Jesus. Written in French By F. William Daubenton Of the Same Society. Translated into English By C * * * M * * * Printed by John Hoyles: And Sold by Thomas Meigham, London, MDCCXXXVIII." The starred "C. M." is Father Cornelius Murphy, who, like Père Daubenton, deserves a volume all to himself. Born in Ireland, October 24, 1696, he became a Jesuit in 1711, and after an adventurous life of missionary work and polemics in England, died in London in 1766.

Some Lines of Work

UNFORTUNATELY, this translation is practically inaccessible, and besides Alban Butler, the only other English account of the Saint that I know of is Père Van Ortroy's sketch in the "Catholic Encyclopedia." The Bollandist, however, scarcely touches upon the social aspects of the Saint's work, although as a social reformer, Regis may well be ranked near Francis of Assisi and Vincent de Paul. Not only was he acquainted with methods which we are fond of deeming our exclusive invention, but, what is more, he made them practicable; a result to which our well-meant efforts do not always attain. He organized a Bureau of Social Investigation, although he did not call it by that name, nor did he use it to oppress the poor, as we sometimes do in New York. He was a prison-reformer whose whole life was love, an understanding love, utterly free from hypocrisy, cant, or sentimentality. His great heart went out to the wayward girl, whom he excused with almost Divine charity, while he detested her sin; and for her, he devised a probation system which, instead of dissembling ugly facts, removed them. Beginning with reform through the Sacraments, it ended by placing the girl either in a self-chosen vocation of penance, or in family life. He was intensely interested in the temporal welfare of the people, and was himself a kind of Legal Aid Society, which always settled cases out of court. More than once, it would seem, he broke a "corner" in provisions, and when the lace-mills threatened to shut down, the people naturally turned to him to devise a plan to ward off the calamity. Nor was their confidence misplaced.

A Clear-Thinking Reformer

HE entertained the most distressingly uncompromising views on the duty of the rich to share their wealth with the poor, and on the duty of magistrates to enforce the law; and he kept none of these views to himself. He must have been a great trial, I think, to comfortable, self-satisfied persons. "Give me Leave to tell you with all Respect to your Person," he roundly said to a magistrate, who had objected that a "Noise" would follow the removal of an open incentive to vice, "that the only Noise to be apprehended is that which is grounded on so excessive a Scandal, and not the Talk which the Applying a Remedy for the Disorder may occasion." He was a firm believer in system and method in the problem of relief, but he was not afraid that the social fabric would be irreparably rent asunder, if he chanced to give an alms to an impostor. "It was a common Saying with him," reports Daubenton, "that to give an Alms to an undeserving Beggar was not such a Mistake as the Refusal to a Real Object."

Why do not people use such delightful capitals nowadays! Perhaps for the same reason that they do not talk like Regis. Standardization, for which, as in duty bound, I protest my wondering veneration, has made us, as it made the Hon. Mrs. Skewton, and Joey Bagstock too, I believe, exceedingly artificial. By the incessant beating of his warning tom-tom, the Sole and Ostensible Hoopla of the Charity Trust has so wrought upon our sensibilities, or upon our nerves, that should Joseph and Mary pass our way on some cool evening in December, we should probably refer them to the Associated Charities for a preliminary investigation. But let us not breathe a word against methodology. Only, we now seem to have so much method in the guise of red tape, investigations, salaries and political jobs, not to mention slander and Grand Jury indictments, that the occasional indulgence of an indiscreet alms is as sweet as stolen waters. Let us have method, but with it a little charity.

A Christian Sociologist

JOHN FRANCIS REGIS was born on January 31, 1597, in the village of Fontcouverte, department of Aude, entered the Society of Jesus on December 8, 1616, and died at La Louvesc on December 30, 1640. He was beatified by Clement XI on May 18, 1716, and canonized by Clement XII on April 5, 1737. He began his priestly work by nursing the plague-stricken of Toulouse in 1631, and ended his earthly career, preaching the Gospel to the poor in the snows of the mountains of Ardèche. "He spent his whole life," writes Daubenton, "in the Instruction of the People, and the Relief of the Poor." A singularly clear-sighted man was he, whose lesson to us, in these days of many voices, is that the only social work worth promoting is the service that is founded on a literal acceptance of the teachings of Jesus Christ.

Regis was not much of a philosopher or theologian, measured by the standards of the schools. He was not a learned, but an exceedingly wise man. Most emphatically, he was not a philanthropist. He loved man because he loved God. It was all very simple. "The Poor, after God, were the tenderest Objects of his Affection: he made it ever his Pleasure as well as his indispensable Duty to instruct and relieve them. . . . He loved all Men as the Images of God: But his Inclination and all his Tenderness was for the Poor."

The Basis of Charity

WITH Regis, a tender, personal love of all in sorrow, became an overmastering passion, for in them he saw his Saviour, in the days of His weary pilgrimage. Of a sick man, whom he had rescued from want, it is related:

> The Poor Creature one Day, striving to Shew his Gratitude, called Regis his Deliverer and Father: The Holy Man was moved, and pressing him to his Breast: "Ah! Dear Brother," he said, 'tis I ought to thank you. This is Nothing in Comparison of what I could wish and ought to Do. The only Favour I beg is to be forgiven for coming so late to your Assistance."

Of course, this sublime charity had to meet stern opposition. His family became quite unpleasant about the matter, and remonstrated:

> That it in no Way became him to Walk the Streets like a Beggar mumping [what a perfectly splendid word!] mumping from Door to Door, and constantly followed by Numbers of Children and Crowds of Wretches. Regis answered with much Sweetness, that, as a Christian he made it his Glory to serve the Poor: And as he respected Jesus Christ in them, he esteemed it a great Honour to have their Company, to Converse with them. . . . They conjured him to remember that he was a Gentleman, Regis answered that he could not see so many unhappy Persons without using his best Endeavours towards their Relief: That no Ignominy should divert him one Moment from Works of Charity.

This simple Christianity admits no rejoinder. The poor represent Christ. We ought, therefore—but let us not pursue this painful subject, in view of what we Christians really do think of the poor. However, Regis was no fanatic. "The Salvation of the Rich" was an object of concern to him, and "he never refused himself to Persons of Consideration, but his Inclinations sway'd him on Behalf of the Poor. . . . He believed he was born only for them and that for them only he ought to live." God "had blessed the Rich with Wealth merely to be Ministers of his Providence and Stewards of the Indigent" and in this office were they to find salvation.

Records and Investigators

I HAVE said that, while not afraid of making a mistake, Regis was not fond of sporadic, unsystematic efforts to cope with the problem of destitution. "He regulated the Method of relieving the Poor in every Parish," and for this he had unusual opportunities, since he employed six months every year in preaching missions. His method is thus outlined by Daubenton:

> He was not able to see the Poor languish in Misery without an equal or greater Feeling of their Distress: But he did not Confine himself to a tender and affectionate Behaviour: he procured them Helps proportionate to His Compassion.
> That no indigent Person's distressed Condition should escape his Care, he had by him a Memorandum of all the necessitous Inhabitants and their respective Wants:

This is probably the extent to which Regis would have gone in the matter of records. It also seems sufficient.

> . . . And of all the charitable Ladies who were able to give them Relief: To each of the latter he assigned a district of the Town and a certain Number of Poor to provide for. . . . Observing that several of the Ladies, of their own Accord, embraced with great Zeal the Charitable Works which he proposed: he resolved to form them into an Association whose Care it should be to support the poor Families of the Town. He opened the Matter to them . . . in such Manner that they determined out of Hand to unite into a Society entirely devoted to the Maintenance of the poor Inhabitants. Some were appointed every Week to visit all the Families and take an Information of their Wants: to make their Report at the first Meeting.

Though I do not know that he ever talked much about it, the Saint was well aware that to put a man in the way of helping himself is better than to give him direct assistance. There were persons of common-sense in this world even before the rise of the American "school of sociology," and in larger numbers, perhaps, than since that interesting event. A worker himself, the Saint was no believer in the easy philosophy which holds that the world owes every man a living. He always encouraged thrift, and with every means at his disposal sought to train the young people for occupations suited to their ability. He helped tradesmen in temporary distress by acting as their agent. "In hard Times when Trade was low," writes Daubenton, "he carried about the work of poor Artificers to the most substantial Burghers: And prevailed with them to purchase at something above the common Rate." Obviously too, his parish visitors, assigned to their respective districts, were expected to examine carefully the cases met on their rounds, and to report at the meetings what action had been taken.

His Least Brethren

OTHER works of Regis may be told at another time. These quotations, so quaintly translated by Father Murphy, will serve to state the underlying principle of the social reform contemplated by this great Saint. He loved man because he loved God; not with an abstract, impersonal love, that could not bear the test of sordid circumstance, but with a charity manifested in deeds of tenderest affection. To St. John Francis Regis, the blessed figure of Jesus Christ, wearied, in bonds, a prisoner, was a palpable reality. For he daily saw his Lord in the outcasts of the towns and villages, his least brethren, in whom he ministered to Christ.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Menace at Home

WHILE owing to the high price of coal the poor were stinting themselves and freezing in their cold rooms during the past winter, or else were rapidly exhausting their small savings to keep the children from suffering, a coal sales company which markets the output of a number of mines has just declared, according to the Rochester Post Express, a cash dividend of thirty per cent and added another thiry per cent to its capitalization. This modest income of sixty per cent on its investment is doubtless sufficiently gratifying to its stockholders, but it represents a condition of affairs which the country cannot tolerate. There is a limit to public endurance. It is more important that the citizen be protected against manufacturers or dealers who relentlessly screw up the price of the commodities required for daily life than against robbers. The latter can, after all, injure a few only, but the former are inflicting suffering upon the entire country. In a high-handed fashion that would have done credit to the most renowned highwaymen of history, the public is held up, bound and stripped. Our soldiers who go forth to sacrifice their lives, if need be, have a right to know that those dear to them at home are protected from the menace that will prove far worse than any submarine campaign if it is not effectively curbed in time.

The Poilu's Philosophy

FRENCH soldiers, according to Current Opinion, maintain their serenity of soul by the use of the following optimistic reflections:

Of two things one is certain: Either you're mobilized or you're not mobilized.

If you're not mobilized there is no need to worry; if you are mobilized, of two things one is certain: Either you're behind the lines or you're on the front.

If you're behind the lines there is no need to worry; if you're on the front, of two things one is certain: Either you're resting in a safe place or you're exposed to danger.

If you're resting in a safe place there is no need to worry; if you're exposed to danger, of two things one is certain: Either you're wounded or you're not wounded.

If you're not wounded there is no need to worry; if you are wounded, of two things one is certain: Either you're wounded seriously or you're wounded slightly.

If you're wounded slightly there is no need to worry; if you're wounded seriously, of two things one is certain: Either you recover or you die.

If you recover there is no need to worry; if you die you can't worry.

The sage old monk of the desert, who used to remind the anxious young novices that most of the things we worry about do not happen, would, no doubt, have approved of the poilu's cheerful philosophy.

K. of C. Border Structures Now Catholic Schools

DURING the stay of the National Guard along the Mexican border the Knights of Columbus erected a considerable number of substantial recreation stations and field headquarters, from Brownsville, Texas, to Nogales, Arizona. These halls served an excellent purpose, since they were well equipped for the comfort of the troops and afforded suitable provision for their spiritual welfare. But it is probable that they are destined to serve a more necessary end in the years to come. Many of them, according to the account given in the Columbiad, have been converted into Catholic schools and mission stations, where such are most urgently needed. Thus the buildings at El Paso and at Camps Cotton and Pershing are to be used as schools by Bishop Schuler; while the Oblate Fathers have received for their missions the structures erected at Llano Grande, San Benito and McAllen, Texas. The building and equipment at Laredo have been given to the Catholic Orphans Home in charge of the Servants of the Sacred Heart of Jesus for the Poor and the Orphaned. The brick structure at Nogales, though used by the local council, is partly devoted to school purposes, while the stations at San Antonio are at present occupied by the Texas militia. Nothing was more providential for the work of the missionary priests than the erection of this chain of Knights of Columbus border structures, which can now serve both as school and parish houses, and help to solve the problem of educating the thousands of Mexican refugee children who have crowded into the United States. The writer in the Columbiad may well say: "This disposition of the Knights of Columbus' buildings is not only intrinsically noble, but extrinsically its fruits will repay the Order a hundredfold in work for the Faith."

Archbishop Keane's Pastoral on Laymen's Retreats

THE plentiful opportunities now offered to Catholic laymen and women of making an annual retreat during the summer months were pointed out in a recent issue. To secure a large attendance for the retreat at Dubuque College a special pastoral letter was read on June 3 in all the churches of the Dubuque archdiocese. "No earthly friend," Archbishop Keane assured the Faithful, "had ever planned anything for them that is so strong a grace as this retreat."

> There is an awful power in present-day worldliness to make a man heedless of sin, reckless of self-indugence, neglectful in prayer. Even good, Christian men are apt to drift from their spiritual moorings, to become unduly interested in the novelties of the day, inordinately attached to the things of the world, and so to miss the true meaning of life and to neglect God-proffered opportunities to make their lives better and more truly helpful to others.
> The retreat will help to counteract this hurtful and dangerous world-spirit. It will make men know better and appreciate more adequately the priceless gift of our Catholic Faith. It will bring to their minds the great Christian principles to whose influence is due all true progress. It will, with God's help, strengthen their religious convictions and intensify their attachment to the Divine facts of the creed. It will afford them time and help to see themselves as God sees them. It will bring healing to injured souls and grace to troubled hearts. It will picture for them the worth and the ways of that great Apostolate which they may so easily exercise to their own gain and to the advantage of their neighbor, an Apostolate which it is incumbent upon them as Catholic men to exercise in this day of spiritual distress. It will teach them anew to pray and to taste the sweets of communion with God amid the distractions of daily life.

All who have ever made a retreat will heartily agree with his Grace when he says in conclusion that all who attend these exercises "will count these days the happiest and the most profitable of the year."

Tactics Against the Soldier's Worst Enemy

THE most serious menace to the physical welfare of the modern soldier, says the author of the little pamphlet "Guide Right," is no longer to be looked for in the diseases which formerly decimated the ranks of the great armies of the world. They have to a great extent been brought under the control of science; but the real danger arises out of immorality. Fatigue as well as excitement of the nerves brings temptations against which prayer and strength of will must combine to win the victory. The authority of the Journal of the American Medical Association is given for the assertion that experiences in Europe have shown that prostitution is one of the most serious if not the most serious of army problems. "Since the war began, a total of sixty divisions have been temporarily withdrawn from the fighting ranks of one of the armies by venereal disease." It is important that the young Catholic soldier should be forewarned and forearmed against all dangers to purity in thought, word and action, since his greatest victory may often consist in conquering them. For this purpose the little pamphlet, scientifically accurate in explaining the physical consequences of sexual indulgence, and equally instructive from a Catholic point of view, is well adapted, and will properly find its place in the soldier's simple outfit. It is published by the Central Bureau of the Central Verein, Temple Building, St. Louis, and its price of five cents a copy will enable Catholic societies, as is suggested, to equip our soldiers with this guide to clean thought and right living. Where this is done it will be well to distribute the pamphlet through the hands of the chaplain. "A soldier, pure of heart and clean of mind and body," the author says, "having himself and all his passions and impulses under complete control, is a veritable knight, a power for good to his fellow-men and country."

An Ignoble Subject and a Noble Ideal

"THE garbage can does not seem to be an elevating subject," remarks a contributor to the General Chemical Bulletin. "It may even seem ludicrous to the average reader." Yet none the less it has become, at the present moment, a center of public attention, and quite properly so. If at one end of the food problem we are seeking to increase farm production by every means in our power, at the other, we are no less intent upon cutting off all needless waste. In this latter regard Americans have been notable sinners. French women, says the writer in the Bulletin, "utilize every last bit of foodstuffs that come into the household, and they are well fed, too." In the same manner German Catholic mothers have been wont to teach their children not to waste even a crumb of bread, since it is a precious gift of God. Not miserliness, but the spirit of Christian stewardship, is the lesson brought home and enforced with the proper sanction. It is time that we should learn this lesson better than we have mastered it in the past.

> Other people in the warring nations have passed the saving point and are sacrificing. We have not even begun to economize to the fullest possible extent. We must realize that it devolves upon this nation to feed the world for the next few months, and probably years. Every American family has its part in this program. We should start a propaganda for a Save-Money-from-the-Garbage-Can association, and eliminate gluttony, over-feeding, over-buying and other kindred evils.

While the counsel given here is good, the motive is not sufficient. The writer naturally suggests the money-saving ideal as the strongest appeal to the commercialized American mind; but there is need of far higher ideals, if a lasting regeneration is to be wrought. Catholic principles teach us to give generously in worthy causes, and not to permit any portion of God's prodigality to be wasted. In all things, the least no less than the greatest, we are only the stewards of God.

How Our Missionaries Are Supported

THE annual report of the United States branch of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith shows that the total of all the diocesan contributions to the Society for 1916 has amounted to $515,485.19. To those unacquainted with mission conditions this might seem a large sum, but it is wholly inadequate at the present time, and ridiculously small compared with Protestant donations. The Society is trying to make it possible for 15,000 missionaries to live, but the total allowance that now comes to them from all sources is not more than ten dollars a month; sometimes it is but six dollars. Without this paltry sum our missionaries would be left in utter destitution. With it they may continue to live, but we can readily compute upon how large a scale the necessary constructive work can be carried on by them. It is true that liberal donations are at times given to individual missionaries, and that particular mission societies are likewise receiving a limited support for their own missions or the mission work which they support, yet the great body of missionaries must depend upon the alms bestowed through the channel of the Propagation of the Faith, out of whose fund all the missions receive their allotted share. Donations to particular mission societies should be made with the utmost generosity, but the Propagation of the Faith cannot be neglected without serious harm to the entire Catholic cause. It is estimated that less than one out of fifty of all our missionaries benefits by specified donations. The remaining forty-nine would thus be disregarded were it not for the Society of the Propagation of the Faith, which should receive many times over the amount now at its disposal. It is disheartening to see the long list of dioceses which have not even contributed $1,000 to this cause. Happily the entire outlay of the Society has been only $.05^{70}/_{100}$ per cent. of the gross receipts, so that practically the whole contribution of the dioceses has gone directly to the foreign mission fields. American Catholics must be made to realize, in season and out of season, that they have a duty towards the missions. If this duty is carelessly neglected we cannot expect the fulness of God's blessings upon our dioceses, parishes and homes.

Treason, Socialists, and Guardians of Liberty

AMONG the men arrested on the charge of treason is Harry E. Townsley, of Columbus, the former master custodian of the Lincoln Court, Guardians of Liberty. Being likewise a Socialist, he had sought to put into practice, in his own way, the "using of any means" to oppose the war. When a leading Guardian of Liberty was asked whether any action would be taken by the Guardians to disown him, he answered: "Why should a secret society disown one of its members when he has gone wrong? I know of no attempt on the part of the society to remove him." (Ohio State Journal.) It is not surprising that a prominent local member of the Guardians of Liberty should see no inconsistency in retaining within the order a class of men whose set purpose is opposition to the Government and the Constitution of the United States. The Guardians of Liberty are essentially disloyal, and at the present moment absolutely treasonable, in so far as the sole object of their society is to stir up civil discord, and thus to gain their private ends by endangering the welfare of the land. The patriotism of the Socialist party, whose members are in good standing in the society of the Guardians of Liberty, may be gauged by the following resolutions and declarations taken from the "Proclamation and War Program," issued by the National Office of the Socialist Party:

> Continuous, active, and public opposition to the war, through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power. . . . Unyielding opposition to all proposed legislation for military or industrial conscription. . . . The acute situation created by the war calls for an even more vigorous prosecution of the class struggle. . . . The only struggle which should justify workers in taking up arms is the great struggle of the working class of the world to free itself from economic exploitation and political oppression.

This last clause, it should be noted, implies the official justification of a bloody revolution on the part of organized labor, when the occasion seems expedient. It is certainly a great glory for the Catholic Church in the United States to have among her bitterest and most deadly enemies the Socialists and the Guardians of Liberty.

Issue for June 22, 1917

The Present Position of Catholics in Florida

The Canadian Miracle

The discrimination made against the Catholics in Florida, its causes and some of the resulting compensations are described by Father Conoley in this issue of the CATHOLIC MIND. Equally interesting and informing is the second article which is a French Canadian's explanation of the political, religious, and educational complications to which the language controversy has given rise in the Dominion.

Chronicle

The War.—Military operations during the last week have not resulted in important changes on any of the war-fronts. In France the offensive has been for the most part on the side of the Germans, who have attacked the British without success at Infantry Hill, east of Monchy; further south the Germans made repeated assaults on the French positions near Laffaux and Vauxillon, but gained only a temporary advantage. In the Trentino the Italians have captured the summits of Hills 2106 and 2668. In Greek Macedonia the Allies have evacuated, according to reports from Sofia, thirteen villages.

Bulletin, June 18, p.m.-June 25, a.m.

On June 23 the House passed the Administration Food bill by a vote of 365 to 5. With the exception of a few changes, mostly unimportant in character, the bill retained all the features written into it by the Committee on Agriculture. The section providing for nationwide prohibition was made more drastic by the amendment offered by Mr. Barkley, which is as follows:

The Administration Food Bill

> No person shall use any foods, food materials or feeds in the production of alcohol, except for governmental, industrial, scientific, medicinal or sacramental purposes, or of alcoholic beverages. Any person who wilfully violates this section shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

The original wording of this section made prohibition of the use of grain and foodstuffs in the manufacture of alcohol discretionary with the President; in its present form it makes prohibition mandatory, with a penal clause attached. The vote on this amendment, which was taken by tellers in Committee of the Whole, was 132 to 114. An effort made to provide for the manufacture of beer and light wines was defeated by a vote of 134 to 124.

The Webb Amendment, which was passed by a viva-voce vote with only a few scattered nays, authorizes the President to commandeer the entire existing stock of alcohol and distilled spirits at present in bond in the United States. It is as follows:

> The President is authorized, if in his opinion it is necessary to conserve necessaries, to require any person having control of alcohol and distilled spirits to turn over to Government use or redistillation such proportion of said alcohol or spirits as the President may deem necessary to meet the requirements of the Government in the manufacture of munitions and other military and hospital supplies in so far as such use or redistillation would dispense with the necessity of utilizing products and materials suitable for foods and feeds in the future manufacture of alcohol or distilled spirits for the purposes herein enumerated.
> Upon the failure of the person to comply with the President's requirement the President is authorized to requisition and take possession of the alcohol and distilled spirits required to be turned over and to pay for same a just compensation to be determined by the President and if the price so determined be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid the amount prescribed by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation.

The House did not, however, pass the appropriation of funds, necessary to put this amendment into execution.

On June 18, Baron Moncheur presented to President Wilson the letter addressed to him by King Albert on behalf of the Belgian people. Besides bespeaking for his envoys the confidence of those with whom they are to confer and expressing his friendship for the United States and his hopes for their happiness and prosperity, the King said:

The Belgian War Mission

> I commend to your Excellency's kindly reception the mission which bears this letter. This mission will express to the President the feelings of understanding and enthusiastic admiration with which my Government and people have received the decision reached by him in his wisdom. The mission will also tell you how greatly the important and glorious role enacted by the United States has confirmed the confidence which the Belgian nation has always had in America's spirit of justice. The great American nation was particularly moved by the unwarranted and violent attacks made upon Belgium. It has sorrowed over the distress of my subjects subjected to the yoke of the enemy. It has succored them with incomparable generosity. I am happpy to have an opportunity again to express to your Excellency the gratitude which my country owes you and the firm hope entertained by Belgium that on the day of reparation toward which America will contribute so bountifully, full and entire justice will be rendered to my country.

Baron Moncheur on presenting the letter, paid a well-merited compliment to Mr. Hoover, quoted with deep emotion the President's solemn declaration that "Belgium will resume her place among the prosperous and peace-loving countries of the world," spoke of the hope inspired in his countrymen by the American flag, and proudly predicted the day when his native land would throw off "the odious weight of foreign occupation" and again march forward on the "path of progress in the light of the sun of liberty." In replying, the President pledged anew the help of America to restore Belgium to her rightful place "among the self-respecting and respected nations of the earth."

The Russian War Mission

No event in the war has stirred Congress to more enthusiastic applause than the speech delivered at Washington on June 23 before a joint session of the Senate and the House by Special Ambassador Bakhmetieff, head of the Russian War Mission which has just arrived in the United States. He spoke of the causes which led up to the revolution, the ideals of the Provisional Government, the union of the various portions of the people, and their subordination of private interests in the larger interests of the new republic. He made no effort to deny that discordant elements are hampering the movement towards reorganization, but declared they were confined to a small minority of the nation, composed for the most part of extremists and internationalists. His remarks on the foreign policy of Russia, as at present constituted, were most reassuring:

> With all emphasis, may I state that Russia rejects any idea of separate peace. I am aware that rumors were circulated in this country that a separate peace seemed probable. I am happy to affirm that such rumors are wholly without foundation in fact. What Russia is aiming for is the establishment of a firm and lasting peace between democratic nations. The triumph of German autocracy would render such peace impossible. It would be the source of the greatest misery and besides that a threatening menace to Russia's freedom.
> The Provisional Government is making every endeavor to reorganize and fortify the army for action in common with the Allies.

His concluding words pledged his country to a relentless continuance of the war. "I will close my address," he declared, "by saying Russia will not fail to be a worthy partner in the 'League of Honor'."

The Italian War Mission

The Italian War Mission and the Italian Chamber of Deputies have both made it clear during the week that the burden which the United States assumed on entering the war is of colossal proportions. M. Marconi said that Italy has maintained for two years an army of more than 3,000,000 men and at the present time has nearly 4,000,000 soldiers at the front. To put a proportionate army into the field, it would be necessary, he said, for the United States to send to Europe 12,000,000 men. The expense this country would have to undergo, on the same ratio, would be not less than $37,000,000,000. The imperative need of Italy, he declared, is iron and especially coal to keep her munition-factories and railroads in operation. America alone, in his opinion, can cope with the submarine menace. How much he and his countrymen depend on the United States may be judged from the following statement with which he concluded his speech to the Merchants' Association:

> We hope and trust that America will be as quick as others have been slow. I have no doubt that she will, for today, Gentlemen, in this great city, this gigantic center of human activity, this world metropolis, I realize as never before that if there be any power on earth that can help us to win this final victory that power is in the hands of the men who built up this marvelous civilization.

Prince Udine, striking the same note, said that the war has reached a crisis, and is demanding sacrifices of the most heroic nature, which must be made at once. "At this stage," he declared, "every day is precious, every mistake is doubly dangerous."

The New York Sun quotes the following passage from an address on the war, delivered on June 21 in the Chamber of Deputies at Rome, by Baron Sonnino, the Minister of Foreign Affairs:

> Every momentary weakness, every hesitation, might render useless the steps which have been taken up to the present amid so many arduous difficulties and innumerable sacrifices, and might even imperil the victorious outcome. Italy counts today absolutely upon the devotion of her sons, upon their actions, their words and their sublime spirit of self-abnegation.

This statement, though directed solely to the Italian people, was undoubtedly meant to emphasize the reports of Italian Commissioners, now in the United States, on the urgent needs of the Allies and especially of Italy.

Needs of the Merchant Marine

France.—The resolution adopted on June 23 by the Chamber of Deputies to place the work of increasing the French merchant marine under the control of one department has been accepted by the Government. The resolution signed by forty-four members of the Merchant Marine Committee, invited the Government to centralize the building, buying, and chartering of merchant ships, a task which so far has been divided among several Ministers. In the course of the debate on the question, Louis Nail, Under-Secretary for the Mercantile Marine said that the French merchant fleet amounted to 2,500,000 tons at the beginning of the war, that since that time 560,000 tons had been lost, 460,000 by acts of war. During the same period 680,000 tons had been built or bought and another 140,000 was on the stocks. At the same time he pointed out that Germany had lost 2,500,000 tons, or fifty per cent of its entire fleet.

According to Deputy Buisson, the Secretary was too optimistic, the merchant marine was in a dangerous condition and this was due to the inertia of the Government. Ships, he maintained, must be built at once or France would not be able to feed herself. He stated that this question took precedence over all others, even of effectives, and that England preferred to lend France ships and build for herself. He concluded by demanding that the Government insist on the Allies giving France the help she so much needed.

Ireland.—The Irish prisoners, whose release was promised by the Government last week, arrived in Dublin on June 18. They were welcomed enthusiastically by the citizens and escorted to their homes. Countess Markiewicz, who had been sentenced to death for her part in the rising of Easter week, 1916, but whose sentence had been commuted to penal servitude for life, was not with the liberated prisoners, but arrived a few days later. On the same day, in the House of Commons. Andrew Bonar Law, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was asked whether the prisoners had been released on condition that the Sinn Fein party should not participate in the forthcoming convention. He replied that the prisoners had been freed unconditionally. He added that the Sinn Fein movement in Ireland was not organized, so far as he was aware, "in such a way that any person or persons could speak for those engaged in it, and that the Government did not think the holding of the convention could be dependent on the assent or dissent of individual Irishmen." In addition to the prisoners released according to the previous pledge given by the Government, Count Plunkett, Member of Parliament, and the other members of the Sinn Fein, who were arrested on June 9, while attempting to hold a prohibited meeting in Dublin against the imprisonment of the Irish political prisoners, were also freed.

The Released Prisoners; W. O'Brien and the Convention

On June 20 Irish Unionists and Nationalists held a meeting in Westminster and selected delegates for the convention. The names, however, of the delegates will not be published until after they have been submitted to Premier Lloyd George. In a letter to the Premier, Mr. William O'Brien declined the invitation to send delegates in behalf of the "All for Ireland party." He refuses to participate in the convention, which he thinks can only inflame and intensify Irish discontent and throw on the Irish people the blame for the British Government's failure. Recent experience, Mr. O'Brien says in his letter, had convinced him, that only to a round-table conference of thoughtful, competent Irishmen, and not to a heterogeneous assembly mostly composed of precommitted partisan politicians, can Ireland look with confidence for judgment, and he urged a referendum as the only means of ending the controversy. Almost simultaneously with the announcement of Mr. O'Brien, it was stated that a Commission of Nationalists headed by Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M. P., and of Sinn Feiners was to visit the United States to put before the American people their respective views with regard to the Irish question. Mr. O'Connor arrived in New York on June 24, and expressed himself as sure of the ultimate success of Ireland's struggle, but was not so sanguine as to the results of the coming convention.

Russia.—On June 18 it was announced that the National Congress of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates were putting an end to the autocratic power assumed by the "purely local" Petrograd Council. The Congress is said to represent 25,000,000 Russians, the vast majority of whom favor an energetic prosecution of the war, and oppose a separate peace. On June 20 the Congress passed a vote of confidence in the Provisional Government and unanimously demanded the immediate resumption of the offensive and the army's reorganization. A War-Cabinet, including the leaders of the army and navy and technical representatives, was then formed. On June 23 the Minimalists in the Congress passed a resolution to abolish the Council of the Empire, a body which shares with the Duma equal legislative powers. It was also proposed that the Duma be dissolved by annulling the Deputies' mandates and cutting off the credits by which that assembly is supported. Last Friday the Maximalists, the advanced revolutionary party, placarded the streets of Petrograd with manifestoes reading:

Workmen's National Congress

> The capitalists are continuing the war, increasing hunger and the price of food, causing unemployment and bringing a counter-revolution nearer; the Provisional Government openly supports the power of the imperialists and the bourgeois; our patience is exhausted and we must by a peaceful demonstration make known our wishes and demands. We, therefore, invite the soldiers and the workmen to appear on the streets with the watchwords "Down with the Duma. Down with the ten bourgeois Ministers. Down with anarchy. Down with war. We want bread, peace and liberty."

The leaders of the more moderate divisions in the Congress also placarded the city, urging the people to make no demonstration, and declaring that disorders would only promote a counter-revolution which the "dark forces" were only awaiting an opportunity to start. The Maximalists' attempt to arouse the people was not successful.

On June 19 newspaper readers learned that strikes and plunderings were spreading, that the rich were afraid to leave Moscow and Petrograd for their country estates, that the soldiers in Finland do as they like, that 40,000 workmen are idle in Petrograd and the number of unemployed is rapidly increasing, that national bankruptcy is predicted, that no one can be found to take the post of Minister of Commerce, and that "organized graft" is the only real organization in Russia. M. Nekrasov, the Minister of Communications, is reported to have said: "The position is extremely difficult and the most menacing hour of the Russian revolution is near. . . . If the country will not assist the Government and cooperate with it in reestablishing order, I see no way out of the situation."

Revolts and Disorders

A "neutral and trustworthy observer" who has lately returned from Petrograd, gave the following statement to the press:

The great country of Russia is being carried blindly to its fate. Confusion is gliding into chaos. Russia faces a second revolution, greater than the first. It will be the forerunner of the tragedy of the Russians falling asunder. The situations may be described as hopeless. Unhappy conditions are piling on each other and the Government, whose good-will nobody doubts, staggers under the burden it carries. It cannot meet the great problem facing all Europe, which is the food-problem. Transport difficulties make all their efforts vain.

Long rows of empty cars stand on side-tracks, but efforts to restore them to traffic are fruitless. There are great stores of coal to be moved if the cars could be used. In Finland all the railways are firing with wood. The Government tries to prevent factories closing, but the owners evade this by assigning the factories to the workingmen, who promptly fail, as they lack capital. The Government itself has closed many of the ammunition factories for lack of raw materials and money. Sixty thousand Cossacks have been sent into Finland to support the Government, which rests really on the power of the Cossacks and Tscherkekes.

The question is, "What do the people think about war?" The answer is, "Nothing." They have no hope of victory.

According to advices received from Petrograd on June 21, martial law has been proclaimed at Tomsk, Western Siberia, because of wholesale murders and robberies committed by pardoned criminals, who have joined the militant anarchists. A plot being discovered to loot the banks and shops, 1,500 of the lately liberated prisoners were again arrested. Trouble is also reported in the city of Kirsanoff, which, like Kronstadt, proclaimed itself a separate republic. There were skirmishes between the Government troops and the Republicans, and the leader of the latter was arrested.

The news of a revolt among the sailors of Sebastopol transpired the middle of last week. It seems that an outbreak was organized by the followers of the agitator Lenine, and by extremists from Kronstadt. They accused the officers of the Black Sea fleet of trying to restore the old régime, the sailors revolted and deposed Admiral Koltchak and arrested other officers. While the mutiny was going on Rear Admiral James H. Glennon, U.S.N., accompanied by his staff, arrived at Sebastopol. At the sailors' request he addressed them, and after hearing him they voted to restore to their commands all the officers of the Black Sea fleet except Admiral Koltchak, and promised to support the Provisional Government. Anarchists who had seized and fortified a country house in a suburb of Viborg, were ordered by the Minister of Justice to evacuate it. They refused and were supported in their resistance by thousands of workmen, many of them armed with rifles. Detachments of sailors from Kronstadt would be summoned, it was promised, to aid the anarchists. Flags inscribed "Down with the capitalists! Long live the social republic!" were displayed. The Provisional Government issued orders and threats against the Sebastopol sailors and the Viborg anarchists to which little attention, apparently, was paid by the revolters.

On June 22 Mr. Root attended a meeting held at Moscow in the palace of the Governor-General where representatives of the Zemstvo and Municipal Unions, the Zemstvo Industrial Committee and the local Council of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates listened attentively to the American Commissioner's address. Mr. Root reminded his hearers that:

The Government of Germany, the German social system, even German Socialism, are all militaristic in their essential nature. They shall not gain control of free America, and if we can help you to prevent their gaining control of free Russia we shall be happy in feeling that we have assisted in the perpetuation of the ideals of our fathers who fought and sacrificed to make us free.

The whole assembly rose and cheered as the Americans left the hall. Mr. Root delivered another address before the Moscow Duma.

Spain.—Premier Eduardo Dato, in a statement given to the representatives of the Madrid press, said that calm prevailed in the country, but that he considered that very grave problems faced the Government. He did not believe, however, that these problems were beyond solution, nor did he think that it would be necessary to dissolve the Cortes.

A Better Outlook; Lingering Difficulties

While the outlook is brighter than last week, the situation facing the new Premier is one of extraordinary difficulty. Discontent with existing methods has long been general among the more advanced Liberals and the more radical reformers of the other parties of the Left. Internal and external difficulties arising out of the war have served to increase it. Ex-Premier Maura, leader of the Conservatives agrees that there is ground for dissatisfaction. One of the grounds of general protest is the favoritism which prevails in political and especially in military circles. To protest against the latter, "Officers' Defense Committees" have been organized. These demand that rewards should be proportionate to service, and that promotion should be by merit, with due regard to the claims of seniority. Their action was on the whole well received by the people and contributed in no small measure to the fall of the Prieto Ministry. The example given by the officers of the army in the formation of these committees has been largely imitated throughout the country, and "Defense Committees" of all sorts of trades and professions, as well as of Government officials have been formed. There is besides a growing movement in favor of the reopening of Parliament, and three Liberal members, Señors Barriobero, Dasolga and Pacheco, have addressed a manifesto to the Senators and Deputies protesting against the closing of the Cortes under the present circumstances, but the Government is making serious efforts to meet the situation. Among the first measures it has deemed necessary is a reorganization of the higher commands of the army, which is being studied by the Minister of War, General Primo-Rivera.

Luther, Slaves and Peasants

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

SO little is known of the real Luther, even in our day, that the statement may appear startling that he was an ardent admirer and a strong defender of slavery. More than this, he considered it the ideal state for the hired men and women, das Gesinde, of his own race. Nothing is more plainly contained in his writings. He went so far as to hold that slavery must of necessity be introduced into modern Europe. Other writers may have favored such a system while it was actually in existence, but Luther is apparently the only religious teacher who held that the infliction of this bitter bondage upon men and women of his own blood was the one satisfactory solution of the social question. If there are civilized men today who agree with him, they certainly are careful not to voice their opinion in public. Yet Luther expressed his opinion without shame or hesitation.

His utterances in favor of serfdom and slavery must not be regarded as merely casual remarks. They are the expression of his firm convictions. If, in the beginning, for certain reasons, he spoke of the wrongs of the greatly oppressed peasants, he later held that they were treated only too well: "You worthless, coarse peasants and mules," he said, "the thunder strike you dead! You have the best of the land." (Weimar Ed., Vol. XXVIII, p. 520.) Far from being content with the statement that, "Slavery is not against the Christian order, and he who says so lies!" (Ibid., Vol. XVI, p. 244.) Luther really wished that this system might be reintroduced. (Erlangen Ed. XXXIII p. 390.) A striking utterance of his opinion is to be found in the sermon preached by him in 1524. That the sentiments contained in it were not the result of a passing impression is plain from the fact that the sermon was printed three years after its delivery, with an introduction by Luther in which he states that it expresses his true "mind and conviction." Referring in the course of this sermon to a gift of servants and handmaids which Abimelech made to Abraham together with a present of sheep and oxen, Luther said of the former:

> These too are personal possessions, like other cattle (wie ander Viehe), which the Patriarchs sold as they pleased, as it would well nigh be best were it done so now, since in no other way can servants on estates be forced into subjection and tamed. . . . Should the world continue long this state would have to be introduced again. . . . The Patriarchs, so far as they themselves were concerned, would have given it up; but such an act would not have been good. They (i. e. the former slaves) would soon have become too proud, if so much right had been conceded them, or they had been treated as one's self or child. . . . If the rule of fist and force were here as in days gone by [i. e. if slavery were reintroduced] so that no one could stir but the fist would come down upon his head, there would then be a better state of affairs. Nothing else is of any avail. (Weimar Ed., Vol. XXIV, pp. 367, 368.)

So far Luther, the "Ecclesiastes by God's grace." But this is not all. How tenderly devoted he was in reality to the common people, may be judged from a sermon printed by him in 1526, a period when he was able soberly to form his final opinion of them. They were scornfully called by him Herr Omnes, "Master all," and in the following gentle terms he suggests the manner in which they should be treated:

> Because God has given the law and knows that nobody observes it, He has in addition instituted rod-masters, drivers and urgers. So the Scripture by a similitude calls the rulers. They must be like men who drive mules. One must constantly cling to their necks and urge them on with whips, for else they will not move ahead. So then are the rulers to drive, beat, choke, hang, burn, behead and break upon the wheel the vulgar masses, Sir All. (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XV, 2, p. 276.)

This "evangelical" teaching of the new apostle is wholly in accord with his desire for the reintroduction of bondage and slavery. Thus shackled and handed over to their masters, the common people could certainly far more readily be driven, beaten, and if so desired, broken upon the wheel. Luther's New Evangel, it may be noticed, has in more than one regard a striking similarity to the old Roman paganism. But Luther literally out-Herods Herod in his final reflection upon the poor slaughtered peasants, who were butchered in the revolution, and for whose fate he was doubly responsible. Leading Protestant historians freely admit that he had been largely the immediate cause of their uprising, which took place in the name of the New Evangel. Yet not content with their defeat, he goaded the princes to their slaughter. But our blood boils when, on recalling the fate of 100,000 of these misguided men, incited to revolt by his violent invectives against bishops and princes, we hear him actually boasting, years after the bloody deeds had taken place:

> I, Martin Luther, have during the rebellion slain all the peasants, for it was I who ordered them to be struck dead. All their blood is upon my head. But I put it all on our Lord God; for He commanded me to speak thus. (Tischreden. Erlangen Ed., Vol. LIX, p. 284.)

How, we marvel, was it possible for any human being to be so heartless, brutal and unnatural? Even had these men not been incited to rebellion by Luther himself, still they were at least to be pitied. This cruel boast is made the more unnatural by the fact that he himself was the son of a peasant, and that, as Vedder remarks in another connection "His sympathies should naturally have been with the class from which he had risen, and in thus taking without reservation the side of the princes, and becoming more violent in word than they were in deed, he was acting the renegade." (p. 244.) But that rôle he had assumed in many ways. He was the great Benedict Arnold of history, who after betraying by foul and lying words the spiritual Mother who had nursed him, betrayed likewise the class to which he belonged and was willing to hand them over to bondage, slavery and death.

How was it that Luther came to such a monstrous state of mind? It is possible to follow the process step by step. The story is long and complicated, but the outline of it can be given in few words.

Luther's first appeal was to the princes by whom he hoped to sweep the Church from the face of the land and forcibly impose upon the people his newly invented creed, if they would not accept it willingly. When his expectations were disappointed he turned to the people, thinking that the same effect could be brought about by a popular movement. But this resulted more disastrously than he had imagined, and its direct effect was the dreadful peasants' war. It was not the carnage and destruction, however, which made him turn like a wounded boar upon the peasants and tear them with his tusks. The deepest grievance lay in the fact that, in place of accepting his New Evangel, they preferred to follow his example and interpret the Scriptures for themselves. This was of all things the most dreaded and abhorred by Luther. It meant heresy against his own doctrine and his own interpretation, which no one was to question, much less to gainsay. Moreover his Lutheran princes too were now imperiled. What therefore was to become of his religion if the peasants should be victorious? The very thought made Luther frantic with rage, and turning against his own class he cast his full power on the side of the princes. In terms of unexampled violence he called upon all to "strike, stab and slay" the peasants, openly, secretly and in every possible way, "like mad dogs." Such is the history in brief.

In confirmation of these statements a few quotations from his own writings previous to the peasant uprising must be given. "What wonder," he wrote, "if princes, nobles and the laity were to strike Pope, bishops, priests and monks over the head, and drive them out of the land?" (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XXIV, 2, p. 46.) Yet he gently added that he by no means wished to excite the masses against their spiritual authorities. "Why," he again demanded, in even far clearer language, "do we not seize upon all weapons, and wash our hands in their blood?" (Opp. lat. var. II, p. 80.) Later editors strove to modify this passage by an insertion, but the original is unqualified. Equally anarchistic is the following declaration:

> It were better that all bishops be murdered, all foundations and monasteries torn up, root and all, than that a single soul should perish; how much better then were this than that all souls be lost because of the useless fetishes and idols (i. e. bishops, priests, etc.) Of what good are they except to live in luxury by other peoples' sweat and toil, and to hinder the Word of God [which Luther alone possessed]. . . . What fitter thing could happen to them than a powerful revolution which will wipe them from the earth. And this were only a matter of mirth, if it were to take place, as the Divine Wisdom says: "You have despised all my counsels and have neglected my reprehension. I also will laugh in your destruction." (Weimar Ed., Vol. X, 2, p. 111.)

Finally, in true Mohammedan style the people were told that "All who give aid, all who risk life, goods and honor, that the bishoprics be destroyed and the regimen of the Bishops extirpated, these are the dear children of God, and true Christians," while the men who supported the Bishops were the "devil's own servants," (Ibid., p. 140.) How else could the peasants understand such words than as the declaration of a holy war, and so in fact they interpreted them and acted accordingly. Words of patience were spoken by him only to be retracted the next moment by a storm of new invectives. In like manner the secular authorities were denounced as "worse than robbers and knaves," and the Emperor was styled "a sack of maggots," while Luther declared that, "God Himself has abolished all authority which acts against the Evangel," that is, in opposition to the heresiarch's pet ideas. (De Wette, Vol. II, p. 192.) Even the ardent admirer of Luther, Fr. V. Bezold, writes: "Such language could be used by Luther only in case he wished to place himself at the head of a rebellion," a purpose which we do not ascribe to him.

When finally the peasants arose in arms, in the name of the Evangel, they immediately turned to Luther for a consecration of their cause. Realizing the seriousness of the situation, he now sent forth a message of peace. He denounced both peasants and princes, for he saw the harm that was being done to his own cause, but while telling the peasants that if they were Christians "they would suffer everything" and even patiently allow themselves to be tortured by the princes, as he had always taught them (!), he again broke into the most violent denunciation of the Catholic lords who had not accepted his doctrine:

> God is so bringing it about that one cannot and will not any longer endure your tyranny. You must change and yield to the Word of God (i. e. to the religion of Luther's invention). If you will not do so by gentle means, you must do so through violent destructive ways. If the peasants do not accomplish this, others must do it. (Weimar Ed., Vol. XVIII, p. 293.)

Such was his message of peace by which he fanned anew the flames of war. But the leadership among the peasants had been assumed by sectaries, who, although of Luther's own making, had become heretics in his sight by interpreting the Bible for themselves after Luther's example. This was the one unpardonable sin for which no punishment could be too great. He also saw that his own princes, who were great oppressors of the people, were being attacked, and that both he and his doctrine might be discredited and some other form of "Evangelical Christianity" introduced. Such doctrine would surely have the same justification as his and might equally insist that the authority of all earthly rulers was null and void in the sight of God the moment they opposed it.

Luther's decision was soon taken. Heart and soul he cast his influence on the side of the princes. All the devils of hell, he now believed, had entered into the peasants. "Let everybody who can," he cried in frantic passion, "strike, slay, stab, secretly or publicly." Killing the peasants had become an act of religion.

Although the princes needed no exhortation, yet he insisted that neither patience nor mercy should be shown. The violence of his language knew no bounds. Thus he exclaims:

> Hence it may happen that he who is killed on their side may be a true martyr before God. . . . But whoever falls on the side of the peasants is a brand of hell for all eternity, because he is a member of the devil. . . . It is such a wonderful time now that a prince may gain heaven by bloodshed better than by prayer. (Weimar Ed., Vol. XVIII, p. 358, etc.)

A wonderful time indeed it was, for while 100,000 peasants, whose blood he boasted was upon his head, were being mercilessly slaughtered, Luther himself celebrated his union with the nun Katharine Bora. His intercourse with women had been such, he tells us, that he was turning into a woman. Such was the man who could write tender letters to his "sweetheart Kate" and at the same time urge the princes and their followers to strangle, stab and kill; who could speak in glowing terms of Christian liberty and in his heart desire that the days of bondage and of slavery might soon return with their rule of "force and fist"; who could claim a message from the Most High, and yet so deeply despise his own class, the peasant population whose hangman he made himself, that he believed not even the devil cared for them: "He despises them as he does leaden pennies," since he can have them without trouble, for no one else "would claim them." (Cordatus, Tagebuch, p. 127.) The common people, he held, "must be driven and forced like swine and wild beasts." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XV, 2, p. 276.) His titanic pride reached such heights that by the favor and power of princes he wished to impose upon them and upon all mankind his own irrational and self-invented creed. "Since I am sure of it," he proclaimed, "I shall be through it your judge and the judge of angels, as St. Paul says, so that he who does not embrace my doctrine cannot be saved." (Walch Ed., Vol. XIX, pp. 838, 839.) But the people, too, had their day when they sat in judgment upon Luther, and the name they gave him clung through life: "Hypocrite and princes' menial."

The Y. M. C. A., a Protestant Organization

EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J.

A HIGHLY important development of the attitude of the United States toward the Young Men's Christian Association seems to be shown by the "self-explanatory" general order issued by the War Department. The document, as given to the daily press, runs thus:

GENERAL ORDERS No. 57

May 9, 1917.

The following order by the President, issued April 28, 1917, is published to the army for the information and guidance of all concerned.

The Young Men's Christian Association has, in the present emergency, as under similar circumstances in the past, tendered its services for the benefit of enlisted men in both arms of the service. This organization is prepared by experience, approved method, and assured resources to serve especially the troops in camp and field. It seems best for the interest of the service that it shall continue as a voluntary civilian organization; however, the results obtained are so beneficial and bear such a direct relation to efficiency, inasmuch as the association provision contributes to the happiness, content and morale of the personnel, that in order to unify the civilian betterment activities in the army and further the work of the organization that has demonstrated its ability to render a service desired by both officers and men, official recognition is hereby given the Young Men's Christian Association as a valuable adjunct and asset to the service. Officers are enjoined to render the fullest practicable assistance and cooperation in the maintenance and extension of the association, both at permanent posts and stations and in camp and field. To this end attention of officers is called to the precedent and policy already established in:

(1) An act approved May 31, 1902, giving authority to the Secretary of War to grant permission by revocable license for the erection and maintenance of association buildings on military reservations, for the promotion of social, physical, intellectual and moral welfare of enlisted men.

(2) An act of Congress making appropriations for the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and referred to in General Orders No. 54, War Dept., 1910, wherein the furnishing of heat and light for the above mentioned buildings was authorized.

(3) General Orders No. 30, War Dept., 1914 (paragraph 80), Compilation of Orders (1881-1915) wherein commanding officers were enjoined (a) to provide all proper facilities practicable to aid the association, (b) to assign suitable sites, (c) to supply transportation for association tentage and equipment, (d) to care for and police association tents and grounds, (e) to accord accredited secretaries the privilege of the purchase of supplies from the Quartermaster's Department, (f) to furnish, where practicable, tentage for shelter.

By order of the Secretary of War.

H. L. SCOTT,
Major General, Chief of Staff.

Official.
R. F. MCCAIN, Adjutant-General.

It will be observed that by this order the officers of the army of the United States are "enjoined," that is to say, not only advised but commanded, "To render the fullest practicable assistance and cooperation (a stronger expression could hardly be used), in the maintenance and extension" of the Association. The officers of the United States army are therefore ordered to assist in keeping up and in spreading the Young Men's Christian Association in every way they can and in as full a measure as is possible to them. This is to be done "both at permanent posts and stations and in camp and field." It would scarcely seem possible to word a more comprehensive and imperative order that all the officers of the United States army should help as far as they can the Young Men's Christian Association.

It is not the purpose of this article to criticize the action of the Administration. We wish merely to define very clearly the precise meaning of this action so as to point out in a subsequent article the conclusions that are to be drawn from it, from a Catholic standpoint. To begin with, we shall undertake to show that the Young Men's Christian Association thus officially approved and commanded to the attention of all the officers of our army for help is distinctively and characteristically a Protestant organization. We do not use the word "Protestant" in any offensive sense, but merely as indicating that group of churches which are called, and style themselves, "Evangelical," that is to say, which hold the Bible to be the only infallible rule of faith. These churches are popularly called Protestant in contradistinction to the Catholic Church, which, though it holds the Bible to be a sure and infallible rule of faith, admits besides the authority of Apostolic Tradition, and of the Teaching Church to interpret and define the doctrines of Christ.

Now it is not difficult to show from the authoritative documents of the Association itself and from the words of its secretaries that the Young Men's Christian Association is essentially and characteristically a Protestant Evangelical organization. To begin with, let us consult the "Young Men's Christian Association Hand Book," published by the International Committee in 1892, which still remains the hand book of the Association. This Hand Book makes it quite clear that the Y. M. C. A. is primarily and distinctly a religious association. On page 17 we read:

> The Young Men's Christian Association originated in a meeting for prayer and Bible study. For a time the agencies employed were directly religious, and the conversion of young men, together with their growth in Christian character, were the only things the society sought to accomplish. Although the organization almost immediately undertook other lines of work for young men, and has since broadened its work until it embraces the development of the whole man, yet its ultimate aim has always been the evangelization and Christian culture of young men. In every association religious work is considered to be the important and crowning feature, toward which all the other departments lead up. A large proportion of the time and thought of the best workers is given to it.

Scattered through the entire Hand Book of the Association one finds repeated affirmations that its primary purpose is religious, that the chief care of the secretary must be to promote religious work, and that the ultimate end of the Association is to lead young men by various ways to affiliate with the churches. Thus, for example, in speaking of the General Secretary and his relationships, the Hand Book declares:

> He should see that the work of the secular departments is so carried on as to contribute to the attendance at the religious meetings and to reach young men individually. He must never become so engrossed in the details of his work as to neglect seeking out young men and speaking to them personally about their souls' interests. While the secretary should be in hearty sympathy and, as far as may be, in active cooperation with every department, he should give his best thought and most constant care to the religious work (page 139).

Again on page 16 among the reasons for the existence of the Young Men's Christian Association, we find: "No. 8. As an entrance way. Many who could not be induced to enter a church to hear the gospel can be led by various means into the Association, and through it into the churches." On page 19 it is declared that the Young Men's Christian Association "is a product of the Church, and a department of its work. In its entire field it cooperates with the churches and contributes to their growth and power." And on page 20, "Young men have been taught in the Association that the Church is a divine institution. Association members are loyal adherents of the Church the world over. Thousands of young men have been led into church membership." Moreover, on page 20, the Association asks of the Church, that is to say, of Protestant denominations, "Friendly criticism and advice. The Church is the rightful guardian of every department of its work. Its mature judgment will be honored, and its wise counsels, given in love, will be faithfully heeded." On page 21 the Hand Book asserts that the Young Men's Christian Association should give to the Church

> Filial devotion. It should guard against teachings opposed to those of the evangelical churches, and all methods not approved by their best judgment: arrange its work so as to avoid conflict with their regular appointments, and do nothing in any way antagonistic to them. The best energies of the Association should be used in the direction of saving young men and bringing them into the churches.

These citations from the official Hand Book, to which others could be added, show quite conclusively that the Young Men's Christian Association is essentially and professedly and primarily a religious organization, and that its religious work is considered by the Association the final object of its efforts and the most important fruit of its labor. We shall now consider what is the special religious color of the Association and to what church or churches it owes its exclusive allegiance. Again the official documents quoted in the Hand Book afford us a very conclusive answer. A committee appointed at the Portland Convention of the Young Men's Christian Association held in 1869 made a recommendation that a resolution adopted at a preceding convention in Detroit defining the qualifications for active membership in the Association should be reaffirmed. This resolution read as follows:

That, as these organizations bear the name of Christian and profess to be engaged directly in the Saviour's service, so it is clearly their duty to maintain the control and management of all their affairs in the hands of those who profess to love and publicly avow their faith in Jesus, the Redeemer, as divine, and who testify their faith by becoming and remaining members of churches held to be evangelical, and that such persons, and none others, should be allowed to vote or hold office.

Inquiry as to the meaning of the term, "evangelical church," continues the Hand Book, resulted in the appointment of a committee to define what the convention understood by these words. The committee reported, and presented the following definition:

And we hold those churches to be evangelical which, maintaining the Holy Scriptures to be the only infallible rule of faith and practice, do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (the only begotten Son of the Father, King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, in whom dwelleth the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and who was made sin for us, though knowing no sin, bearing our sins in his own body on the tree), as the only "name under Heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved" from everlasting punishment.

"The adoption of these rules at Portland," says the Hand Book, "gave members and ministers of evangelical churches a confidence in the Association movement which they had not had in it before, and since that convention the prosperity of the Association has steadily increased." (Hand Book, pages 48 and 49.)

Now a very brief study of these resolutions makes it clear that their purport is as follows: Since the Young Men's Christian Association bears the name Christian it is its clear duty to keep the control and management of all of its affairs in the hands of those who profess to be Christians, and who testify to their Christianity by becoming and remaining members of the "evangelical churches," that is, the churches which maintain the Holy Scriptures to be the one infallible rule of faith and practice. The enforcing of this resolution has resulted in the formation in the Association of two bodies of membership, the active members and the associate members. The active members are those who are, according to the foregoing rule, which is sometimes called the "Portland Test," considered to be Christians, and hence have control and management of the offices of the Association. The others, the associate members, are those who, not being technically considered Christians, are excluded from any control or management but are allowed the privileges of the Association classes, equipment and buildings. It is clear then that the church or churches to which the Young Men's Christian Association pledges its allegiance are the Protestant churches, so-called, and that the whole religious platform of the Association, as set forth in the quotations given, is Protestant. We shall next show, from an interview with a leading official of the Y. M. C. A. and from the tenor of its official organ, that this conclusion is justified by the officials of the Y. M. C. A. themselves.

Agriculture and War in England

A. Hilliard Atteridge

MANY striking discoveries have been made in England in the course of the war. Amongst these is the discovery, or perhaps one should say the rediscovery, of the importance of agriculture. The history of British industry for nearly a century is the story of the gradual decline, or better still, perhaps, the neglect, of agriculture and the enormous development of manufactures. The abandonment of the old policy of fiscal protection of agriculture and the general introduction of free trade was based on the idea that Great Britain, with her abundant stores of coal and iron and her growing factories, could be made into a huge workshop to supply half the world and could obtain abundance of corn and other food supplies from overseas in exchange for exports of manufactured goods. For some sixty years before the war, there was a steady drift of the population from the villages to the towns, and a growth of the factories with a parallel decline of the farms.

During the long war against Napoleon at the beginning of the nineteenth century, the United Kingdom produced nearly all its food supplies. But the statistics of the ten years before this great war show that although the country produced about 200,000,000 sterling worth of food, the same amount had to be imported. Roughly speaking, about half the food supply came from overseas. The greatest deficiency was in bread. For many years the amount of land under wheat had been steadily declining. In the face of the enormous quantities of cheap grain that came pouring in from various parts of the world and brought the market price down, wheat-growing was not good business for the British farmer. There was cheap bread for the workers, but it hardly paid the farmer to grow it. In the year before the war, the consumption of wheat was 151,000,000 hundredweight, but of this only 28,000,000 were grown at home; 57,000,000 came from India, Canada and Australia; 43,000,000 from the United States; 15,000,000 from Argentina; 5,000,000 from Russia, and 1,000,000 from Germany. In all, 123,000,000 were imported. Of every five loaves of bread in England, four were made from imported wheat and flour. The Indian and colonial supply had been steadily growing for ten years and had almost doubled in that time and it was the fashion to speak with satisfaction of the British Empire becoming more and more the source of food-supply for the home countries. It was pointed out that even if thousands of acres at home had been converted from arable into pastoral land which employed fewer hands, this set more labor free for the great industrial centers, and the wheat could be more easily grown in the colonies whose prosperity was thus promoted.

Then came the war and a discovery that the situation was not at all satisfactory, and that there was something to be said for the long unfashionable view that agriculture was at least as important as any other industry, and perhaps more important than any kind of factory work. The experience of other wars had been that, with a superior fleet holding the command of the sea, there could be no serious interruption to British commerce. But the coming of the submarine had introduced a new element into naval warfare, and made serious losses of food-carrying ships inevitable. Whether the imported wheat was grown in a British colony or in Argentina or the United States, it was equally exposed to loss at sea. The only absolutely secure source of supply was the home-grown wheat. There was the same problem, though to a less degree, in connection with many other kinds of food. Thus until the war came, no one realized what an important food product the potato was, or how much of our supply was imported. Germany had sent us besides the 1,000,000 hundredweight of corn, about 3,000,000 tons of potatoes, in the year before the war. After long years of comparative neglect, agriculture was again recognized as an all important industry.

As soon as it was generally realized that the war would be a long one, efforts were made to increase the home supply of food. An examination of the situation brought out some facts about British agriculture that came as a surprise to many people. Not only had the extent of land under tillage been seriously diminished, but as a general rule, the cultivated land, thanks to inferior methods of working it, was not at all as productive as it might have been. Some interesting statistics of British and German agriculture, published shortly before the outbreak of the great conflict revealed a remarkable diversity of conditions in the two countries. In the United Kingdom in 1912, out of 77,000,000 acres of land there were rather less than 47,000,000 under cultivation; more than 27,000,000 were pasture land. In Germany, out of 133,000,000 acres, 60,000,000 were cultivated, and of these only 13,000,000 were permanent pasture. In the United Kingdom there were less than 2,000,000 acres under wheat; in Germany there were 4,500,000. In the United Kingdom there were 8,000,000 acres under various grain crops, including wheat; in Germany there were 39,000,000 acres; Germany had 8,000,000 acres of potato fields against little more than 1,000,000 in Great Britain and Ireland.

But this does not reveal the whole difference between the agriculture of the two countries. In Germany for many years systematic scientific efforts have increased the production of every acre. The whole agricultural area of Germany was only about thirty per cent greater than that of the corresponding area in the United Kingdom. But Germany produced for its people four times as much grain and seven times as much potatoes, and with only half the amount of pasture land, it had 20,000,000 cattle against 11,000,000 in the United Kingdom; 4,000,000 horses against 2,000,000, and 22,000,000 pigs against 2,000,000. The more intense cultivation in Germany was evidenced also by the fact that one-sixth of the people were engaged in agriculture, while in Great Britain the farmers numbered only one-twentieth of the population. British agriculture was, in fact, terribly undermanned before the war, and with the attraction of better wages and more diversified life in the towns, there was a continual migration from the villages.

British agricultural statistics also showed that very little work was done by women in the fields. Even in the dairy industry, the cowman had largely replaced the milkmaid. There were far more women at work in the factories than in the fields, and domestic service also attracted large numbers from farm work. Ireland is industrially the least developed of the three kingdoms, but even there out of the 900,000 persons engaged in agriculture only 60,000 were women, while of the 600,000 engaged in industrial work two-fifths were women. Probably the United Kingdom is the only European country showing such results. Everywhere else women do a large proportion of the necessary farming and dairy work.

Early in the war, efforts were made to obtain additional labor for the fields. At first this was done, not so much with a view to increasing the actual production, as to provide substitutes for men enlisted from the country for military service. At this time there seemed to be an impression that any one could successfully turn from town-life to field-work. It had been the fashion to describe the farm hands as "an unskilled laborer." It was soon realized that in his own business he is as highly skilled as the factory hand. Taking care of animals and tilling the fields requires varied knowledge and skill which the countryman begins to learn from his boyhood, and one may perhaps add that he has an inherited aptitude for the work. The amateur soon discovers that such skill cannot be acquired in a few days, and that the man working beside him, whom he regards as an uneducated laborer has a vast amount of traditional knowledge and acquired experience which guides him in his work, though perhaps the man himself could not explain very clearly the reasons for what he is doing or argue about agriculture like a college professor. The net result of the experience was that it was decided that the field-worker was a very capable and useful man and deserved better wages and better conditions of life than he had so far enjoyed in most parts of England.

After the first disappointing experiments, the reinforcing of the field-workers was carried out on more practical lines. Attempts were made to give some training to the new recruits for the farms, and with better methods, there has been more success. Farm-hands already enlisted in the army and doing garrison duty at home, have been temporarily sent back to the fields at the busiest seasons of the year, and some use has been made of German prisoners of war, men from the country-districts of the Fatherland, who have gladly accepted the offer to exchange mere idleness in the internment camps for field work in gangs, under a small escort, the men receiving pay for their labor. They have proved efficient workers and have given so little trouble that the escort has had an easy duty.

But the most important step taken by the Government has been an enactment, under which the farmer is guaranteed a minimum price for his wheat during the war and for some time after it as an encouragement for breaking up pasture land with the plough. Further, the Government has taken pains to compel a certain amount of pasture land to be thus put under tillage, and the harvest of the coming summer will show a much larger production of home-grown wheat than has been recorded in England for a hundred years. Efforts are also being made, and made with good prospect of success, to produce large quantities of other food, especially potatoes. All over the country, waste lands are being turned into allotments, let at a nominal rent to anyone who will engage to cultivate them in their free hours after work. Parks, lawns and other grass-lands are being broken up with plough or spade and turned into potato-patches. There are cultivated strips on the sloping sides of railway cuttings and embankments. Even private gardens, small and large, no longer show trim flower-beds, but have been dug up and planted with vegetables. It is a revolution in English life. For the first time since the great development of manufactures began it is recognized that not only the prosperity but the safety of a country depends largely on the plough and the spade.

The Separatist View of Ireland

JOHN DEVOY

IN the issue of AMERICA for June 9, the Rev. Sigourney W. Fay presented "The O'Connellite View of Ireland" very interestingly, largely through the mouth of O'Connell himself. The speech from which the writer quoted shows that the Liberator's policy in 1814 was essentially the same as it was in 1847, the year of his death. O'Connell was loyal to the Sovereign of England, was utterly opposed to Separation and, as Father Fay says, believed that Irish "freedom can only be attained within and not without the British Empire."

Father Fay states his belief that O'Connell's work for Repeal was ruined, as the work of Grattan and Flood was ruined in '98, "by the impatience of younger men." This is putting very moderately the view that prevails among followers of the Constitutional movement, but it is not borne out by the facts of history. Indeed, the very reverse is true.

The work of Grattan and Flood was ruined and the Union brought about because Grattan, by consenting to the disbandment of the Volunteers, threw away the weapon with which he had won legislative independence. That cleared the way for the Union, and Pitt was as sure of success before the Rebellion of 1798 as after it had been put down. Repeal was really defeated in 1844, when O'Connell was released from prison, a broken man, and it was dead when the Young Irelanders were driven from Conciliation Hall by John O'Connell and a crowd of hungry place-hunters in 1846. When the abortive attempt at insurrection was made in 1848 the Repeal Association was defunct and many of the men who had helped the Liberator's son to expel the Young Irelanders for "disloyalty to Repeal" were in snug Government jobs.

The Separatist view is that real freedom for Ireland can only be found in national independence and total separation from England. The Separatists contend that England will never consent to give Ireland control over her vital interests, that English commercial greed insists now, as it always has, that no Irish legislature shall have power to restore the industries destroyed by English legislation or to foster and develop new ones, and that therefore real national life is impossible for Ireland within the British Empire.

Those who seek legislative freedom within the Empire and those who want separation have both failed in their main object. The taunt flung in the faces of the Separatists that they have not achieved success applies equally to the Constitutionalists. But the latter point triumphantly to measures of amelioration won for the Irish people by their efforts and to the so-called Home Rule act now "on the Statute Book." The Separatists assert that the Home Rule act is utterly worthless and can produce strong evidence to show that every concession wrung from an unwilling English Government, from Grattan's Parliament to Catholic emancipation, and from the disestablishment of the Irish Protestant church and Gladstone's Land acts to the grant of county and district councils and the Wyndham Land act of 1903, was in very large measure the result of the work of "younger men" which the Constitutionalists disapproved.

England has never yet given anything to a peaceful and submissive Ireland. She has never been influenced in the smallest degree by the justice of Ireland's case, but in every instance has yielded either to actual force or the menace of force. Gladstone frankly admitted this in his speech proposing the disestablishment of the Protestant Church in 1869, when he said that he had first been moved to the necessity of "doing justice to Ireland" by the "intensity of Fenianism," and he expressly named the insurrection of 1867, the Manchester rescue, the Clerkenwell explosion and the successful resistance to eviction at Ballycohey. Here was the most enlightened and liberal Englishman of the nineteenth century, who had read many of O'Connell's speeches and listened to some of them, who was a grown man during the monster meetings, the greatest manifestations of a people's will in the whole history of the world, admitting that it required rebellion, acts of violence and breaches of the law to open his eyes. The Separatists have every right to claim that this admission of Gladstone is the key to English policy in Ireland. They have not reached their goal, but they have a right to claim that they have kept the Irish cause alive and the Irish question open and made it possible for the Constitutionalists to obtain concessions. It cannot be denied that it was the Easter week insurrection and the merciless system of English terrorism that followed it which made the Irish question a matter of international politics and forced the English Government to make its present attempt at a settlement, which the little "thing" "on the Statute Book" certainly does not make.

The Separatists are therefore within the bounds of moderation in insisting that it is their policy which is winning, and that, if final victory comes, it will be mainly, if not wholly, due to their persistent opposition to all compromise, their insistent iteration of the demand for full national independence and the sacrifices of life, liberty and worldly prospects which they have made, generation after generation. They are the only party in Ireland who have a consistent and continuous policy, kept alive and rigorously adhered to in spite of the vicissitudes of constant conflict with the British Government. Charles Gavan Duffy, who was not a militant Separatist, but would prefer complete national independence to Home Rule within the Empire, if it could be attained, had this idea of a fixed policy in his mind when he wrote in his "Four Years of Irish History":

> Principles are like fixed stars, always in their unchangeable places; policy is the chart of the pilot who sails by their light. He shifts with the wind and the tide; his craft may be driven out of her course by a tempest, she may lie like a log on the waters in a calm; he backs to the right to avoid breakers on a dangerous coast, and to the left to give a wide berth to a sunken rock, but all the time he is pressing on with unsleeping watchfulness to the appointed port.

O'Connell was the greatest Irish leader who ever lived, the greatest peaceful agitator the world has ever seen, but he had the defects of his great qualities. His saying that "no amount of human liberty is worth the shedding of a single drop of human blood" would be welcomed by present-day pacifists, but it was rank political heresy, originating probably in his horror at the atrocities of the reign of terror in France, where he received his education. Another heresy is contained in the speech delivered in 1814, which Father Fay quotes. Few Irishmen, except Unionists of British descent, will agree with this:

> I am most deeply anxious to impress upon the minds and understandings of every true Irishman that disloyalty to his Sovereign would be double treason to his country; it would be perjury, aggravated by folly, and followed by the virtual extinction of the liberties of Ireland. And what possibility could there be of aught besides destruction? You would have no friends, no supporters.

The men who listened to that speech in 1814 were no more loyal to the King of England than were the 3,000 mounted Wexford men, veterans of the Rebellion of 1798, who listened to him at Mullaghmast in 1843, smiling while he spoke of peace. Moreover, none of their descendants are really loyal today. The prophecy as to the consequences of disloyalty to England has been shown by all that has happened in Ireland since to be an idle dream. Such progress as Ireland has made has been chiefly due to active disloyalty, and such efforts as England is making now to appease it by concessions would not be made if all the people followed the advice of O'Connell in 1814, or that of Redmond today. No people make progress who do not stand on their rights. Ireland will not get Canadian Home Rule if she asks for only that, for England always gives less than Ireland asks. But now that England realizes her present straits she may offer Ireland, as a means of staving off the inevitable, something like Canadian Home Rule, but certainly without the power to protect and foster her industries.

But, no matter what England does, or what may be the attitude of the Parliamentary party, the Separatists will hold out for national independence, fully confident that, if they do not win immediately, Ireland will fare better for their steadfastness and resolute adherence to principle.

"With Dyed Garments from Bosra"

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

"WHO is He that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bosra? Comely is He in His vesture." Thus sings the Church on the first Sunday in July in the Vespers of the Feast of the Most Precious Blood. Then, with a majesty and pathos to which the masterpieces of Greek tragedy offer no parallel, a sublime dialogue takes place between her and the heavenly Bridegroom. "It is I," He answers, "I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save." Now a voice, like that of John, the Seer of the Apocalypse, or of some burning Seraph, witness of the glorious ignominies of the Cross, thrills us with its strain: "He was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood, and His name is called the Word of God." Smitten with an agony of grief and love, wondering at that royal robe of her Spouse encrimsoned with the drops of Gethsemani, the Bride exclaims: "Wherefore is Thine apparel red, and Thy garment like unto those that tread in the wine-press?" And deep with all the agony of an outraged God, tender with the gentle reproach of a deserted and forgotten friend, comes the voice of the Bridegroom: "I have trodden the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with Me."

Seldom in the glorious drama of her liturgy has the Church struck a note so majestic, so thrilling. Before her stretches the infinite, shoreless ocean of Christ's redeeming love. Her gaze looks down into the depths of the heart of God. Rapt in vision, she sees at a glance once more every episode of the tragedy she has already celebrated on Good Friday. Then she wailed over the Bridegroom slain, and, clothing herself in the garments of mourning, she summoned her children to kneel with her at the foot of the Cross to keep vigil, in sorrow, shame and love, over the last agony of the Son of God. But now, while the note of sorrow still lingers on her lips, even as the mother of the Maccabees lifted her voice in triumph over the pulseless hearts of her martyred sons, she, too, hymns her pæan of victory. It is the song of the Bride conscious of the immortality won by the Spouse who laid down His life that His brethren might be saved. Like a queen, celebrating the victories of her conquering son, she exclaims:

Forth let the long procession stream
And through the streets in order wend;
Let the bright waving line of torches gleam,
The solemn chant ascend.

With what pride, what rapture of ecstasy, she lingers over the trophies and the triumph of her hero! Surely she has a right to celebrate them with all this sacred pageantry. Bride or mother never sang as she sings of the high deeds of her loved One. What a theme is hers! The world redeemed, the human race saved from the thraldom of sin!

By the first Adam's fatal sin
Came death upon the human race;
And this new Adam doth new life begin
And everlasting grace.

For scarce the Father heard from heaven
The cry of His expiring Son,
When in that cry our sins were all forgiven,
And boundless pardon won.

In the antiphons of Matins, Bride of Sorrows and Mother of the followers of the triumphant King, she bends over each sacred drop of His redeeming Blood, shed for us in the Circumcision, the Garden of the Agony, the Royal Way up the hallowed slopes of Calvary. She adores them at the Pillar of the Flagellation, and as they begem the Crown of Thorns that circlet of kingship on His brow. Thinking of Him as one ever living, she sees the world leagued against Him and clasps Him in her arms as if to shield His Sacred Blood from profanation and to defend Him against His foes, exclaiming with the Psalmist: "Why have the gentiles raged and the peoples devised vain things? The kings of the earth stood up, and the princes met together against the Lord and against His Christ." But, confident of the Divine strength of the Lamb that taketh away the sins of the world, she addresses Him in the words of the inspired Singer of Israel: "Arise in thy glory and beauty, march forward to victory." And as her God and her Spouse is also the Lion of the Fold of Judah, as she contemplates Him victorious through love over his foes, the glorious phalanxes of those whom He has redeemed pass before her inspired gaze. She beholds them accompanying the Lamb that was slain, all marshaled in their glorious companies, rank upon rank, the embattled hosts of the stalwart soldiers of Christ. How white their garments! How beautiful their brows, wreathed with those laurels of Paradise that never fade, for they were engrafted on the sacred tree of life, the Cross. Wonder-rapt at the sight, she exclaims in the antiphons of Lauds: "These who are clad in white robes, who are they, and whence come they?" And from the courts where the Lamb receives adoration and power and glory from the elect, voices like the sound of many waters and murmurous with melodies not of earth, answer: "These are they who have come out of great tribulation and have washed their robes in the Blood of the Lamb. They have conquered the dragon by the Blood of the Lamb and the Word of the Testament."

But earth must be joined to heaven. The soldiers still laboring here in the heat of the battle, wounded maybe in the struggle against powers and principalities banded together for their ruin, must be united in a holy confederacy with their brothers above, that like them they may conquer by the power of the Precious Blood. So she gathers her children, gray-haired veteran and tender child, sinner and saint, rich and poor, priest and people, to the mystic pageantry of the Mass. Burdened though they be with sin and sorrow, she knows that if the stream of that innocent and sanctifying Blood bedew their souls, but touch the fringe of their garments, they will be saved. Exulting already in their triumph, she lifts her voice with the priest at the Introit and exclaims: "Thou hast redeemed us, O Lord, in thy Blood, out of every tribe and tongue and nation, and hast made us to our God a kingdom."

The kingdom of the Precious Blood, its empire, its sway over all those who are willing to seal their hearts and their lives with its sacred blazonry, such is her theme today. Trembling lest the enemy despoil her children of that kingly garment and livery, lest the germ of immortal life which the Blood of Christ implants in the soul, may be stifled by the poisonous weeds of passion and sin, she prays in the Collect to that Almighty and Everlasting God, who appointed His Only-Begotten Son to be the Redeemer of the world, that here on earth we should so venerate "the price of our salvation" and be so defended by its power from the evils of this present life, that we may rejoice in its perpetual fruit in heaven. Repeating in the Epistle the words of the Apostle of the Gentiles, she lifts our gaze again to Christ, "the High Priest of the good things to come," reminding us that He is the "Mediator of the New Testament; that by means of His death, for the redemption of those transgressions, which were under the former Testament, those that are called may receive the promise of eternal inheritance, in Christ Jesus our Lord." It was by His own Blood, by the sacred price which He paid, that the Son of God entered heaven. By the merits and the saving power of this Divine Blood we, too, hope to enter into its glories as His brethren and His heirs.

The Gospel brings us back to Calvary. We watch the soldier pierce the sacred side, and see the Blood and the water trickling down the lance of the legionary and the riven breast of the Victim.

From that Holy Body broken
Blood and water forth proceed;
Earth and stars, and sky and ocean
By that flood from stain are freed.

Then a martial strain sweeps into her song, the trumpets of victory sound a triumphant march. The royal banner of the Cross is borne in the hands of advancing hosts, and the accents of the great Preface of the Cross are wafted over the heads of the kneeling throng. For it is meet and just to give thanks to Thee, "holy Lord Father Almighty, eternal God, who hast appointed that the salvation of mankind should be wrought on the Cross; that from whence death came, thence life might arise, and that He who overcame by the tree, might also by the tree be overcome." And we are reminded of the splendid lyric of Passiontide, those words which for sweetness and tenderness have not been surpassed in Latin song:

Faithful Cross! above all others,
One and only noble tree!
None in foliage, none in blossom,
None in fruit, thy peers might be:
Sweetest wood and sweetest iron!
Sweetest weight is hung on Thee!

After that noble hymn, when the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, sacrificed on Calvary, has again been mystically immolated on the altar, and the Body and Blood and Soul and Divinity of the Living Christ have entered into the heart of the officiating priest and the innocent child and have strengthened wayfarers for the journey of life, our eyes are lifted to those heavenly mansions opened to us by the conquering and redeeming Blood of Christ, and with the priest at the Postcommunion, we humbly, but confidently pray: "Having been admitted to the Holy Table, O Lord, we have drawn waters in joy from the fountains of the Saviour: may His Blood, we beseech Thee, become with us a fountain of water springing up to Eternal Life."

Liberty and License

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The cries, "liberty" and "free speech" are ever on the lips of revolutionists, Socialists, birth-controllers and the rest, of whom you spoke editorially in AMERICA for June 16. Until very recently, when the Federal authorities took control of the situation, they have been allowed a free hand to attack patriotism and preach contempt for constituted authority. That by "liberty" they understand license for themselves and denial of liberty to all others has been demonstrated for the ten-thousandth time by the experience of Mr. Russell J. Dunn and his coworkers of the American Anti-Socialist Society. These Catholic men have gone into the streets to defend Christianity and Americanism and have found themselves hounded by alien revolutionists, whose influence with an "uplift" municipal administration has proved to be very considerable. Though they scorn American citizenship and have had their teeth drawn to evade conscription, these revolutionists have, with the solid backing of their shop-keeping racial kindred, made a determined effort to prevent members of the American Anti-Socialist Society from publicly preaching love of God and love of country. If Christian Americans continue to tolerate existing conditions, they will pay the penalty by finding themselves a merely tolerated group in America.

"Let Them Get Acquainted"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Apropos of the discussion running in America on the subject of cultivating acquaintance among Catholic young people, I should like to add a little of my own experience. A girl of twenty-eight, I was graduated from a convent-school, and am not without attractions, to which I refer merely to point my moral. My father has always been a deeply religious man; but his religious views, or their exaggeration, have done an injustice both to myself and to my brothers, for they have made him narrow, Puritanical and obstinate; so set is he in his own way of thinking that no ideas of ours are given a moment's consideration.

I had ambitions to cultivate my natural gifts after leaving school, with a view to entering some field of usefulness for which I might find myself qualified. My father would not hear of the idea, being convinced that the home, and the home alone, was woman's place, and this whether it offered opportunities for occupation and development or not. As a consequence I remained at home. One would have expected that he would have made opportunities for my meeting Catholic men in a social way; but, alas, for the inconsistency of preachment and practice, he did nothing of the kind. The men I met or became interested in were for the most part non-Catholics. But to accept invitations from non-Catholics was to my father's way of thinking little less than a disgrace: so I do so without his consent and with my mother's connivance. I am not proud of having done so, I am simply stating facts. The Catholics I did meet were men with whom I had nothing in common.

Two chances to marry were offered me. In the one case the man was a Catholic, but he had narrow, hidebound ideas and was impossible; the other was a non-Catholic for whom I cared and whom I wished to marry. Fortunately grace was given me not to do so, but no credit accrues to my rearing or education for my resistance. My experience has been repeated in the case of my brothers, and neither they nor I have benefited by the contempt for the other sex inculcated in us. So long as parents cling to views like my father's and carry them out in practice without making any effort to provide for their children's legitimate desires; so long as educators persist in frowning on anything like acquaintance with the other sex, while young people are under their care; so long as both parents and educators persist in being so short-sighted as to refuse to look into the future and see the natural results of their ill-advised methods, there will be numberless old maids or numberless mixed marriages.

Obviously I am far from being contented. The Catholic social service work, teaching of poor children and the like, in which I am constantly engaged, helps me somewhat to forget my frustrated hopes, but they leave me still dissatisfied. I love children and have always wanted a home of my own. Whose fault is it that this has been denied me?

Conditions in Brazil

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recent efforts on the part of our Catholic press to counteract the campaign of slander and abuse hurled at the Catholic Church in South America by some Protestant missionaries and agencies deserve the highest commendation. Unfortunately, however, some of our defenders have done more harm than good by going to the other extreme and ignoring conditions that are painfully true, and should be explained rather than ignored or denied. It is regrettable that all men do not endeavor to be as frank and exact as Dr. Hazlett and the Rev. Ernesto Canguiero, whose statements on conditions in Brazil appeared in recent issues of AMERICA.

The same full praise can hardly be extended to the Brazilian whose article appeared in the Queen's Work a short time ago, and to which you referred in AMERICA for March 17. Quoting statistics for the year 1912, the author gives 917,479 as the total population of the State of Sao Paulo, 894,739 of whom, he declares, are Catholics. I should like to ask how many of these Catholics approach the Sacraments once during the year, and also what percentage of them make any reasonable effort to attend Mass on Sundays and holydays regularly, or how many even consider themselves bound in conscience to perform these duties. The author was fortunate in choosing the State of Sao Paulo to prove his contentions, as religious conditions in that State are admittedly better than in other sections of Brazil, but I should be very agreeably surprised to learn that thirty per cent of the girls and women of that State performed their Easter duty and attended Mass regularly on days of obligation, and that fifteen per cent of the boys and men fulfilled these obligations.

In regard to marriages in Brazil I may say that practically all take place in the afternoon or evening, very seldom in the forenoon with nuptial Mass. I may add that in very many cases neither the bride nor the groom approaches the Sacraments of Penance and Holy Communion for the occasion, and in Rio de Janeiro it happens rather seldom that the groom prepares himself for the marital state by going to confession and Communion.

Referring to the question of morality I believe that we can utilize our time and efforts to better advantage by cleaning our own house before we point the finger of scorn and accusation at our South American neighbor. The biggest problem Church and State will have to face during the next twenty-five years or so in the United States will probably be immorality, if we are to judge from the trend of things as pictured in our magazines, papers, novels, moving-picture shows, theaters, and women's fashions, even at private and public entertainments under the auspices of Catholic organizations, and the present birth-control campaign.

Catholics in Brazil, however, cannot deny that Protestant missionaries and others are justified to a certain extent in believing that there is a great deal of immorality in the larger cities, for the reason that whatever vice actually exists, and the extent of it is indeed deplorable, is practised openly. No one can accuse a Brazilian of hypocrisy; he is absolutely frank in everything he does. Furthermore, he does not consider himself immoral. I have come into intimate contact with many boys and young men, and I have found very few that did not "sow their wild oats," and openly at that. And what is more, they did not consider it wrong and thought it perfectly "natural." I may also add that their parents did not offer any objections so far as I could learn.

The Brazilian mother, wife and daughter have no superiors anywhere so far as morality is concerned. What Father Canguiero says of the Brazilian mothers must be confirmed by every honest critic, but if the Commandments of the Church apply to the people in Brazil, the great majority of the women in Brazil are not Catholic, and this condition is largely due to lack of religious education and training.

There are many practising Catholics in Brazil, and the Church has every reason to feel proud of them, but the number is not yet sufficiently large to make Brazil a Catholic country. Religious ignorance and impurity cannot thrive or even exist in the Catholic Church. Great headway has been made in Brazil the last fifteen or twenty years, thanks to the untiring zeal of the Bishops, diocesan priests and missionaries, and the time will come when that great country will fully deserve to be called a Catholic country.

The O'Connellite View of Ireland

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The "O'Connellite View of Ireland" is the old, old view, older than the great O'Connell himself whose memory Ireland so dearly cherishes. I have laid my hand in reverence on the coffin that lies beneath the Round Tower in Glasnevin; and without abating my love and respect for the Chief whose fame is irrevocably secure, I defend the policy of those "younger men" whose impatience, it is alleged, ruined the work of Repeal.

In the speech quoted by Father Fay the enemies of Ireland are described as miscreants longing with bestial delight to riot in Irish blood; seducers and oppressors, ready with triangle and gibbet to torture, to plunder, and to massacre. If the enemies referred to could have been identified as common criminals seeking to seduce the Irish people from their allegiance, O'Connell would have beaten them flat to the ground. Reference to the gibbet, the symbol of power over life and death, shows that O'Connell expected the English Government to act in a terrible manner against Ireland, if the efforts of the criminals should be successful; and when he said that Ireland's enemies "send round their agents with money, and with pardon for themselves . . ." he left his hearers under the impression that the Government was instigating the commission of the crimes. This impression is intensified by the fact that he failed to call on the Government to prosecute the criminals, though he knew that such prosecution was the function of a just government and that the criminals would have received short shrift had they applied their devilish trade in England. Eventually, the Government did act: it arrested and sentenced to imprisonment, not the criminals who sought to stir up rebellion, but the great-hearted O'Connell himself, who had striven to the utmost to keep the people law-abiding and loyal.

Neither O'Connell nor the "younger men" were ignorant of the Government's hostility, and the point at issue was: Could the Government be won over by constitutional means? Young Ireland's answer was: No. O'Connell, having by colossal efforts, overcome the inertia caused by religious persecution, may have calculated on achieving political emancipation by similar efforts. He tried; but, great as he was, such a task was overwhelmingly greater, and if it broke his valiant heart it is no wonder. That policy was, of course, the complete subordination of Ireland to England. The disagreement between O'Connell and the "younger men" was an apparent one only. Towards the end, O'Connell seems to have despaired of success for his efforts, and we need make no subtle distinctions between him and the "younger men," for does not their great common love for Ireland abridge the few short years by which the former was separated from a realization of the inexorable truth?

As to England's policy in regard to Ireland, it is based mainly on military considerations. A discussion of it would be very technical and would demand a high degree of training in military strategy and tactics. A very general statement of that policy would run: England's safety demands the annihilation of the space between England and Ireland, or, alternatively, the annihilation of Ireland's national power. We may relieve this statement of all technicality if we adopt the dictum of the late Lord Salisbury: "Sink Ireland beneath the waves of the Atlantic ocean."

No Priests in the Trenches!

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The response of our Catholics to their country's call, while more than gratifying, is not surprising. It is a convincing answer to the Guardians of Liberty and others of that ilk: but we are only living up to the teaching of the Church and the traditions of the past. Among those sent to the front there will be a very large percentage of Catholics. The call has gone forth for 400 chaplains to look after the spiritual needs of our soldiers. Needless to say the priests will not be lacking.

No doubt the country at large is grateful for our sacrifices, and appreciates them: but if our Catholic young men are to fight bravely shoulder to shoulder with our Allies then we must insist that the French priest be taken from the ranks and the trenches and put where he belongs. There is something abhorrent in a priest shedding human blood even in a just war. His duty is to bring spiritual help to the soldiers and not take human life. France is, I believe—I am not sure about Italy—the only country where priests are forced to enter the trenches as soldiers. It will be very repulsive to our Catholic men to see the priests forced to do such work by a barbarous law.

Can we not bring pressure to bear upon the Administration at Washington so that France shall know that even from the point of efficiency better fighting will be done if the ministers of God carry, not the rifle, but the crucifix, if the musket is taken from them so that their anointed hands may be raised in absolution over the dying? But how shall we get the Administration to suggest this to our Allies? I think we can bring it about. Let every Catholic paper in the country print a short form of letter of protest, and let them ask their readers to send something similar to the Secretary of War. Let the soldiers in the ranks write in the same sense. I venture to say if this suggestion is carried out, in a short time millions of letters will pour into the War Deparment at Washington, and a protest so loud and so emphatic cannot be disregarded. The request ought to be made not so much in the name of humanity as in the cause of efficiency. If this is done I have no doubt Mr. Wilson will suggest to Paris that the priest's place is to console the dying and not to shed human blood, not even that of our enemies. So let our slogan be: "No Priests in the Trenches!"

Bishop McFaul

ANOTHER member of America's honored episcopate has laid aside his purple and his cares and has gone to take his place among the great army of confessors who have kept the faith, their own and their flock's, have fought the good fight and come into the reward of justice laid up for them. He has made his last pilgrimage ad limina, not this time to pontifical Rome, but to the celestial Jerusalem. He has rendered his account to the great High-Priest; and has traced the long line of his espiscopal lineage, step by step, with never a break in the many centuries, back to the Apostle from whom was derived his own share in the commission given by Christ to teach all nations. He himself rejoices, but his diocese and the many men in the United States who prized his friendship are mourning his death.
